

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

*Lease of settled estates—Surrender of old lease—*19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, ss. 2, 5—21 & 22 Vict. c. 77, s. 5.

SETTLED LAND.—The Court will authorise the grant of a new lease upon the surrender of an old one, if the best rent which, under all the circumstances of the case, can be obtained is reserved.

This was a petition under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Acts, and under the Property and Trustees Relief Amendment Act, praying for the opinion of the Court as to the management of the trust property, and also for its sanction to an agreement made under the following circumstances:—

The settled property had been leased in the year 1860 for a term of twenty-one years. This term had become vested in a Mr. Jameson, and Mr. Jameson had agreed with the trustees of the settlement that the lease should be surrendered and a new repairing lease for sixty years granted to him, provided the sanction of the Court could be obtained to the arrangement. The rent payable on the old lease was 140*l.* per annum. That proposed for the new lease was 225*l.*

The 5th section of the later Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 77) and the 5th section of the earlier Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), taken together, expressly confer the power of surrendering any lease, and of granting new leases of the same hereditaments, and there was evidence of the sufficiency of the rent of 225*l.*; but, inasmuch as the surrender of the old lease must form part of the consideration for the grant of the new one, it was doubted whether the section requiring the best rent to be reserved would be satisfied.

Bovill appeared for the petitioners.

James, Q.C., and Bagshawe, and Giffard, Q.C., and Kekewich, for other parties.

Wood, V.C., said that the true construction of the Acts was that the best rent which could be obtained under all the circumstances of the case should be reserved. He therefore gave his sanction to the agreement.

Practice—Costs of written bills.

COSTS.—Where, on the hearing of a cause, all matters, including the costs, were disposed of, but the costs of three written bills overlooked by inadvertence, a motion that, on the taxation of the costs, these omitted costs might be allowed, was granted on the authority of a case before Vice-Chancellor Wood, and on the terms of the applicant paying the costs of the motion.

Ellis moved in this case that on the taxation of costs the plaintiff might be allowed the costs of three written bills—namely, the copy for the Court, the copy for counsel, and the copy for service, the case having been one of great pressure. Being a heavy matter when it was disposed of, this item had been, by inadvertence, overlooked. It was also asked that the plaintiff might have his costs of this application, which was renewed from a former day. In Elt v. The Burial Board of Islington (Kay, 449), Vice-Chancellor Wood had allowed the costs of a written bill under somewhat similar circumstances: Viney v. Chaplin (3 De G. & J. 282).

G. W. Collins, for the defendant, referred to the 18th rule of the 40th order, which provided that no costs of a written bill should be allowed unless the Court, in disposing of the costs of the cause, should direct the allowance thereof. The notice of motion was not to amend the order or alter the decree which it ought to have been: 35th rule, 40th order. This was, in fact, a second notice of motion.

Ellis, in reply.—Vice-Chancellor Wood made no order as to the plaintiff's costs, this application ought not to have been opposed.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I confess if this were res integra, I should feel strongly disposed to refuse the motion. It was the duty of the solicitor when the cause came to a hearing to be prepared for everything, and it is no excuse to say that this was overlooked; it was a culpable neglect which I should not have been disposed to look at indulgently; but after the decision of Vice-Chancellor Wood I cannot take upon myself to say I shall not make the order. But this I am sure of, that the party guilty of the negligence ought to pay the costs. It is said that the application ought not to have been opposed; I think the opposition perfectly justifiable, and if it had not been for the case cited I should have refused the motion with costs. The order must be made, but the applicant must pay the costs, and I cannot regard it as two notices of motion. I gather from Mr. Leach (the registrar in Court) that two guineas is the proportion of the costs as to these bills, let it be mentioned as the amount.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Official assignees—Remuneration.

BANKRUPTCY.—The salary made payable to official assignees by section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 is in discharge of all duties to be performed by them (including those of official liquidators and trustees under trust deeds) after the 11th of October, 1861, and official assignees are entitled to no further recommendation.

Where bankruptcies have come under the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy before the 11th of October, 1861, but have not been wound up till after that date, official assignees are entitled, (1) in respect of duties wholly performed before that date, to remuneration under the old scale established by the Act of 1849, and General Orders under that Act; (2) in respect of duties performed partly before and partly after that date, to an apportionment to be made for each particular bankruptcy of the fees received under the old scale; and (3) to no remuneration beyond the fixed salary in respect of duties performed after the 11th of October, 1861.

This was an application by the Attorney-General upon the relation of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, that Mr. Patrick Graham, an official assignee, might be ordered to pay to the credit of the Chief Registrar's fund a sum of 1,663*l.*, and to the credit of the unclaimed dividend fund 578*l.* 10*s.* The question as to the latter sum was mainly whether Mr. Graham had properly retained it to recoup himself for a large number of small expenses and sums paid out of pocket by him in respect of a large number of bankruptcies which had been duly audited, on the ground that the account of the expenses in question had been submitted to and passed by one of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy. As to the sum of 1,663*l.*, the question was, whether Mr. Graham was or was not entitled to retain certain sums as remuneration for business done in respect of bankruptcies which came under the jurisdiction of the Court before the 11th of October, 1861, but had not been wound up till after that date. The Bankruptcy Act of 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, which came into operation on the 11th of October of that year, provided that official assignees should receive the annual salaries therein mentioned (section 31), and should, every six months, make a return of the amount of fees received by them during the preceding six months, and should not be entitled to any further remuneration in respect of any duties performed by them; such annual salaries being, however, exclusive of the cost of necessary clerks and reasonable office expenses.

Before the passing of this Act the official assignees had received their remuneration in the form of allowances or fees, to which they had become entitled under the Act of 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 44) and the General Order of the 19th of October, 1852, section 130, and which, with slight alteration (introduced by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119, s. 11, and Orders of February 3rd, 1855, and June 19th, 1856), had continued to be the method of remunerating them up to the passing of the Act in 1861.

Sir Roundell Palmer, A.G., Sargood, and H. B. Miller, at the relation of the Chief Registrar, contended that fees earned partly before and partly after the 11th of October, 1861, ought to be apportioned in respect of each particular bankruptcy, and that while fees earned before that date might be payable to Mr. Graham, the Act imperatively provided that the salary should be the only remuneration after that date.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., and Bayley, for Mr. Graham, contended that as to 950*l.*, part of the 1,600*l.*, that sum had been earned by Mr. Graham as official liquidator under the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding-up Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, ss. 88, 92), and as trustee under the trust deeds, which offices, they argued, were to be treated independently of his position as official assignee. As to the remainder of the sum, it was very inconvenient to apportion the fees earned upon bankruptcies which extended over the 11th of October, 1861, and it had been the practice that Mr. Graham should retain as remuneration eighty per cent. of the fees received by him in all such cases, and over the remaining twenty per cent. only. This arrangement had been sanctioned by one of the commissioners in passing the accounts.

The Attorney-General, in reply, contended that the duties of official liquidators were imposed upon the official assignees in virtue of their office as official assignees, and were part of the duties for which the salary was paid to them.

Dec. 9.—LORD CRANWORTH, C., said that Mr. Graham contended that he had a right to retain the remuneration allowed to an official assignee under the 44th section of the Act of 1849, under which "the Court might order and allow to be paid out of any bankrupt's estate to the official assignee, as a remuneration for his services, such sum as should, upon consideration of the amount of the bankrupt's property, and the nature of the duties performed by such official assignee, appear to be just and reasonable." Under that section a scale of fees was framed in 1852, which, with slight alterations, remained in force until 1861; but by the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 a material change was made. By the 31st section of that Act the mode of remuneration was altered entirely; but fees, which he (the Lord Chancellor) considered to be the same as remuneration, were still to be taken, though they were not to go to the official assignee himself. That section directed that each official assignee was to make a return half-yearly to the Chief Registrar of the amount of fees received by him during the past half-year; but, instead of receiving a remuneration depending on the state of the bankrupt's property, he was to get a fixed salary of 1,200*l.* if his duties were performed in London, and the section was express that the official assignees were not to be entitled to any further remuneration in respect of any duties performed by them. That Act received the royal assent late in 1861, and consequently a General Order was not passed till February, 1862, and the General Order directed that in April and October of each year the official assignee was to make a return to the Chief Registrar of the fees received by him, according to forms which were then provided; and in March a circular letter was sent to each official assignee, giving him the forms in which he was to make his return, and that he was to include therein all fees received since the 11th October, 1861, whether the duties were performed before or afterwards. Now Mr. Graham claimed that where the duties were performed before the 11th October, 1861, he had a right to retain the remuneration attached to them, and this claim he rested on the 230th section of the Act of 1861, wherein it was provided that the section of the Act of 1849, regulating the remuneration of official assignees was repealed, but that such repeal should not affect any right that had arisen in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done prior to the commencement of this Act under or by virtue of any part of an Act so repealed. It was, therefore, considered a fair mode of dealing with this matter that all sums earned before the passing of the Act should, notwithstanding the 31st section, which forbade any remuneration beyond the salary of the official assignee, be paid over to his own use. The next question arose as to sums earned partly before and partly after the passing of the Act. It was said that a fair apportionment ought to be made between the duties which were performed before and those after the 11th of October with respect to each particular bankruptcy, and that the sums earned after October should be paid in to the credit of the Court. He (the Lord Chancellor) did not at present go into the question whether it was right or not, but upon this basis it appeared that as a matter of fact Mr. Graham received, after the 11th of October, 1861, 227*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* in respect of matters which he had done previously to the passing of the Act, for bankruptcies entirely wound up, and which, on this basis, was to be considered his own money; and with respect to fees which had been earned partly before and partly after the passing of the Act, that he had earned before the 11th of October, 396*l.* These two sums together made up 724*l.*, and must be deducted from the entire amount which Mr. Graham was called upon to account for. But Mr. Harding stated in his affidavit that subsequently to the 11th October, 1865, Mr. Graham had received 2,950*l.*, so that there would remain to be accounted for 2,226*l.* Mr. Graham had paid into court 401*l.*, and there was a sum of 168*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, which, if it was to be accounted for at all, must come into another fund. The entire sum, therefore, at issue between the Attorney-General and Mr. Graham would be about 1,860*l.*, but Mr. Graham appeared to claim 950*l.* as earned by him in his capacity of official liquidator under the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding-up Act and under the trust deeds, and if this were so no blame could be attributed to Mr. Graham for claiming this 950*l.*, other than that he misconstrued these Acts of Parliament; but in his (the Lord Chancellor's) opinion there was a misconstruction of the Act, for he had come to the conclusion that the official assignee was to receive his salary in discharge of all the duties which were to be performed by him, no matter how those duties arose. If this 950*l.* was not made up in this way, Mr. Graham was very much to blame for not including these sums. But even supposing that this was earned from special duties, Mr. Graham would have no right to retain it. The next important question was, whether Mr. Graham was entitled to remunerate himself for duties partly performed before and partly since the Act of 1861, by retaining 80 per cent. of the entire fees paid in respect to those duties. Mr. Graham claimed this right because the Commissioner had approved of such a scale, and had allowed him to retain the amount actually earned with the exception of 20 per cent. He (the Lord Chancellor) was of opinion that the Commissioner was wrong in sanctioning the passing of accounts in which it appeared that Mr. Graham thus retained 80 per cent. If Mr. Graham had a sort of vested right in respect of the emoluments arising from bankruptcies which came under the jurisdiction of the Court before October, 1861, the Commissioner might, upon this supposition, have said—"You are now in a different position than before; the public provide you with clerks, and any part of your fees which before went for payment of clerks should now go to the public. This part I value at 20 per cent. of the entire." But this was a wrong principle. Mr. Graham was a public officer, who, before the 11th October, 1861, was entitled to be remunerated in a certain way; but for duties done after that date was to receive no remuneration other than his salary, and it was not in the power of the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy to prescribe any other mode of remuneration. Mr. Graham must, therefore, account for any fees received in this way. But it had been said that as Mr. Graham was acting on the authority of the Commissioner of the Court, that was supposed to justify him. Now if this was a question whether Mr. Graham has to pay the costs or not, that argument might be a very good one; or, if this was a question as between litigant parties brought before the Commissioner, the authority of the Commissioner might be quoted, but he did not see what right the Commissioner had to draw a different conclusion to that laid down by the Act of Parliament. So far with respect to the claim that was made against Mr. Graham with regard to the Chief Registrar's fund. But there was another demand made upon Mr. Graham—viz., for a sum of 578*l.* for the unclaimed dividend account. This was an account into which small sums which could not be credited to particular bankruptcies were paid. Mr. Graham had paid into court 96*l.* to the credit of this fund, and no blame could be attached to him in respect of that sum, as it arose from the sale of old books, which the proper officer at first refused to receive, on the ground that it could not be apportioned. There was thus 483*l.* to be accounted for. Mr. Graham stated that this amount was made up of two sums—one of 164*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, which had been received from 119 estates, and the other of 319*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*, which had been received from over 500 estates, and that the charges were as low as two shillings on account of the expenses out of pocket and other matters for which he was entitled to retain fees. It appeared, however, that only eighteen of these estates had been duly audited, and that the rest had been submitted to one of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy, and passed by him. He (the Lord Chancellor) did not feel justified, acting, as he was, for the public, to accept Mr. Graham's affidavit as conclusive on this point, and he would simply direct an inquiry whether this 483*l.* had been properly retained by Mr. Graham.

The Attorney-General said if it appeared that the registrar who had audited these accounts was a suitable person, perhaps any further inquiries would be unnecessary.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that would satisfy all purposes.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., said that an inquiry ought to be directed as to what portion of the fees should be retained by Mr. Graham.

The Attorney-General had no objection to this inquiry.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said an inquiry must also be directed to ascertain what amount of fees had been received by Mr. Graham as official liquidator for winding up joint-stock companies, and as trustee under trust deeds of 1849. He would reserve the question of costs until these inquiries had been made.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Nov. 24, Dec. 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 1865.

PEARSE v. DOBINSON.

14 W. R. 256; 13 L. T. 519.

Practice—Plea and answer—Amendment.

PRACTICE.—A bill is filed to set aside certain orders to carry out a compromise, on the ground of fraud, charged in the most general and sweeping manner against all parties concerned. To this bill pleas and answers are put in, denying the fraud generally by the pleas, and specifically by the answer, the plea containing a slip and some objectionable averments.

Held, that the plea must stand for an answer, with liberty to except, the plaintiff not being entitled to require the setting out of certain accounts.

This cause came on upon three pleas to a bill filed by the husband of an annuitant under the will of Henry Parker, to set aside two orders made upon petition, and dated in 1849 and 1852, on the ground of fraud. The bill was extremely voluminous, and contained allegations of a fraudulent nature in the most varied form against the plaintiff's former solicitor and the solicitors of the defendants, as well as against the defendants themselves; but this case was, in substance, this:—

Thomas John Parker was possessed of very large and then valuable estates in the island of Jamaica, yielding a rental of from 12,000*l.* to 15,000*l.* a year, which he encumbered to the amount of 40,000*l.*, both by way of mortgages for value as well as voluntary charges for the carrying out of certain family arrangements. Questions arose as to the priority of the different sets of incumbrances, and Henry Parker, one of the mortgagor's sons, being entitled to three-fourths of the 40,000*l.* beneficially, made his will, dated in 1825, whereby he gave the annuity in question, of 150*l.*, to his sister-in-law, the widow of his brother, and also provided for her children.

Messrs. Timperon & Dobinson were the agents and consignees of the estates in question, and were appointed such by the testator for his life and for twenty-one years after, and they had kept accounts and rendered them from time to time, the last being rendered in 1846, when a final settlement took place with the trustees of the testator's will, and 25,000*l.* was paid into court. Subsequently this sum was made the subject of the orders now sought to be set aside, which were orders made for the purpose of carrying into effect a compromise of a suit of Pearse v. Brooke, which had been commenced in 1835, and under which the money was to be divided between the parties to that arrangement (the plaintiff not being one). The 25,000*l.* had been paid in by the Commissioners of the Slave Compensation Court, and the estates themselves had lately been sold for 7,000*l.* This bill was now filed to set aside the orders for compromise on the ground of collusion and fraud by all parties concerned, as against the plaintiff, who alleged that he was quite ignorant of his rights, and that the agreement had been come to without his consent.

To this bill three pleas were put in, the pleas being to part only of the bill, and answers being filed as to the rest. The pleas set up the original orders, with averments denying the allegations of fraud; and that denial was supported with great distinctness in the answer.

Baily, Q.C., E. F. Smith, Q.C., J. H. Palmer, Q.C., Karlake, Maskelyne, Dickinson, and Surridge, appeared in support of the pleas.

It was contended that the allegations in the bill were so general that it was almost impossible to frame a plea to meet them, although the general effect was an imputation of the broadest and strongest kind, and hence a mistake in language had occurred, the word "or" being put for "nor," but the Court would allow that to be amended as a mere slip: Thompson v. Wild (5 Madd. 82), Jackson v. Rowe (4 Russ. 515; Smith's Chan. Prac. 1, 168), Mitford's Pleading, 4th edit. 303, 313.

Glasse, Q.C., and Roberts, for the plaintiff.

Dec. 11.—KINDERSLEY, V.C. (after referring to the circumstances at great length) said—There is great difficulty in dealing with these pleadings as they now stand. The question is, what is to be done with the pleas. There are cases in which the Court has allowed pleas to be amended when they stood alone, but I do not find any in which such amendment was allowed where they were coupled with an answer, or where the amendment is required to averments, or where the plea covered too much. At the period when Thompson v. Wild (supra) was decided, the Courts were beginning to entertain the view that it was very objectionable to allow the amendment of an answer, and the learned Vice-Chancellor who decided that case allowed amendments on the plea in averments, but when, on a future day, the case again came before him, he observed that henceforth he would never give leave to amend a plea when it was supported by an answer, even in the case where the leave to amend in the averments merely referred to a slip. That is not this case, because there are other objections to the averments, and if I allowed the pleas to be amended I should, in point of fact, be allowing an amendment of the answer, because the averments answer on oath, and the same objection applies as in the answer; and where the plea covers too much another answer would be required, and this creates another difficulty. If the plea and original answer were amended, a further answer would be necessary to make the plea comprehensible. If there were no answer no doubt there would be little objection to allowing to the defendants to plead anew by simply overruling the plea; but, there being an answer, the very form of the record creates a difficulty, and I should not give the defendants any relief by taking that course, the bill being so framed that it is almost impossible to meet it by plea and answer. But there is a mode, I think, of relieving the defendants as to the charges of fraud, and which, in the case of a plea and answer like this, would be most appropriate. I mean to order the plea to stand for an answer. That merely determines that it contains the defence or part of it, though not properly pleaded, and I think that that is so in the present case, and if it is ordered to stand for an answer it is allowed to be a sufficient one to so much of the bill as it covers, unless by the order liberty be given to except, which may be given so as to protect the defendants from any particular discovery which they should not be compellable to make, and the Court will do that as to further accounts.

I shall adopt that course; the only reason why the defendants desire to protect themselves, I suppose, is to avoid going into the accounts from 1796, which would be a great oppression. The plea, therefore, will stand for an answer with liberty to except, but so that the plaintiff shall not be entitled to require the defendants or any of them to set out the mortgagees' or consignees' accounts in respect of the estates or any of them, or any charges on the estates.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 21, 1865.

WATERS v. THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

14 W. R. 259; 13 L. T. 558; 12 Jur. N.S. 3.

Practice—Production of documents.

DISCOVERY.—Where the defendant, in a suit for account after the suit had been commenced, instituted criminal proceedings against the plaintiff, in respect of some of the items in question in the suit, and, before the hearing, moved for production by the plaintiff of some of the accounts.

Held, that, as the accounts sought were not material to the plaintiff for resisting the relief sought at the hearing, and as the Court had reason to suspect they might be used as evidence against the plaintiff in the criminal proceedings, the defendant was not entitled to their production before the hearing.

The Court will not ordinarily allow items of account to be read as evidence at the hearing.

It is desirable that, in cases like the present, criminal proceedings in respect of matters in question in a suit in chancery, should be deferred till the result of that suit is known.

The plaintiff in this suit had, from the year 1851 to the year 1863, acted as steward to the defendant, and as manager of his estates. In July, 1863, he left the defendant's service, and in August, 1864, the bill in this suit was filed for an account and for a declaration of the plaintiff's rights under certain drainage contracts.

On the 2nd of March, 1865, the defendant put in his answer to the plaintiff's bill.

On the 27th of March, 1865, the plaintiff was arrested on a warrant obtained by the defendant on a charge of embezzlement in respect of some of the items which would necessarily form matter of account in the suit. He was subsequently admitted to bail; and the indictment was, by order of the Court of Queen's Bench, removed from the Dorsetshire Assizes to the Central Criminal Court.

In April, 1865, the defendant obtained the usual order in the suit, that the plaintiff should make an affidavit of documents, and in June, 1865, the plaintiff filed his affidavit.

On the 30th of June, 1865, the defendant obtained an order for the production by the plaintiff of the documents mentioned in the first part of the schedule to his affidavit, and of those numbered 95 and 96 in the second part of such schedule.

On the 5th of August, 1865, the defendant obtained a summons for a short order on the plaintiff to produce the documents mentioned in the order of 30th June. This summons was from time to time adjourned by the chief clerk and by his Honour with the view of allowing the criminal proceedings to be disposed of.

On the 21st November, 1865, notice of motion for decree was given in the suit.

On the 22nd November, 1865, the criminal trial came on for hearing at the Central Criminal Court, but was, at the plaintiff's request, and with the defendant's consent, adjourned till April, 1866, to allow of the result of the Chancery proceedings being known.

On the 8th of December, 1865, the defendant's summons again came on before his Honour at chambers, and, by an order made on that day by his Honour, it was ordered that, notwithstanding the order of 30th June, the plaintiff should not be required to produce the documents numbered 93 and 95, till after the criminal proceedings had ended. The last-mentioned documents were statements of account between the plaintiff and the surveyors of the Land Drainage Company, who had contracted with the defendant for the drainage of his estates.

This was a motion to discharge the last-mentioned order.

Bacon, Q.C., and Snape for the motion.—The production of these documents should be of course. They are necessary to enable the defendant to prepare his defence in the suit.

Malins, Q.C., and Roupel, against it.—These documents are required by the plaintiff to prepare his defence in the criminal trial. The only reason the defendant can have for wishing for their production is to use them against the defendant in the criminal proceedings. The Court will not lend itself to this, especially as these proceedings were oppressive and were instituted after the suit in this court, in which the alleged embezzlement would have been discovered if it existed. Besides, the defendant did not want the documents to assist him in resisting a decree, as he had submitted to account.

STUART, V.C., said that the affidavit on which the present application was founded had been made in June last, and that what was now asked was that certain documents, the production of which the plaintiff had resisted, should, notwithstanding the reasons urged by the plaintiff, still be ordered to be produced. The cause had been set down for hearing, and the production of the documents in question could not be sought for the purpose of enabling the defendant to prepare his defence, as that defence was fully stated in his answer. They could not be sought for any legitimate purpose to be served at the hearing of the cause. It was well established that in suits for account the Court would not, ordinarily speaking, allow evidence as to items of account to be read at the hearing. That matter was well discussed in a case of Law v. Hunter (1 Russ. 100), and settled with the complete approbation of the profession. One part of the relief sought by the bill was a declaration that the plaintiff was under a certain contract, which was set out in the bill, entitled to a certain remuneration. That relief must depend on the terms of the contract, and not in any way on the accounts, the production of which was now sought. The other relief sought was a general account, and it was clear, as had been said before, that these documents could not be read as evidence on the question whether there should be an account or not.

It would be sufficient for the Court to refuse the motion on these grounds alone, but the fact must not be overlooked that after the plaintiff filed his bill for an account, the defendant thought fit to institute a criminal prosecution, the success of which must depend on the way in which the plaintiff's transactions appeared on taking the account. That might be a perfectly right proceeding on the part of the defendant; and the defendant said that he had so acted (as no doubt he had) with a view to the public interest. But the interest of the public should never be served at the expense of injustice to individuals, and still less by making use of the machinery of this Court to obtain, pending proceedings in the court to which a criminal prosecution related (and a prosecution, too, begun after the suit was instituted), the production of documents about the right to the production of which a doubt existed. In such a case the Court had good reason to suspect that the application was made in order to get some means of supporting the prosecution.

It appeared that the prosecution had been postponed. And it was time enough to go on with the prosecution after it should be seen on the result of the account taken in this court, whether the plaintiff had embezzled money or not. The counsel for the defendant had insisted that the use to be made in the prosecution of the documents sought to be produced did not concern the Court. He, the Vice-Chancellor, could not adopt that view. He thought that, looking at the defendant's own statements, he had sufficiently vindicated all that he owed to the public, and that each of the parties should proceed in a fair way before this Court with the accounts. The defendant must pay the costs of the motion.

Injunction—Restraining proceedings in foreign court.

INJUNCTION. INTERNATIONAL LAW.—Where a decree had been made by the Court for the administration of the estate of a domiciled Englishman, who has died possessed of both real and personal estate in a foreign country, and proceedings have been commenced in the courts of that country, with a view to the distribution thereof of such real and personal estate, the Court will grant an injunction restraining such proceedings, and any other proceedings affecting the testator's personal estate, notwithstanding the testator's will contains a clause disclaiming an intention to interfere with the operation of foreign law over foreign property.

This was a motion in the above suit, which was supplemental to a former suit of Hope v. Beresford Hope, instituted for the administration of the estate of Adrian John Hope.

The testator, by his will dated the 29th August, 1862, gave all his residuary real and personal estate, whether in England, Holland, or elsewhere (but as to his foreign property only so far as he had power to dispose of the same by the laws of the country in which the same were situate, and, as not intending by his will to interfere with the operation of such law, or as preventing any of his children taking benefits under his will, from also taking under such law, or as depriving them of any benefit under his will by reason of their so taking) to trustees upon trust, subject to two legacies of 10,000*l.* each to the defendants Emily Hope and Henrietta Hope, for the plaintiff on his attaining twenty-one, with a contingent gift over in the event of plaintiff dying under twenty-one, for the defendants Emily Hope and Henrietta Hope.

The testator died in December, 1863, and in October, 1864, the suit of Hope v. Beresford Hope was instituted against his executors; and by a decree made in that suit on the 5th November, 1864, the usual accounts of the testator's estate were directed.

The bulk of the testator's property consisted of various stocks and securities of the Government of the Netherlands, and other personal estate in that country. The testator had also a landed estate in Holland called Bosbeck, the value of which was disputed.

After the date of the decree in Hope v. Beresford Hope, the defendant, Emily Hope, raised a contention that the testator died domiciled in the Netherlands, and on the 9th of May, 1865, she commenced proceedings there, with a view to have the testator's real and personal estate in Holland administered by the Courts of that country, as on an intestacy, and served a notice on the agent of the testator in Amsterdam, not to hand over any of his personal estate to his executors.

The suit of Hope v. Carnegie was then instituted in June, 1865, for the purpose, amongst other things, of obtaining a declaration that the testator's domicile was English, and of restraining the proceedings in Holland. Considerable delay was occasioned by the difficulties thrown by the defendants in the way of service of the bill being effected on them, and at last an order for substituted service had to be obtained.

The bill alleged that by the law of the Netherlands a testator, subject to that law, dying possessed of real or immovable property in that country, forming less than one-fourth of his whole estate, wherever situate, might dispose of such property by will, at his discretion. And it prayed for an injunction restraining the defendant from intermeddling with any part of the testator's estate, whether in Great Britain, Holland, or any other country.

Malins, Q.C., and Hemming, for the motion.—The evidence is clear that the testator's domicile was English, and it follows that the clause in the will relating to the testator's foreign property must be construed according to English law, and that his personal property must be distributed by the English Court. The proceedings commenced in Holland affect both the real and personal estate there, and must be restrained.

Bacon, Q.C., and Swanston, for the defendant Emily Hope.—The insertion by the testator of the clause relating to his foreign property showed that he intended it to be dealt with by the foreign court, and it would be harsh of this Court to restrain Miss Hope, who was not even a British subject, suing for it in that court. The real property in the Netherlands was subject to the jurisdiction of the courts there, and Miss Hope had at all events a right to sue in respect of it. [STUART, V.C.—If the affidavit of Miss Hope had stated that the proceedings in Holland only sought to affect the real estate there the case would be different.] At any rate Miss Hope should not be put to fresh expense by having to commence her proceedings afresh as to the real estate, which would be the case if her present proceedings were restrained.

STUART, V.C., said that this was a case of the will of a domiciled Englishman, the trusts of which had been decreed by this Court to be executed. It appeared that there was a remarkable clause in the will relating to the disposition of the testator's foreign property. The construction of that clause must clearly be determined in this court according to the principles of English law. It further appeared that the testator was, at the time of his death, entitled both to real and personal estate in Holland. Now, it was settled law that personal property in a foreign country was subject to the law of the country in which the testator was domiciled, and that real property was governed by the lex loci rei sitæ. The evidence showed that Miss Hope was suing in a foreign court both as to the real and personal property. That was a proceeding this Court could not allow. Any further proceedings she might be advised to take as to the real estate alone were not at present in question, and no order would be made restraining such proceedings. There must be an injunction to restrain the defendant Miss Hope from continuing the proceedings in Holland, mentioned in the affidavit of Mr. Beresford Hope, or instituting any other proceedings in Holland or elsewhere in regard to the personal or moveable property of the testator, or otherwise intermeddling with such personal or moveable property.

BATSON v. ROWLANDS.

14 W. R. 261; 13 L. T. 663.

Will—Construction—Gift to children in remainder.

WILL.—A gift of a sum on death of a tenant for life, to the children of A. B.:—Held to include only children of A. B. born at the death of tenant for life, notwithstanding that the gift was made by reference to another and independent gift, which included all children of A. B.

Thomas Batson, the testator in this cause, died in March, 1820, leaving a will which contained the following gifts:—The testator bequeathed 2,500*l.* in trust for his nephew, James Batson, and his (the nephew's) wife, successively for life, with remainder upon trust to pay and divide the said principal sum of 2,500*l.* unto and equally amongst the children of his said nephew, to be paid at the age of twenty-one, with a gift over to the survivors or survivor in case of any child dying under twenty-one. The testator also bequeathed 1,000*l.* in trust for James Johnson for life, and after his decease (in the events which happened), he bequeathed the capital in the following words:—"It is my will that such last-mentioned sum of 1,000*l.*, together with the dividends and annual produce thereof (if any), be paid and applied to and for the use of the child or children of my said nephew, James Batson, at such time or times, and in such manner in every respect, as far as circumstances will admit, as I have hereinbefore directed with respect to the sum of 2,500*l.*

James Johnson being dead, the bill sought a declaration that on his death the investments representing the legacy of 1,000*l.* became divisible between all the children of James Batson, who were born during the life of James Johnson, and that their shares were payable to them respectively on their attaining the age of twenty-one.

Malins, Q.C., and W. W. Cooper, for the plaintiff.

Archibald Smith, for the executors, submitted to the Court that, although the ordinary rule under such circumstances was to confine the gift to the children living at the death of the tenant for life, yet here, since the gift was made only by reference to a previous gift which, beyond all question, included all children of James Batson, the second gift should likewise include any children born after the death of the tenant for life. They cited Iredell v. Iredell (25 Beav. 485).

Martineau, Woodroffe, Brooksbank, and Beetham, for other parties.

STUART, V.C., was of opinion that notwithstanding the reference to the preceding gift, which included all James Batson's children, the ordinary rule of construction must be held to apply, and that the children who were born at the death of the tenant for life were entitled amongst them to the 1,000*l.* on their respectively attaining twenty-one years.

DAY v. DAY.

14 W. R. 261; 13 L. T. 625.

Mortgage debt—Locke King's Act—Primary fund for payment of.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where A. conveyed estate (No. 1) to B. on B.'s covenanting to pay off mortgage debt due from A. on estate (No. 2):—Held, as between real and personal representatives of B., that the personal estate was primarily liable to the mortgage debt.

This suit was instituted for administering the estate of Francis Day, who died in July, 1863, intestate, leaving two infant children (one of whom was his heir at law), and his widow, his next of kin.

The only question of importance which was raised, had reference to the fund out of which a certain mortgage debt due from the intestate was primarily payable. The material circumstances were as follows:—The father of the intestate was seised of certain real estates, and he, in pursuance of an arrangement entered into between himself and his son, conveyed to the latter estate (A.), in consideration of the intestate covenanting to pay off all incumbrances upon the same, and also to pay to the mortgagees of another estate of the father (estate B.) the sum of 10,000*l.* charged upon the last-mentioned estate.

Malins, Q.C., and Everitt, for the infant plaintiff, the heir-at-law, argued that the sum of 10,000*l.*, which the intestate had entered into a personal covenant to pay, was primarily payable out of his personal estate. They cited Hood v. Hood (5 W. R. 755, 3 Jur. N.S. 684).

Greene, Q.C., and E. K. Karlake, for the defendant, the widow, contended that the 10,000*l.* ought to be considered as charged primarily upon estate (A.). The conveyance of that estate to the intestate was part of a family arrangement, and, under the circumstances, it would be unfair to throw this sum on the personal estate in exoneration of the realty. They cited Elliot v. Edwards (3 Bos. & Pul. 181), and Barnwell v. Iremonger (9 W. R. 88, 1 Dr. & Sm. 255).

STUART, V.C., considered the case of Barnwell v. Iremonger inapplicable to the present case. The fact of the conveyance being part of a family arrangement was, in his Honour's opinion, immaterial. The case was simply one of a real representative getting an estate which was yet to be paid for, and in such a case the purchase-money is primarily payable out of the personal estate of the ancestor.

DE VRIES v. CORNER.

14 W. R. 262; 13 L. T. 636.

Shipowners' association—Salary of secretary—Liability of members for—Agreement—Construction of.

COMPANY.—The plaintiff was the secretary of a shipowners' association, which was unincorporated, and was managed by a committee, which might be chosen from persons who were not members of the association. The rules provided that a certain entrance fee and annual subscription should be paid for each vessel; and that, if the funds of the association were not sufficient to meet its liabilities, the committee might make calls after 100 vessels had been entered. The plaintiff was appointed secretary by an agreement, under which he was to have a salary and commission; it contained a clause whereby he exonerated the managing committee from liability for his salary, &c., holding the association, subject to the rules and regulations, alone responsible. The association was dissolved. 100 vessels were never entered. In an action brought against a member of the association for salary, commission, and disbursements:—Held, that the plaintiff could not recover, as on the true construction of the agreement, he had agreed to look for payment to the funds of the association, and not to the individual members.

This case was tried in the Mayor's Court of London, before the Recorder.

The plaintiff was the secretary of the International Shipowners' Protection Association, and the defendant was a member of the association, and also a member of the managing committee. The plaintiff sued him as a member of the association for 95*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, for salary and commission, and disbursements for the association. The association was composed of shipowners and other mercantile men, and its object was to insure to its members a cheap and speedy mode of protecting their interests in prosecuting and defending claims arising out of maritime contracts or casualties. The association was not registered and not incorporated; it consisted of more than twenty members. The association was formed on August 15th, 1864, and an agreement was entered into on behalf of the association on that day with the plaintiff, by Preston, who was the solicitor for the association, that the plaintiff should be their secretary, at 150*l.* per annum, and twenty per cent. per annum on the moneys thereafter received by the association from the different members for entrance fees, and ten per cent. on renewals. The agreement contained this clause:—The plaintiff "exonerates and indemnifies the present or future managing committee of the said association from all liability in respect of the salary and appointments of the said plaintiff as secretary as aforesaid, holding the said association, subject to the said rules and regulations, alone responsible for such salary and appointments."

The first meeting of the association was held on August 17th, 1864, when the rules were passed, the material ones of which were—

Rule 5.—An entrance fee of 2*l.* 2*s.* shall be paid on the entry of every steamship, and for every sailing-vessel a fee of 1*l.* 1*s.* Also an annual subscription for every steamship of 3*l.* 3*s.*; for every sailing-vessel exceeding 200 tons, 2*l.* 2*s.*; exceeding 100 tons and not exceeding 200 tons, 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*; and not exceeding 100 tons, 1*l.* 1*s.* Such subscription to be paid at the time of entry for the first year ending December 31st, and for each succeeding year on or before January 1st.

By rule 6 the business was to be managed by a committee, who were appointed by rule 8.

Rule 9.—That the plaintiff shall be the first secretary of the association, upon the terms contained in the memorandum of appointment entered into between him and the solicitor on behalf of the association, dated August 15th, 1864, &c.

Rule 15.—In case of recovery of any sum of money for freight, demurrage, &c., or damages for collision, or otherwise, by or through the association; or where the same has been applied for by the solicitor, at the request of the member, the member shall pay to the secretary a compensation or commission, at the rate of ten per cent. on amounts not exceeding 50*l.*; and for amounts exceeding 50*l.* and not exceeding 200*l.*, at the rate of five per cent.; and on amounts exceeding 200*l.* and not exceeding 500*l.*, at the rate of two and a-half per cent. after the first 200*l.*, and one per cent. additional on the residue beyond 500*l.* The secretary or solicitor shall hold all sums recovered by him for such member until such commission is paid, or shall deduct the same from the amount recovered.

Rule 30.—In the event of the funds of the association not being sufficient to meet its liabilities, the committee shall have power to make calls upon the members of the association of such sum as they shall consider necessary to meet such deficiency, &c.; but no call shall be made until at least 100 vessels shall have been entered in the association.

The committee might be chosen from persons who were not members of the association. The association was to be incorporated.

There was no dispute as to the amount due to the plaintiff.

On June, 15th, 1865, the plaintiff wrote to Preston, resigning the secretaryship at three months' notice, as required by the agreement appointing him. The association was dissolved on August 21, 1865. 100 vessels were never entered.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant. Leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to set this verdict aside, and for a new trial, on the ground that on the proper construction of the agreement appointing the plaintiff, the defendant, as a member of the association, was not personally exonerated from liability. Another ground was also reserved, which is immaterial.

Philbrick, in this term, obtained a rule accordingly.

H. James now shewed cause, and contended that the plaintiff agreed to look to the funds of the association so far as they would go, and not to the individual members, for "association" in the indemnity clause meant the "funds of the association;" and he undertakes to hold the association, subject to the rules and regulations, alone responsible. Rule 30 must therefore be incorporated into the agreement. [BYLES, J., referred to Furnivall v. Coombes (5 M. & G. 736.)] [H. James was then stopped by the Court.]

Philbrick, in support of the rule, contended that the defendant was liable as a member of the association, and that the question turned on rule 5; and that, if the contentions on the other side were right, the plaintiffs might go on serving the association for years without any remedy unless 100 vessels were entered on the books; and that there was nothing in the rules to limit the common law liability of the members; and that the "association" in the indemnity clause meant the members of the association, and not the funds of it; and that the association not being incorporated, there was nobody which could be sued in a corporate capacity.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The action was brought by the plaintiff on a contract alleged to have been made with the plaintiff by the defendant through his agent. The plaintiff proposed the association, which was to insure the members a cheap mode of protecting their interests in prosecuting and defending claims arising under maritime contracts and casualties. The funds were to be made up by entrance fees and by annual subscriptions. The commission on the amounts recovered was to be 10 per cent. on amounts not exceeding 50*l.*, and at a smaller percentage for larger amounts. An arrangement was made that, if 100 ships were borne on the books of the association, the committee should have power to make calls. The contract is perfectly clear, and the secretary, on the face of the contract, is to have great profit, for, if the concern be carried on he is to have 150*l.* a year, and 20 per cent. on the entrance fees, and 10 per cent. on renewals. It is apparent, on the face of the contract, that the plaintiff intended to look to the association and the funds of it for what he was to be paid. Many ventures are entered into now, in which the prosperity of the association is contemplated, and the idea of its not being prosperous never is entertained. In this case Preston, on behalf of the association, made the contract with the plaintiff to give him 150*l.* a year and a certain percentage, and he agrees to hold the association, subject to the rules and regulations, alone responsible for his salary and appointments; and in that contract it appears that the members of the committee are not to be liable to be called upon individually for his salary or appointments. It is no use to exempt the members of the committee from liability if they are to be liable as members of the association. The rules shew what the funds of the association are. It seems to me, therefore, that on the true construction of this contract the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff in this case sues for salary as the secretary of a club on a contract made with the committee of the club, but on considering the provisions of the agreement and rule 30, I think that the plaintiff cannot recover. If I had not arrived at this conclusion, it might have been necessary to consider whether this association were such a club as the club in the case of Fleming v. Hector (2 M. & W. 172), in which an action was brought by a tradesman against a member of the club for goods supplied to the club, and it was held that, though the committee had power to contract for goods while they had funds in hand, yet they had no authority to pledge the personal credit of the members: or such a club as that in the case of Cockerell v. Aucompte (26 L. J. C.P. 194; 2 C. B. N.S. 440; 5 W. R. 633), in which it was held that the members of a coal club were liable to a coal merchant for coals, which were ordered by the secretary of the club, he being authorized to order them. It is unnecessary here to consider whether this club comes under the class of clubs in the first case, or under that in the second, because the plaintiff has agreed by the contract that his salary is to be paid, not by the members of the association, each member being liable to pay the whole amount, but according to the rules the club is to be incorporated, and by rule 30, if there be funds, the debts of the association are to be paid out of the funds, and it is only in the event of the funds failing that the members are to be called upon in proportion to their shares.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with what has fallen from my lord and my brother Willes, and I only wish to add that the present plaintiff, having notice of the rules and regulations of the association, is not in the same position as a stranger would be.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that there is no other rule to which this part of the agreement could refer but rule 30.

Rule discharged.

BACKHOUSE v. PADDON.

14 W. R. 273; 13 L. T. 625.

Partition suit—Inquiry as to title between co-defendants—Right to.

PARTITION.—In a partition suit a defendant is not entitled of right to an inquiry as to title as against a co-defendant, such inquiry not being asked for by the plaintiff.

This was a suit for partition of certain real estates at Ilfracombe, of which Elizabeth Vye, who died intestate, in April, 1863, was seised at the time of her death.

The title of the plaintiff to one undivided moiety of the estates was admitted. The other moiety was claimed by one of the defendants, John Birch Paddon, in coparcenary with the plaintiff, but his title was disputed by the other defendants in the suit, who alleged that his (J. B. Paddon's) mother was illegitimate, and who, in the event of such contention proving true, were entitled to the second moiety. The bill prayed partition in the usual form; and that, if necessary, an issue might be directed between the defendant, J. B. Paddon, and the other defendants, to try whether his mother was legitimate. John Birch Paddon, in his answer, stated that a mistake had been made in the entry of his mother's baptism, at a church in Liverpool, where she was baptized, which had given rise to the question of her legitimacy, and he submitted that such entry was not evidence of the date of her birth. The other defendants, in their answer, simply denied the fact of the legitimacy, and they advanced no evidence to support the contention, although some of them made affidavits on the subject as witnesses for the plaintiff.

Malins, Q.C., and W. W. Karlake, for the plaintiff.

Bacon, Q.C., and Everitt, for the defendant John Birch Paddon.

Greene, Q.C., and Westlake, for the other defendants, asked for an inquiry as to the legitimacy of John Birch Paddon's mother. They contended that the defendants were entitled, as of right, to such an inquiry, although they had adduced no evidence on the subject.

Malins, Q.C., for the plaintiff, stated that he asked for no inquiry.

STUART, V.C., said that the inquiry sought, by some of the defendants, as against a co-defendant, was not a matter of right. The plaintiff did not require any such inquiry, and his Honour would not direct it. No suggestion had been made that further material evidence existed upon the question. The defendants who sought the inquiry should have adduced what evidence they had in their power at the hearing, if they wished to impugn the legitimacy of the co-defendant's mother in the present suit. His Honour was satisfied that Mrs. Paddon was legitimate on the evidence before him, and stated that he would make a decree which should give the plaintiff all that he asked, and it would not be necessary to insert any reservation of a right to dispute the legitimacy as between the defendants.

The following order was accordingly made:—Declare that the plaintiff declining any issue or inquiry as to the legitimacy of the mother of the defendant, J. B. Paddon, his Honour is of opinion, on the evidence before the Court, that J. B. Paddon's mother was legitimate. Decree partition between plaintiff and J. B. Paddon. Mutual conveyances between them to be executed. Dismiss the bill without costs as against the other defendants.

Equity to a settlement—Scotch domicil.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—Where a fund is standing in a cause to the credit of a married woman whose domicil is Scotch, the Court will not, on petition, order it to be transferred to her husband, but will order a commission to take the consent of the wife. The practice of the Court is not affected by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 86.

This was a petition by Mr. and Mrs. Boase for transfer to Mr. Boase of a sum of 540*l.* Bank Annuities, standing in the above cause to the account of Mrs. Boase.

The petitioners' domicil was Scotch.

Bevir, for the petitioners, quoted the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 86, s. 16 (Conjugal Rights [Scotland] Amendment Act), and said that no claim on the part of the wife had been made.

STUART, V.C., said that the wife's right to an equity to a settlement attached to her as a suitor of the court, apart from any question of domicil. The recent Act only confirmed what was the invariable practice of the Court. There must be the common order for a commission to take the consent of Mrs. Boase to the transfer.

Re THE MINERA MINING COMPANY (LIMITED).

Joint-stock company—Companies' Act, 1862, s. 35—Register of shareholders—Rectification.

COMPANY.—B., on account of some shares which he held in a defunct company, was entitled to an allotment of shares in a new company, formed to take over the business of the defunct company. An allotment of shares was accordingly made to him, upon condition that he paid one shilling per share on the shares so allotted. He never made the payment, and the directors of the company forfeited his shares. Before this was done, B. became a bankrupt. He gave up the certificates of his old shares to the assignee, and was then told that they were worthless, but he did not inform the assignee of his right to have shares in the new company. After B. had obtained his order of discharge, the directors again made him an allotment of shares in the new company, one of the directors paying the one shilling per share for B. out of his own pocket. More than two years afterwards, the new company having become a flourishing concern, the assignee transferred these shares for value to R. The shares being registered in B.'s name, and the certificates being in his possession, the company refused to register the transfer. On motion by R. to compel them to do so, the assignee making no complaint of what had been done:—Held, that the company was justified in its refusal. The motion was refused with costs.

This was a motion made under the provisions of section 35 of the Companies' Act, 1862, that the register of members of the above company might be rectified by entering the name of T. W. Rymer on the said register in respect of 115 shares in the said company, which had been allotted and belonged to William Bott in respect of his estate and interest in a mine called the Minera Union Lead Mine at the time of his bankruptcy on the 19th November, 1861, or, at all events, in respect of twenty-five shares standing registered in the books of the said company in the name of Bott, and that Rymer might be at liberty to inspect the books of the company, and for other consequential relief.

It appeared from the evidence that the Minera Union Mining Company (Limited) took over the business of an old mining company in which Bott had some interest, and that negotiations for this purpose were going on in October, 1861. A meeting of the shareholders in the old company was held on the 17th October, 1861, for the purpose of seeing how many of them would join the new company.

At this meeting it was arranged to allot shares in the new company to the shareholders in the old company in proportion to their existing interests therein, but that if any of the old shareholders should decline to take shares in the new company, or should neglect to pay one shilling per share thereon, the shares so allotted to them should be considered as shares to be re-allotted at the discretion of the directors. Bott was not present at this meeting, but 115 shares were so allotted to him. A letter was, however, written to him by the secretary, calling upon him to pay the one shilling per share on the 115 shares. Bott never made this payment, or replied to the letter. In December notice was again sent to Bott to remit the amount of the call within ten days, and that in default of his doing so the directors would consider he declined to take the shares, but he in no way replied to this communication. On the 19th November, 1861, Bott had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and a Mr. Kinnear was appointed his official assignee, but no creditors' assignee was ever appointed. At a meeting of the directors of the new company on the 3rd January, 1862, they were informed of Bott's bankruptcy, and it was then resolved by them as follows:—"That as Mr. Bott has not responded to the call of the company, and has been adjudicated a bankrupt, resolved, that the 115 shares allotted to him be forfeited shares, and be the property of the company, to be distributed as the directors shall hereafter arrange." Bott did not enter in his balance sheet, filed in the bankruptcy any shares in either the old or the new company, but according to his evidence it appeared that he gave up the certificates of his shares in the old company at the assignee's office, on the 2nd January, 1862, when he completed his balance sheet, but the clerk at the office, who assisted him with his accounts, told him not to enter them as they were valueless. Bott left the certificates there, and never saw them again. On the 15th January, 1862, he obtained his order of discharge.

On the 30th January, 1862, Bott attended at a meeting of the directors of the new company and asked that he might be permitted to have the shares which had been proposed to be allotted to him. The chairman said he would guarantee the payment of all calls, and on the strength of this the directors resolved that the 115 shares should be re-allotted to Bott. The chairman paid the one shilling per share out of his own pocket. The new company was not registered till 15th September, 1862. The shares ultimately became of some value; and on the 1st April, 1865, Kinnear, the official assignee, executed a transfer of the 115 shares to Rymer for valuable consideration. This transfer was not in the statutory form, and, in particular, it did not state the numbers of the shares to be transferred. It purported to be a transfer to Rymer of all Kinnear's interest in all and every the shares and interest of Bott in the company, which were, by virtue of such bankruptcy, vested in Kinnear as such assignee as aforesaid.

When Rymer tendered this transfer for registration at the company's office, they refused to register it. It then appeared that Bott had already transferred ninety of the 115 shares to purchasers for value, in whose names they were registered. The company, however, offered to register Rymer in respect of twenty-five shares if he would produce a proper transfer and the certificates of the shares. This he could not do.

Druce now moved that Rymer's name might be entered on the register in respect of the twenty-five shares. It is clear from the resolution of the directors of the 3rd January, 1862, that an allotment of 115 shares had actually been then made to Bott. As no notice was ever sent to the official assignee, the directors' resolution to forfeit those shares was an utter nullity. The allotment to Bott was in respect of his shares in the old company, and it was made prior to his order of discharge. Therefore the new shares vested in Kinnear. The fact that the certificates are not produced by Rymer is no valid objection to his registration, because Bott has not given them up. Nor is there any weight in the fact that the transfer is not in the statutory form; for Kinnear is not the registered owner, and therefore any form of assignment by him is enough to entitle his assignee to call on Bott to do what is necessary to perfect his title: Re Bank of Hindustan (13 W. R. 883; 34 L. J. Ch. 609). When Bott gave up the certificates of his old shares, he ought to have stated his title to an allotment of shares in the new company.

Rolt, Q.C., and Mounsey, for the company, and Amphlett, Q.C. and Brooksbank, for Bott, were not called on.

It did not clearly appear whether the assignee had been served with notice of the motion, but it was agreed to treat the matter as if he had been served.

Wood, V.C., said that this was not a case in which the assignee came here to complain of any wrong done by the bankrupt. The bankrupt appeared to have been entitled to some shares in a defunct company, and this seemed to have given him a right to some interest in the new company, and might have given him an equity to enforce that right. And so the directors of the new company seemed to have thought before the bankruptcy. So far this was in favour of Mr. Druce's argument that Bott ought to have informed his assignee of his interest. But what really happened was this: he did hand over the certificates of his old shares at the assignee's office. Then the new company came to a resolution to offer shares to the shareholders in the old company, upon a payment of one shilling per share. Upon the offer being made to Bott, he took no steps to comply with the conditions; and upon the 3rd January the resolution to forfeit the shares offered to him was passed. Up to this time no shares had ever been really allotted to him. The company was not even registered till September, 1862. Then on the 30th January, 1862, after Bott had obtained his order of discharge, some friends paid the one shilling per share for him; and the shares in question were allotted to him. If these were recent transactions and the assignee were here complaining of what Bott had done, it might possibly be a question whether Bott could retain the shares, he not having disclosed to the assignee his right to some interest in the new company. But in the actual state of circumstances it appeared that two years afterwards Rymer took what was really a conveyance of such title to the shares as the assignee had, accompanied by a full indemnity to the assignee. The case in its inception would have been doubtful, even if Kinnear had been here to complain. But no fraud was alleged against Bott, and in fact no steps had been taken in the matter until the shares became valuable. The Court could not exercise this special jurisdiction in any other way than it could exercise its jurisdiction to enforce specific performance of a contract. This application must be refused with costs.

STATUTE.—By the Islington Parish Act, 1857, it is forbidden to conduct or drive cattle upon any street, road, or pathway within the parish of Islington between the hours of twelve on Saturday night and twelve on Sunday night:—Held, that the words "conduct or drive" did not apply to the conveyance of cattle in a van.

This was a case stated on a complaint by the respondent against the appellant for conducting or driving cattle upon certain roads within the parish of Islington between the hours of twelve o'clock on Saturday night and twelve o'clock on Sunday night, contrary to the provisions of the Islington Parish Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. xxi.).

By the 3rd section of that Act it is enacted "that it shall not be lawful for any drover or other person to conduct or drive in, upon, or through any of the roads, lanes, streets, squares, or other places, or on or over any of the footpaths which now are, or hereafter may be, within the parish of Islington, any oxen, sheep, swine, or other cattle between the hours of twelve of the clock on any and every Saturday night throughout the year, and twelve of the clock on any and every Sunday night throughout the year;" and the section imposes a penalty upon a drover or other person who shall be guilty of such offence.

It was proved that the appellant was driving horses which were drawing a van containing cattle. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that this was not a conducting or driving within the statute. The magistrate convicted the appellant, subject to the opinion of the Court on the above case.

Underdown was heard in support of the conviction.

Besley, for the appellant, was not called on.

The COURT¹ being of opinion that the facts proved did not constitute a "conducting or driving" within the meaning of the statute.

Conviction quashed.

WINTER v. DUMERGUE.

14 W. R. 281; 12 Jur. N.S. 56: affirmed, [1866] E. R. A.; 14 W. R. 699;
12 Jur. N.S. 726 (Ex. Ch.).

Vendor and purchaser—Lease—Assignment of, subject to consent of lessor—Failure to obtain consent—Rescission of contract.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—H., being lessee of certain premises, under covenant not to assign without the written consent of the lessor, became bankrupt, and his term was sold by order of the Court of Bankruptcy, and assigned to the defendant. The defendant agreed to sell the residue of the term to the plaintiff, subject to the covenants in the original lease, and 750*l.*, part of the purchase-money, was to be paid before the completion of the purchase. If the defendant was unable to obtain the lessor's consent to the assignment, she was to be at liberty to rescind the contract, and was thereupon to return the 750*l.* The plaintiff paid the 750*l.*, but the lessor refused to grant the defendant license to assign, though he offered the plaintiff a fresh lease for the same term and at the same rent, but containing fresh covenants. The defendant assisted the plaintiff in his endeavours to obtain a new lease:—Held, that the defendant had recognised her duty to obtain the lessor's license to assign to the plaintiff, and that, as she had not done so, the plaintiff had a right to rescind the contract and claim back the deposit he had paid; for as both parties had negotiated for the new lease and failed, they were remitted to their original rights.

This was an action to recover 750*l.* for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff, and the defendant pleaded the general issue. At the trial before Erle, C.J., at the London sittings after last Hilary Term, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, subject to a case for the opinion of the Court.

The case stated the following facts:—

In the summer of 1863 the plaintiff was engaged in the formation of a joint-stock company, which had for its object, inter alia, the provision of a central cooking depôt for the working classes, and the establishment of promenade concerts for their recreation; and with a view to carrying out the company's plans he was anxious to obtain a lease of some large buildings in a central situation. The fee-simple of St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, was in the Warden and Commonalty of the Mystery of Mercers, who, in 1852, leased it to John Hullah for sixty-four years at a yearly rent of 100*l.*, and he covenanted that he, his executors, administrators, and assigns, would not, except by will, assign or underlet the premises, or any part thereof, without the written consent of the lessors, and would not use the demised premises for any other purpose than as a music hall, or for public meetings of a religious and loyal character, or for meetings for the discussion of subjects of science and literature, or for the exhibition or sale of works of art.

On the bankruptcy of Hullah in 1860 the defendant purchased, and, in July, 1861, became assignee of Hullah's term, which had been sold by order of the Court of Bankruptcy.

By articles of agreement, dated October 23, 1863, the plaintiff agreed to purchase St. Martin's Hall from the defendant for the residue of the term of sixty-four years from September 29, 1852, subject to the rent of 100*l.* reserved in the lease by the Mercers' Company to Hullah, and "subject to the covenants and conditions therein contained, at the price of 15,000*l.*, to be paid by the purchaser in manner following, that is to say, 500*l.*, part thereof, to be paid to the vendor, on the execution of these presents, 250*l.*, further part thereof, on the 1st of December next, and 14,250*l.*, residue of the purchase-money, on the 1st of February, 1864. The vendor shall, provided the said sum of 250*l.* shall be paid on the said 1st day of December aforesaid, on or before the 15th day of December aforesaid, deliver to the solicitor of the purchaser an abstract of her title to the premises, commencing with the said lease under which the vendor holds." The purchaser was not to object to the title of the lessors, and the vendor and other necessary parties were to execute a proper assurance of the premises on payment of the 14,250*l.* on the 1st of February, 1864. If the purchaser insisted on an objection which the vendor could not remove, "or if the vendor shall be unable to procure the lessors' consent to the assignment to the purchaser, the vendor may, by notice in writing, to be given to the purchaser or his solicitor, at any time, and notwithstanding any negotiation or litigation in respect of any such objection or requisition as aforesaid, rescind this contract, and shall thereupon return to the purchaser the sum of 500*l.*, paid by him on the execution of these presents, and the said sum of 250*l.* if paid by him as hereinbefore stipulated." If the purchaser should fail to pay the 250*l.* on the 1st of December, and the residue of the purchase-money as aforesaid, and otherwise to complete his purchase, according to the several conditions, on the 1st of February, 1864, then the 500*l.*, and the 250*l.*, if paid, were to be forfeited to the vendor, and the contract to be absolutely void.

The two deposits of 500*l.* and 250*l.* were duly paid by the plaintiff, who made no objection to the defendant's title. By a subsequent agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the time for the completion of the purchase was extended to the 15th of February, and it was to be still further extended from time to time, if, by reason of any delay on the part of the Mercers' Company, the license to assign the lease was not obtained in time for the purchase to be completed at that date. After protracted negotiations the Mercers' Company finally, on the 11th of March, refused their license to assign Mrs. Dumergue's lease to the plaintiff, but were willing, "upon Mrs. Dumergue's surrendering the present lease, to grant a new lease to Mr. Winter for the residue of the term of the present lease at the existing rent. Such new lease to contain all the covenants of the present lease, and in addition further covenants" forbidding the use of any part of the premises for dancing, or as a public-house, &c., but permitting the conversion of the lower part of the building into a cooking depôt to the satisfaction of the company's surveyor. Thereupon the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that he objected to become the covenantor of a new lease, when he had only contracted for the assignment of the old lease, and that, under the circumstances, he should adhere to a notice he had previously given, that, if the license was not obtained, and the assignment completed by the 18th of March, he should treat the contract as at an end. On the 28th of April the plaintiff gave formal notice that he had rescinded the contract and claimed the re-payment of his deposit of 750*l*.

The Court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact, which a jury ought to have drawn.

The question for the Court was whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the said deposit of 750*l*.

It further appeared from the case that the defendant knowing that the plaintiff intended to set up a cooking apparatus, &c., in the hall, had joined him in endeavouring to obtain a lease from the Mercers' Company, which would sanction the hall being applied to such a purpose.

Coleridge, Q.C., for the plaintiff, contended that, irrespective of the terms of the agreement, the defendant was bound to get the license to assign as part of the title she contracted to make for the purchaser, as otherwise she could not make a valid assignment at all, and cited Sugd. Ven. & Pur. 11th ed. pp. 390, 495, 253; Lloyd v. Crispe (5 Taunt. 249); Stray v. Russell (7 W. R. 641; 1 El. & El. 888); Taylor v. Stray (5 W. R. 528; 2 C.B. N.S. 175, 197). It may be said that, as there has been an assignment, the doctrine in Dumport's case (4 Rep. 119), applies, and the lessor's right of re-entry is gone. But an assignment of a bankrupt's lease is voluntary, and not such an assignment as to be within the doctrine (Doe v. Bevan, 3 M. & S. 353), so that there never has been a breach of the covenant. And, secondly, if there has, it is cured by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 1.

Raymond, contra.—The purchaser can only put an end to the contract on one of two conditions, viz., if the vendor fails to make a good title, or if there is a condition in the contract itself that on certain things happening either party may put an end to it. If neither of these conditions exists, the contract can only be put an end to by consent of both parties. The statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, applies to a license given by the lessors or to any act of theirs, but not to an assignment under the bankrupt law. The license was no part of the title the defendant was bound to make, though it would have been otherwise with regard to Hullah. The plaintiff so modified and protracted the original contract that he disabled himself from falling back on it and rescinding it.

Coleridge, Q.C., was not heard in reply.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the verdict should stand for the plaintiff to recover the deposit he has paid. It was paid on a contract by the plaintiff to purchase leasehold premises from the defendant. The defendant held these premises under the Mercers' Company, and was bound not to assign them without license, on condition that if she did, the lessors might re-enter. In the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant she, as vendor, recognised her duty to obtain a license to assign, because she stipulated that if she failed to obtain such license, she should be at liberty to rescind the contract. That is, I think, an admission between the vendor and vendee that it was the duty of the vendor to get a license to assign, though I agree with Mr. Raymond that what follows is an optional privilege to rescind given to the vendor. I am also of opinion that by law the vendor of a lease, of which no valid assignment can be made without the consent of the lessor, is bound to make a good title, for which it is positively necessary to obtain the consent; and that otherwise there would be a failure of the condition to obtain a title. Here it is found that the vendor has been unable to get a license to assign, and that the attempts have been continued down to long after the time mentioned in the contract; and so that it never at any time was in the power of the vendor to get from her lessors a license to assign to the vendee. That, I think, was a failure of a condition precedent between the vendor and vendee, and of the essence of the contract; and if you fail to make good a step in the series of things to be done under the contract, which step is an essential part of the contract, the other side has a right to say the contract is at an end and to treat it as rescinded; and, if it is lawfully rescinded, to claim back the deposit paid on the assumption that it would be performed. This point of the case is also disposed of by reference to Dumpro's case, for an assignment in law under the bankruptcy does not destroy the right of the lessors. But one of the points is sufficient to enable the vendee to recover. I believe that if the defendant had stood on her contract, and not listened to the plaintiff's application for his lease or to his scheme for setting up a cooking apparatus, she might have performed her contract. In the course of the treaty for the lease facts came out which induced the company to refuse their license to assign to the plaintiff. The defendant lost a considerable contract through her endeavours to further the plaintiff's wishes, but I cannot find a needle's point of ground on which I can give judgment in her favour.

BYLES, J.—On looking at the law of the case, it is clear that the defendant must make a title. The transfer of the lease would only be made good by her obtaining a license, and the necessity for the license still continued, notwithstanding Hullah's bankruptcy, both on the authority of Doe v. Beavan, and under the provisions of Lord St. Leonards' Act. The defendant was therefore bound to get a license, which she did not do. On the contrary, the Mercers' Company proposed to grant a new lease to the plaintiff on other terms—he was to be lessee, and not assignee, and therefore would be liable on the covenants for ever, subject to his indemnity being good or bad. It is said that negotiations for a lease took place in the interval, but both parties negotiated for that which failed, and were then remitted to their original rights, which required the defendant to make a title. This she did not do, and therefore at law the plaintiff must recover.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the company had given the ordinary license to assign, after they had been affected with notice of the purpose for which the plaintiff wanted the premises, they would have found it very difficult to enforce the prohibitions in the original lease as against the plaintiff.

Larceny as servant—False entries by warehouseman of monies paid to workmen—Evidence.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner was warehouseman to a manufacturer, and it was his duty to give out materials to and pay the workmen. Two or three times a week he received cash from his employers, for which he accounted at the end of each week, giving a detailed account of the sum paid to each workman, and a statement of the aggregate sums received and paid; and carrying forward the balance for future payments. The money was kept in a separate till under his own key, and he had no authority to make any other payments. On three occasions he designedly made false entries in his account of larger sums as paid to a workman than those which he had in fact paid, and appropriated the excess:—Held, that he was properly convicted of larceny as servant.

Case reserved from the Warwickshire Sessions, January, 1866, by T. C. Sneyd Kyndersley, Deputy-chairman :—

Henry Low was indicted for larceny as a servant to Charles Peters and others. The indictment, in three counts, charged the prisoner with the following larcenies, viz., stealing, on 18th August, 1865, 1s. 4d.; on 24th August, 1865, 1s. 4d.; on 16th September, 1865, 1s. 8d. The facts were as follows :—

The prisoner was warehouseman, at weekly wages, to the prosecutors, who are ribbon manufacturers at Coventry. It was his duty to superintend the manufacture of ribbons; to give out the material, and pay the workmen when they brought back the finished work. In order to enable him to make these payments he received, two or three times a week, cash from his employers, and at the end of each week he accounted with them for the several sum received and paid, giving both a detailed account of the sum paid to each individual workman by name, and also, at the end of the same week, a statement of the aggregate sums received and paid during the week, and carrying forward, a balance applicable to the payments for the following week, whatever sums remained in his hands. The money was kept in a separate till, under his own lock and key, and he was not authorised to make any other payments whatever on account of his employers. The book in which the several entries was made was entirely in his own handwriting. He left the service of his employers at the end of October, 1865, but was allowed four or five days afterwards finally to balance his accounts. An investigation subsequently took place, and the present indictment, with others, was the result.

From the evidence adduced on his trial it appeared that, on 24th August, David Coley, a workman to whom materials had been given out by the prisoner, took back to him finished work, and was paid by him according to the price previously agreed upon between them—the sum of thirteen shillings. Under the same date in the account furnished by the prisoner at the end of the week to his employers was an entry made by him of 14s. 4d., paid to David Coley for the same quantity of work, and the balance carried forward to the next week was calculated upon that sum instead of 13s. actually paid.

On the 16th of September the money paid to Coley by the prisoner was 13s., and the sum charged to his employers was 14s. 8d.

On 14th August the wife of Coley received from the prisoner for her husband's work 13s., and the entry in the prisoner's book was 14s. 4d. In the two latter cases the balance was also calculated on the larger sum.

The prisoner was indicted for the larceny of these three several sums of one shilling and fourpence, one shilling and eightpence, and one shilling and fourpence, being the difference between the sums paid by him and those charged to his employer. I directed the jury that assuming the statements of Coley and his wife to be accurate, the question for their consideration was whether the false entries in the prisoner's weekly accounts were made by him designedly and fraudulently, and with intent to appropriate the above sums to his own use, and whether, in fact, he did so appropriate them, and I told them that if they were satisfied in the affirmative of these questions, the acts of the prisoner, in my opinion, constituted the offence of larceny as a servant. They returned a verdict of guilty; but at the request of the prisoner's counsel, who had contended that his acts did not in law amount to larceny, the Court determined to reserve the question of law for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, whether my directions to the jury were correct, and whether the prisoner was properly convicted of larceny as a servant. The prisoner was discharged on recognizance of bail to appear at the next sessions and receive judgment if called upon, and I have very respectfully to crave the opinion of the Court upon the above case.

Chandos Leigh for the prosecution, was not called on. No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

ERLE, C.J.—We have all read this case and can scarcely conceive how any learned counsel could have the learning, courage, or countenance to get it reserved.

Conviction affirmed.

Practice—Selection of court—Cons. Ord. VI. r. 6.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Where it is sought to deal by one order with two funds in court, which have been separately dealt with by different branches of the Court, application should be made to that branch of the Court in which the first of the former orders has been made, and the matter in which the latter order has been made should be transferred to that branch of the Court.

Orders dealing with a fund already dealt with by the Court must be made in that branch of the court in which the former order was made.

In this case land, subject to the trusts of a will, had been taken by a railway company, and an order had been made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart for investment of the purchase-money and payment of the dividends. Subsequently land, subject to the trusts of a will of another member of the same family, had been taken by the same company, and a similar order had been made by Vice-Chancellor Wood.

A petition had now been presented to Vice-Chancellor Wood in the matter of the trusts of both wills, asking for payment out of the purchase-money. His Honour made the order asked for, but, entertaining some doubt whether he had jurisdiction to make an order in both matters, desired that the case might be mentioned to their Lordships.

Archibald Smith, for the petitioners, cited Re Bilston Curacy (10 W. R. 516), Re Hayter's Trusts (10 W. R. 557; Cons. Ord. VI. r. 6).

TURNER, L.J., said it could not be intended that every matter in respect of a purchase by the same railway company should be confined to the same branch of the Court, but after an order had once been made in a matter of this kind, subsequent orders relating to the same fund must be made in the same branch of the Court as the former order.

In the present case it appeared that the first order had been made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart, and therefore the present application should have been made to His Honour, and the matter in which an order had been made by Vice-Chancellor Wood should have been transferred to the court of Vice-Chancellor Stuart. But, as in this case, Vice-Chancellor Wood had already granted the order subject to the present application, the first matter might be transferred to His Honour's Court, and the order so made in both matters might stand.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., concurred.

Their Lordships desired that the consent of Vice-Chancellor Stuart to the transfer should be asked.

HARRIS v. JOSE.

Pleading—Demurrer—Inclosure Commissioners—Statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118—Jurisdiction.

COMMON.—An application had been made, under the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, to the Inclosure Commissioners, to inclose certain lands alleged by the parties applying to be common lands, but alleged by the plaintiff to be his own exclusive property. The Commissioners had given time to the plaintiff to vindicate his rights, but he brought no action at law. He afterwards filed his bill to restrain the defendants from proceeding before the Commissioners:—Held, upon demurrer, that this Court had no jurisdiction to interfere.

This was a demurrer.

The material allegations of the bill were to the following effect:—

By the will of Thomas Harris deceased, dated the 11th August, 1843, he devised to the defendant Langford, and one Kniver (since deceased) in fee, an estate called Wringford, with the appurtenances, upon certain trusts therein mentioned, for the benefit of the plaintiff, with certain trusts in remainder for the benefit of the defendant Thomas Hawke, in case the plaintiff should die without leaving lawful issue.

Thomas Harris died on the 15th November, 1843, and Kniver died in April, 1863. Some pieces of land called Twelve Acres, and one-third part of Little Down, had from time immemorial been held and enjoyed as appurtenant to the estate called Wringford, and passed, as the plaintiff submitted, by the devise of that estate by Thomas Harris's will. The tenement called Wringford consisted of a messuage and arable and pasture land, comprised about forty-seven acres, and had (since the expiration of a lease in 1853) been held by the trustees upon the trusts of Harris's will, without interruption by any person. The piece of land called Little Down contained twenty-four acres or thereabouts, and was formerly land held in common, but by indenture of partition, dated 17th September, 1861, part thereof (being about six acres) was allotted to the plaintiff in fee. The piece of land called Twelve Acres, contained 150 acres, and had (ever since the expiration of the said lease of Wringford) been occupied with Wringford by the defendant Thomas Hawke, as tenant of the plaintiff. The piece of land called Twelve Acres had always been and still was used for pasturing sheep and cattle. It adjoined on the south-western part thereof to certain common land called Beeny Common, which was occupied and used for the like purpose by the defendants Stephen Jose, Hellyer, Garnier, Rawle, Hawke, and Nottle, or their tenants. Twelve Acres adjoined on the eastern part thereof to certain other common land called Gunwennap Common, which was occupied and used for the like purpose by the defendants Hellyer, Garnier, William Jose, and Rawle, or their tenants. The fences dividing Twelve Acres from Beeny Common and Gunwennap Common had long since fallen into disrepair, and the sheep and cattle of the two sets of defendants, lastly before-mentioned, or other the tenants for the time being of Beeny Common and Gunwennap Common, had strayed into and pastured on Twelve Acres, and the sheep and cattle of the plaintiff, or other the tenant for the time being of Twelve Acres, had in like manner strayed into and pastured on Beeny Common and Gunwennap Common. The plaintiff, or other the tenant of Twelve Acres, had always stocked such land to the full extent thereof, and no objection had ever been made by any person in respect of such stocking. The defendants S. Jose, Hellyer, Garnier, Rawle, and Hawke had lately applied to the Inclosure Commissioners to inclose Beeny Common and Gunwennap Common (being lands subject to be inclosed under the provisions of the Inclosure Acts) and the commissioners on the 15th August, 1864, made a provisional order for the inclosure thereof. The same defendants afterwards represented to the commissioners that Twelve Acres was subject to rights of common, and that it in fact formed part of Beeny Common, and ought to be included in the inclosure thereof. The plaintiff had given notice to those defendants and likewise to the commissioners, that he alone, or his trustees, the defendant Langford, was entitled to Twelve Acres. The commissioners on receipt of this notice required the plaintiff to do some act in vindication of his title, and he thereupon, in February, 1865, commenced re-building the fences of Twelve Acres, and drove off the sheep and cattle of all persons other than himself and of his then tenant. But the said defendants pulled down the fences, and again drove in their own sheep and cattle on the said piece of land. Under the circumstances aforesaid the said Inclosure Commissioners threatened and intended forthwith to proceed to inclose Twelve Acres to the exclusion of the plaintiff. The plaintiff had offered to submit his title to Twelve Acres to the Commissioners and to be bound by their decision, but such offer had been refused. The plaintiff submitted that if the said defendants, or either of them, had acquired any common right in Twelve Acres, such common was only such limited right as is known as common pur cause de vicinage, and that the plaintiff had full right himself to such land, and that by such inclosure all right (if any) of the said defendants would be absolutely extinguished. The plaintiff also charged, that if by lapse of time and long usage, the said defendants or either of them had acquired any valid and indefeasible right of common in Twelve Acres, the plaintiff or his said trustee in his right had in like manner acquired a similar right in Beeny Common and Gunwennap Common, and that he was entitled upon any inclosure thereof to have an adequate share of Beeny Common and Gunwennap Common allotted to him or to his said trustee in trust for him accordingly.

The bill prayed that the Court would declare the rights of the plaintiff, and of his said trustee the defendant Langford, in Twelve Acres, Beeny Common, and Gunwennap Common, and that in the meantime the defendants—Stephen Jose, Hellyer, Garnier, Rawle, Hawke, and Nottle—might be restrained from proceeding to inclose, or promoting the inclosure, of any portion of the premises aforesaid, and that the said defendants, or some, or one of them, might pay the costs of the suit.

The last named defendants demurred for want of equity.

Giffard, Q.C., and Bevir, for the demurrer.—The bill shows that the plaintiff has only an equitable interest under the testator's will, his trustee having the legal estate; and there is no allegation that the trustee will not sue, or will not allow the plaintiff to use his name. But even if the plaintiff has an absolute legal title to Twelve Acres, there is no equity. He alleges a legal trespass, and his remedy must be at law. The General Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, gives power to the Inclosure Commissioners to decide the question.

Rolt, Q.C., C. Barber, and A. J. Lewis, for the bill.—The legal right cannot be enforced except by this Court, and if the trustee himself were the plaintiff, the Court would assist him. The bill shows that the plaintiff has not had such an exclusive possession of Twelve Acres as to prevent the Commissioners from entering. At the same time the allegations show that he or his trustee has the legal title. The Commissioners have no power under the Act to determine a question of title. [Wood, V.C.—Why do you not bring an action of trespass?] The Commissioners will proceed without waiting for the result of any such action. And such an action would not settle the question. Ejectment would have to be brought against every commoner. There will be irreparable damage to the plaintiff if the proceedings before the Commissioners are allowed to go on. The powers of the Act are being used for a purpose to which it does not apply. It would be impossible for the plaintiff to carry in any claim for an allotment before the Commissioners, for by so doing he must admit the defendant's claim to common rights over Twelve Acres; and if he carried in a claim to the fee simple of Twelve Acres he would be precluded from taking in a second claim in respect of common. They cited Turner v. Blamire (1 W. R. 190, 1 Drew, 402); London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith (1 M. & G. 216); Rigby v. Great Western Railway Company (C.P. 1 Coop. 1).

WOOD, V.C. (without calling for a reply), said that the demurrer must be allowed. The plaintiff did not seem quite to know his own case; he wished to claim the fee-simple, and if he did not succeed in that, he then desired to set up common rights. The Commissioners had very fairly said to him, "if you wish to assert your title to the fee, do something to vindicate it." The Commissioners might very reasonably say that they could not stop their proceedings, because some man chose to make an assertion of title, and no doubt there would have been a certain amount of hardship on the plaintiff if he had been obliged at once to send in a claim as commoner, or lose his right. But the fact was that the Commissioners told him to do something to assert his right, and they gave him plenty of time, at least eleven months it appeared, for that purpose. They could not give him an indefinite time when he was doing nothing. The case came simply to this—a number of persons, who had no privity with the plaintiff, asserted their title to common; there was no other equity against them. If the Commissioners were acting wrongfully there might be a ground for interference; but there was nothing of that sort here. The cases where the Court had restrained persons from using an Act of Parliament inequitably were different from the present case. When Parliament had constituted a tribunal, how could this Court prevent persons, who were entitled to do so, from applying to that tribunal? If it were a case of irremediable damage, as in the case of the Great Western Railway Company, it would be a very different thing. Here there would be no irremediable injury at all, the plaintiff would only be put to bringing his ejectment after the award of the commissioners. If the Court could interpose in a case of this kind, then the mere assertion by any one commoner of a title in fee would be enough to stop the whole proceeding of inclosure. It would be very mischievous to interfere in this way. The demurrer must be allowed with costs.

HARPER v. HARPER.

Practice—Evidence—Statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 59.

EVIDENCE.—The plaintiff in one suit put in his answer to the original bill in another suit respecting the same matter. The bill in the second suit was then amended, and the plaintiff died before putting in his answer to the amended bill. Replication was filed in the second suit, and the first suit was brought on by way of motion for decree. An order was obtained to use the evidence in the second suit on the hearing of the first:—Held, that the plaintiff's answer to the original bill was not admissible as evidence.

These two suits related to the same matter, and came on together. The first came on by way of motion for decree; in the second, replication had been filed. Moore, the original plaintiff in the first suit, put in his answer to the original bill in the second suit. This bill was afterwards amended, and Moore died before putting in his answer to the amended bill. An order had been obtained to use the evidence in the second suit upon the hearing of the first, saving all just exceptions.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., for the plaintiffs in the first suit, proposed to read Moore's answer in the second suit as evidence in the first suit.

Daniel, Q.C., for one of the defendants in the first suit, objected.

Wood, V.C., referred to statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 59, and said he saw nothing in the Act to make this answer admissible as evidence. It was not even evidence in the second suit.

HALDANE v. ECKFORD.

Practice—Supplemental order—Statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52.

PRACTICE.—Where a change of interest takes place by means of probate of a will being granted to one of four executors, who did not originally prove, he may be brought before the Court by the common supplemental order.

The bill in this suit was filed against three out of four executors of a will, the fourth being in India, and not having proved the will. He afterwards returned to England and proved. It was then sought to make him a party to the suit by the common supplemental order, but the Registrar declined to draw up the order without the sanction of the Court.

Mackeson now mentioned the matter. The suit, as originally instituted, was perfect: Dyson v. Morris (1 Ha. 413), and the case falls within the terms of section 52 of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.

Wood, V.C., said that he thought the result of the decisions was that whenever the change of interest had taken place by virtue of something altogether dehors the jurisdiction of this Court, it was a proper case for the common supplemental order. The probate of a will was of this nature. It would be different if it were a matter which could be tried here.

Will—Misdescription—Parol evidence.

WILL.—Where there is a person corresponding in name and address, but not in other particulars, to the description of the legatee contained in the will, and another person corresponding in every particular except the Christian name, the Court admitted parol evidence to show that the latter was the person intended to be benefited.

The testator gave a bequest to "James Graham," describing him as a "grocer" of Scotland-row. It appeared that there were two persons residing in that place of the name of Graham—one James Graham and the other John Graham. It also appeared that the former was in no way connected with or known to the plaintiff, and had no reason to expect anything from him. It appeared further that he was not a grocer, but a fishmonger. The other—John Graham—was known to the testator, and it was given to be understood that the testator intended to leave him something in his will. He was a grocer and his shop was next to that of the testator. There were affidavits from both John Graham, the applicant in the present case, and James Graham, setting forth the above facts.

Middleton, Dr., now moved for grant of probate of the will of the testator with the word "James" corrected into "John."

Sir J. P. WILDE.—It is clear that when a description in a will does not apply to the person apparently intended to be benefited, I must admit parol evidence to show that it was a mere misdescription. Probate may therefore pass as prayed for.

BROWN v. BROWN.

14 W. R. 318.

Dissolution of marriage—Cruelty—What sufficient evidence of.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—Where a husband threatened to cut his wife's throat, but did not accompany the threat with any act of violence, and subsequently, after cohabitation had ceased, broke into the house in which his wife was living, and kicked through her bed-room door:—Held, that these acts did not amount to legal cruelty.

This was a petition for the dissolution of marriage brought by a wife against the husband on account of his adultery coupled with cruelty.

The respondent did not appear.

The marriage was celebrated on the 1st October, 1863, and after its celebration the petitioner and respondent lived at the house of Mrs. Bruxby, the petitioner's mother who kept an inn in Leicestershire. Early in 1865 the petitioner's mother expostulated with the respondent on account of certain familiarities which had been observed between the respondent and a maid-servant who was living in the house. Shortly afterwards a dispute arose between the petitioner and respondent, and on that occasion the respondent threatened to serve the petitioner as Baum had served his wife (Baum being a person who had lately been convicted of cutting his wife's throat). On the following day a razor case was found in the respondent's room between the bed and the mattress, but there was no evidence to show who had put it there.

An act of adultery was proved to have been committed by the respondent on the 7th April, 1865, in consequence of which he left the house where his wife and her mother were residing. Early on the following morning he came back and demanded admittance, this was refused, and he then entered the house through a window, and came to the room in which his wife and her mother were sleeping and tried to get in. On being refused he kicked in the panels of the door. He then went to bed in another room in which a carving knife was found.

Swabey, Dr., and Jacques, for the petitioner.

No one appeared for the respondent.

WILDE, J.O.—The charge of adultery is clearly made out, but there is no evidence of anything which amounts to legal cruelty. There is no evidence of any disagreement having taken place before the maidservant came to the house, and up to that time no act had been done by the respondent which could be charged as legal cruelty. He then said he would serve the petitioner as Baum had served his wife; but this was said in a moment of rage, was not accompanied by any act of violence, nor was the petitioner placed in any danger. A razor was subsequently found in the respondent's bed, but that was not shown to have been put there by the respondent. The next act of cruelty relied on took place on the occasion of his coming back and kicking the door after the cohabitation had ceased; but by doing this he only claimed his right to be where his wife was. The petitioner is not entitled to a dissolution of the marriage, but is entitled to a decree for judicial separation on account of the adultery.

EACHUS v. MOSS.

14 W. R. 327.

Demurrer—Injunction—Exclusion of principal by agent.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—M., the manager of E.'s business, was allowed by him to send bills out to the customers in his (M.'s) own name alone. M. afterwards locked E. out of the business premises, and E. several times had to break the lock to get in. M. made an assignment of the premises and stock-in-trade to P., and P. advertised them for sale. E. filed his bill against M. and P. to restrain the exclusion and the sale. The defendants demurred for want of equity.

The demurrer was overruled with costs.

This was a demurrer.

The bill alleged that the defendant Moss was the manager of the business of an iron foundry belonging to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had allowed him to send out bills to customers for goods delivered to them in his (Moss's) name alone, as if he were the principal; that Moss had locked the plaintiff out of the business premises, compelling the plaintiff to break the lock in order to get in, and that he had actually broken the lock, and that this had happened several times, and that the defendant Poole, under colour of a pretended assignment from Moss, had advertised the premises and stock-in-trade for sale. The bill prayed an injunction to restrain Moss from excluding the plaintiff from his premises, and Poole from proceeding to the threatened sale.

The defendants demurred for want of equity.

Giffard, Q.C., and Horsey, for the demurrer.—According to the plaintiff's own showing he is in possession of his property, and a mere trespass has been committed, for which he can bring his action. A bill of this kind has only been entertained to quiet possession, where there has been frequent disturbance as in Devonsher v. Newenham (2 Sch. & Lef. 199).

Renshaw, for the bill, was not called upon.

Wood, V.C., said that the allegations were sufficient to require an answer. The fact of Moss being allowed to send out the bills in his own name, held him out to the world to a certain extent as owner of the business. Then he was in lawful possession in the character of manager, and under colour of this lawful possession he had constantly turned the plaintiff out. By the assignment, too, Moss gave a colourable title to Poole, and together they were about to dispose of the plaintiff's property. Moss had acquired the outward insignia of ownership by virtue of a trust, and he took advantage of that to lock out the plaintiff, to assign his property to another, and to put it up for sale. It was very different from the case that had been cited. The demurrer must be overruled with costs.

HENNING v. PARKER.

14 W. R. 328; 13 L. T. 795.

Discretion of arbitrator—Close of plaintiff's case—Refusal by arbitrator to re-open.

ARBITRATION. REFERENCE AND AWARD.—At the close of the plaintiff's case the arbitrator intimated that he was of opinion that the plaintiff had no case, and that the verdict should be found for the defendant, whereupon plaintiff tendered some further evidence, but the arbitrator refused to re-open the case:—Held, that the Court had no power to set aside the award, it being a matter entirely for the arbitrator's discretion whether he would allow the case to be re-opened.

This was an action on a promissory note.

The cause and all matters in difference were referred to an arbitrator. The plaintiff's counsel having called his witnesses, announced that he had closed his case, whereupon the arbitrator intimated that he should not call upon the defendant to produce any evidence, as the plaintiff's evidence proved the plea of no consideration.

The plaintiff's counsel thereupon tendered in evidence an affidavit of the defendant's admitting the consideration, but the defendant's counsel objected to the reception of any further evidence, on the ground that the plaintiff had closed his case.

The arbitrator refused to re-open the case, and subsequently by his award found generally for the defendant.

McIntyre now showed cause against a rule nisi to set aside the award on the ground that the arbitrator had improperly rejected the evidence. He contended that it was a matter for the discretion of the arbitrator whether he would allow the plaintiff, after the close of his case, to re-open it. [BLACKBURN, J.—Because the plaintiff once says that he has a prima facie case, is he precluded thereby from giving further evidence?] At all events, whether or no the arbitrator acted wisely, he had a discretion. Moreover, the evidence which the plaintiff sought to put in after the close of his case had been deliberately kept back in order to force the defendant to call witnesses. [BLACKBURN, J.—I suppose the affidavit tended to set up some of the special pleas.] It is not until the arbitrator at the close of the plaintiff's case gives his opinion that the verdict on the evidence should be found for the defendant, that the evidence purposely kept back is brought forward. The arbitrator found for the defendant generally, and not on the plea of no consideration only. The plaintiff ought, before he can set aside the award, to prove that the rejected evidence would have been decisive. The real point is—was the arbitrator bound to receive the evidence tendered by the plaintiff after the close of his case.

Thrupp, in support of the rule, contended that the arbitrator was bound to have received the evidence tendered by plaintiff. [BLACKBURN, J., referred to Russell on Arbitration, ed. 1849, p. 181, where the case of Spettigue v. Carpenter (3 P. Wms. 361, is referred to.)] [MELLOR, J.—It is not at all certain that a judge at Nisi Prius would have admitted this evidence. Mere non-reception of evidence is not sufficient ground to set aside an award. There must be misconduct of the arbitrator.] [COCKBURN, C.J.—It is not like non-reception of evidence at Nisi Prius. We have a controlling power over the judge, who merely represents the Court as one of ourselves. We have no such power over the arbitrator.] It is clearly laid down in Russell on Awards, ed. 1849, p. 181, that if an arbitrator does not give one party a proper opportunity of going into his case, that this is good ground to set aside the award.

REG. v. DAVIS.

14 W. R. 329; 13 L. T. 629.

Benefit society—Mandamus—Discretion of Court—3 & 4 Vict. c. 110.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY.—The granting of a mandamus lies in the discretion of the Court. In the exercise of this discretion the Court refused to grant a mandamus to compel a magistrate to determine a complaint, made under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110, s. 16, by a loan society with duly certified rules. The magistrate having refused so to do because the secretary of the society refused to answer questions put by the magistrate to discover whether the society was formed for an object within the scope of section 3 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110.

Macnamara (Huddleston, Q.C., and Gray, Q.C., with him), showed cause against a rule nisi, obtained by Mr. McMahon, in Michaelmas Term, 1865, calling on the defendant to show cause why he should not hear and determine a complaint made by James Richardson, on behalf of the Longton Equitable Loan Society, against John Meakin, for having failed to pay the sum of ten shillings, being part of a loan of 3l. 2s. 6d.

The facts of the case were as follows:—The Longton equitable Loan Society is a society in Staffordshire, formed under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110. The rules of the society were duly certified by John Tidd Pratt, the barrister-at-law appointed to certify the rules of such societies, and the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Stafford allowed and confirmed the said rules.

On the 16th of March the society lent to John Meakin 3l. 2s. 6d., to be repaid by instalments. John Meakin and his sureties afterwards made default in payment of the instalments, and James Richardson, the secretary of the society, took out a summons, under section 16 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110, against John Meakin.

This summons came on for hearing before the defendant, who is the stipendiary magistrate for the district in which Longton is situate. At the hearing the certified rules were produced, and the loan and default were duly proved. The defendant, John Meakin, did not appear, and thereupon the defendant, Mr. Davies, believing, from information which he had received, that the society was formed for an object not within the scope of section 3 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110, put certain questions to the secretary of the society for the purpose of discovering whether or no the society was so constituted as to come within the provisions of the Act. These questions the secretary refused to answer, whereupon the defendant declined to adjudicate upon the case.

McMahon, in support of the rule, contended that as the rules of the society had been duly certified, and the loan and default proved, that under section 16 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110, the magistrate was bound to give judgment for the society, and that he had no right to ask any further questions relative to the constitution of the society. The society was "such" a society, and entitled to the benefit of the Act. [COCKBURN, C.J.—No judge is bound to allow the process of his court to be abused. The judge knows of certain malpractices, and asks questions with a view to prevent the process of his court from being abused. You come to ask us to exercise our discretion, and by mandamus compel the defendant to determine your complaint, we are not inclined to exercise that discretion.] The combined effect of sections 4 and 16 leave the magistrate no option but to determine the complaint. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Not if you refuse to answer questions tending to show that you are not "such" a society. It is not because your rules are certified as the rules of "such" a society that, if you act otherwise than as "such" a society, and carry on your business on quite a different footing, you are to have the benefit of the Act. Suppose the defendant had appeared at the police court by counsel, can you deny that the questions put by the magistrate might have been asked by the defendant's counsel on cross-examination.] Sections 4 and 16 render such questions irrelevant. [LUSH, J.—Not if you are not, in fact, "such" a society.] [BLACKBURN, J.—It may be that if you had answered the questions, and the matter had been investigated, the magistrate's suspicion might, or might not, have proved to have been wrong, but here you contumaciously refuse to answer the questions.]

In re J. NORRIS.

14 W. R. 348.

Imperfect execution of will.—Codicil duly executed—Incorporation by reference—Affidavit.

WILL.—Where a duly executed paper refers to a written document then existing in such terms as to enable the Court to identify the latter document, probate will be granted of both documents, as containing the will of the testator.

The Court will require an affidavit that no will has been found except that propounded.

This was a motion to obtain probate of the will and two codicils of John Norris.

The will was contained in five sheets of paper, and in the last clause the testator said that he had set his hand to each sheet. In point of fact he had signed the first four sheets only. The last sheet had his name written in pencil (not, however, in his handwriting) and an attestation clause, but without the signatures of any witnesses, there being only directions in pencil as to the place and mode in which the witnesses were to sign.

The will was dated 1863 at the beginning, but no day or month was given, although blanks were left for these. The date "16th November, 1863," was indorsed upon the will.

The first codicil bore date the same year as the will, but the blanks left for the day and month were not filled up.

By the will the testator appointed Richard Adcock and Benjamin Allen executors and trustees, and the codicil, after reciting this appointment, and referring to the will as bearing even date therewith, appointed the testator's wife, Jane Norris, an additional trustee and executor, and directed that the will should have the same operation as if she had been therein appointed in conjunction with Richard Adcock and Benjamin Allen.

The codicil was duly executed by the testator and attested by two witnesses, one of whom stated that he recollected the testator's turning over several sheets and signing his name more than once at the time he executed his will, but that he was not aware that both a will and codicil were signed at that time.

The second codicil, which was also duly executed, was dated 1865, but, as in the first, the blanks for the day and month were not filled up, but the codicil was endorsed June 24th, 1865. This codicil revoked a legacy of 150*l.*, which was therein stated to have been given by the will to the testator's sister-in-law, and also a bequest of certain property to his wife. These two legacies were contained in the second sheet of the will, and the revocation in the codicil embodied the precise words of the bequests in the will.

It appeared from the evidence of the testator's solicitor that on the 23rd of October, 1863, the testator gave him instructions to make his will, which he accordingly did, and the will was engrossed. Shortly afterwards the testator wished to have certain alterations made in the will, but the solicitor had these alterations embodied in a codicil, thinking that the more convenient plan, and on the 3rd November, 1863, he sent the will and codicil to the testator, with a letter containing instructions as to the mode in which they were to be executed.

The year "1863" was inserted in the will and codicil before they were sent to the testator, as also were the names "John Norris" in pencil and directions in pencil beneath the attestation clause as to the mode of attestation.

On the 12th April, 1865, the testator gave his solicitor instructions to prepare a second codicil. On that occasion the solicitor, in the presence of the testator, referred to the drafts of the will and first codicil, which were then in his (the solicitor's) possession. The second codicil was then drawn up in accordance with these instructions, and on the 29th April, 1865, the solicitor forwarded it to the testator for execution.

One of the attesting witnesses to the second codicil swore that it had, in fact, been executed on the 23rd June, and not on the 24th, which was the date of the endorsement.

Wambey, Dr., now moved for probate of the will and two codicils. The two codicils were properly executed, and referred in clear terms to the will. All the three documents should therefore be admitted to probate: Van Straubenzee and Wife v. Monck (3 Sw. & Tr. 6); Smart v. Prujean (6 Ves. 560). [Sir J. P. WILDE.—There is no affidavit that no other will is forthcoming. This must always be done unless the Court directs that it may be omitted.]

Sir J. P. WILDE.—There are two codicils in this case, and both refer to a will. The question then is, do they refer in such terms that I can infer to what will they refer. I think I can. The first codicil speaks of the will as one which "bears even date herewith." It appears that, after the will had been engrossed, the testator gave instructions that certain alterations should be made in it. These alterations were embodied by the solicitor in a codicil, and the will and codicil were sent to the testator for execution. There is evidence that both were signed in one day. In the second codicil the testator says, "In other respects I ratify and confirm my said will and codicil." The provisions in the two codicils are consistent with those of the will, and the interpretation is carried on throughout the three instruments. I am therefore of opinion that the will propounded is that referred to in the codicils. An affidavit should be made that search has been made for other wills, and that none have been found.

Probate granted, subject to affidavits to the effect that no other will had been found.

WILL.—Interlineation or other alteration of will after testator's death—Costs.

The testator made a will in 1849 and died in 1864 without having revoked or altered the will. He had frequently shown it to his friends, and it was much worn in consequence of being very much handled during the fifteen years which elapsed from the time of its execution to the death of the testator. After his death it was found by his family among some other papers of his. The executor, in the presence of the family of deceased, and with their approbation, interlined the words "everything but money to Rebecca Wilson," in the disposing clause of the will under the belief that there was nothing illegal or improper in doing so, and that it would best carry out the testator's intention.

Spinks, Dr., moved for probate of the will, expunging the interlined words.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—A more outrageous act can hardly be imagined than this insertion of a clause in a will after a testator's death. Something must be done to put an end to tampering with wills. I will follow the rule laid down in previous cases, and direct the will to be propounded in solemn form, and the costs will fall on the person who made the alteration.

Spinks, Dr.—It will be impossible to condemn him in costs if he will not chose to make himself a party to the suit by propounding the will.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—If he does not propound it then the costs will fall upon such person as was a consenting party to the alteration.

Evidence—Materiality.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—At the hearing of a petition by a wife for judicial separation on the ground of desertion, it was attempted to show that offers to return had been made by the husband. No charge of adultery appeared on the pleadings. The respondent was asked in cross-examination whether, at the time of the alleged offers, he was not living in adultery:—Held, that such question was material to the issue, as it went to show the bona fides of such offers.

This was a petition by a wife for a judicial separation on the ground of desertion. The respondent filed an answer denying the charge, and the cause was heard by the Judge-Ordinary without a jury.

The desertion was fully proved; but it was alleged on the part of the respondent that during his absence from his wife he had repeatedly sent letters to her in which he expressed his anxiety to return, and his willingness to live with her in whatever place she should select. These letters the wife distinctly denied ever having received.

Swabey, Dr., for the petitioner, now proposed to ask the respondent in cross-examination whether he were not living in adultery in Dublin at the time of writing the alleged letters to his wife.

Spinks, Dr., for the respondent objected to the question on the ground that no charge of adultery being made in the petition, such question not being pertinent to the charge of desertion, was irrelevant; also that it tended to criminate the witness.

WILDE, J.O.—Although no charge of adultery occurs in the pleadings, still, as the wife is not bound to accept the husband's offer to return to her, if, at the time of making it, he be living in adultery; I think that the question may be put, although the witness is not bound to answer it. The fact whether or no the husband were living in adultery, becomes very important when the offer to return to his wife comes to be considered. And such question is most pertinent, and material to the issue, as it tends to show the sincerity of the husband's professions, and the bona fides of his offers to return.

TRADE MARK.—The right to an injunction to restrain the use of a trade mark or name does not depend upon the identity or close resemblance of the marks or names adopted by the plaintiff and defendant. It is sufficient to show that the defendant is offering his goods for sale in such a way as to lead ordinary purchasers to believe that they are the goods of the plaintiff.

The Leather Cloth Company (Limited) v. The American Cloth Company (Limited) (13 W. R. 873) distinguished.

The plaintiff in this case was a Portuguese nobleman and the proprietor of an estate in the province of the Alto Douro, known as the Quinta do Seixo, from which estate his title was derived. The estate has long been celebrated for the production of red port wine, and for many years the plaintiff has consigned his wine to Messrs. Sadler, Harrison, & Co., of London. The casks of wine thus consigned have a figure of a crown and eagle, with the letters B. S. (meaning Barao do Seixo) under it, burnt in on the head, and a figure of a crown with the name Seixo and the year of the vintage burnt in at the bung. Hence the plaintiff's wine has acquired in the London market the name of Crown Seixo wine, and a high reputation in connection with that name.

In the autumn of 1863 the plaintiff ascertained that the defendants, who carry on business in London under the style of Caldas Brothers & Co., were offering for sale 100 pipes of red port wine in casks marked or branded like the plaintiff's. The casks in question had the figure of a crown, with the letters C. B. and the words Seixo de Cima (meaning upper Seixo) and the year of the vintage on the head, and a figure of a crown with the letters C. B. and the words Seixo de Cima and the year of the vintage at the bung. The plaintiff accordingly filed a bill praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants from affixing or applying to any casks of wine shipped to their order, or used by them, the mark of a crown and the word Seixo or either of them or any other mark or word so contrived as by colourable imitation or otherwise to represent the marks or brands used by the plaintiff, and also from employing any marks or brands containing the figure of a crown and the word Seixo, or any mark similar to or only colourably differing from the marks or brands used by the plaintiff, or so contrived and prepared as to represent or lead to the belief that the wine offered for sale by the defendants was wine grown by the plaintiff or the produce of the Quinta do Seixo.

The bill alleged that the marks or brands adopted by the defendants so closely resembled those adopted by the plaintiff as to lead persons to suppose that the wine was of the plaintiff's growth, and that they were calculated and intended to attract the custom which would otherwise flow to the plaintiff. An ex parte injunction was granted by the Master of the Rolls on the 14th of September, 1863.

The defendants contended that their brands or marks did not resemble, and were not intended to imitate those of the plaintiff, and that they were not, and could not be mistaken in the trade for the plaintiff's; that they were entitled to use the crown, because it is a mark of rank of every grandee of Portugal, where the Baron de Provenzende was justified in assuming; that the letters were the true initials of the firm; that the words Seixo de Cima were the name of an estate rented by the defendants; that the expression "Quinta do Seixo" was a name applied not merely to the plaintiff's estate, but to an entire district, including the vineyards of the plaintiff and of the defendants; that the word Seixo, which means rocky or stony, was a term applicable to many places in Portugal, and that the plaintiff had no exclusive right to it.

The evidence in the case was extremely voluminous, turning, to a great extent, upon the names of various properties in the Douro district. It appeared that the vineyard which the defendant called Seixo de Cima, and which adjoins the plaintiff's vineyard, produced only a small proportion of the wine which they called by that name; but there was evidence to show that, according to the custom of the trade, it was justifiable to blend various wines produced in the same neighbourhood, and to give them all the name of the chief property. It was also proved that the defendants' vineyard had commonly been registered under the name of Rio Torto, but never under the name of Seixo. Yet it appeared that it was sometimes treated as situate in the "Sitio de Seixo," or in the locality of Seixo. There was no evidence to show that the defendants ever offered their wine as "Crown Seixo," or as the plaintiff's wine; but it had been offered as "Crown Seixo de Cima," and from that circumstance it had been believed by Mr. Ruck, an experienced wine merchant, to be the produce of the plaintiff's vineyard.

The case came on to be heard before Vice-Chancellor Wood, in February, 1865, and his Honour granted a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants "from affixing or causing to be affixed to any casks of wine, shipped to their or any of their order, or used by them or any of them, the brand or mark of a crown, and the word Seixo, or any other combination of marks or words so contrived as by colourable imitation or otherwise, to represent the marks or brands used by the plaintiff; and also from employing, or permitting to be employed, any marks or brands or other designation in respect of wines offered for sale by the defendants or any of them, which should be so contrived as to represent or to induce a belief that such wines are Crown Seixo, or the produce of the Quinta do Seixo, in the plaintiff's bill mentioned; and also from describing or offering for sale their wines simply as Seixo wine, or otherwise using the word Seixo in respect of such wines, without clearly distinguishing the same from wine produced on the plaintiff's said Quinta do Seixo"; and the defendants were ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

From this decree the defendants appealed.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., Amphlett, Q.C., and Macnaghten for the plaintiff.

Rolt, Q.C., and Cracknall, for the defendants.—This is not a case of fraudulent misrepresentation. We are justified in using every part of the mark we put upon our casks. The word Seixo is not a mere arbitrary name which the plaintiff is entitled to adopt to the exclusion of every one else. It is a name common to his vineyard and to ours, and also to many others in Portugal. The plaintiff can claim no title to what is a mere advertisement. There is no similarity between the two marks, and it is impossible that any person could mistake the one for the other. And there is no satisfactory proof that any one has been deceived. The Leather Cloth case is conclusive in our favour. At all events, the decree of the Vice-Chancellor goes too far.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., in reply.—The question of similarity does not depend upon the judgment of a man acquainted with the wine trade, and with the two casks before his eyes. It is enough for us if the common run of mankind would be deceived. Here it is clear that the defendants' wine would be commonly known as Crown Seixo wine. The jurisdiction of this Court is not limited to the piracy of trade marks, strictly so-called, but it extends to every representation, written or verbal, by which the defendants' goods are sold as if they were the plaintiff's. The Court ought not to limit its restraint to one particular mode of invading the plaintiff's right.

Jan. 22.—LORD CRANWORTH, C.—This is a bill to restrain the use of a trade mark. The plaintiff is a Portuguese nobleman, the owner of a vineyard on the south bank of the Douro called Quinta do Seixo. The word Seixo means stony or pebbly. Portuguese noblemen usually mark the casks which contain the produce of their vineyards with a crown or crowns. The plaintiff has, since 1848, stamped the top of his casks with his coronet, the letters B.S., and the date of the year; and the side of the casks, at or near the bung, with his coronet, the word Seixo, and the date of the year. Hence the plaintiff's wine has obtained celebrity in the London market, and has acquired the name of Crown Seixo wine. The defendants have, since 1854, been proprietors or farmers of a vineyard adjoining that of the plaintiff, and of some other small vineyards near it but on the opposite bank of the Douro. Until about the beginning of 1861 they sold their wine to other growers or merchants, but at that time they established their present firm in London, Caldas Brothers, to which their produce is consigned for sale. They have adopted as their trade mark a brand on the top of the cask of a coronet, the letters C. B., the words Seixo de Cima, and the date of the year, and they put the same brand or stamp at or near the bung. The present bill was filed to restrain the defendants from using this mark. The defendants put in an answer, and a great mass of evidence was produced on each side. His Honour Vice-Chancellor Wood has made a decree in favour of the plaintiff, and from that decree the defendants appeal, on the ground that there is no infringement, and no similarity.

If the question turns on the inquiry whether a person having a cask of the plaintiff's wine and a cask of the defendants' placed before his eyes could mistake the one for the other, there can be no doubt as to the result. The marks on the one and on the other are altogether different. But that is not the question, or not the whole question, to be considered. The principle on which relief is given in these cases is that one man can not offer his goods for sale representing them to be of the manufacture of a rival trader. Supposing the rival to have obtained celebrity in his manufacture, he is entitled to all the advantage of that celebrity, whether resulting from the greater demand for his goods or from the higher price which the public are willing to give for them rather than for the goods of other manufacturers whose reputation is not so high. Where, therefore, a manufacturer has been in the habit of stamping the goods which he has manufactured with a particular mark or brand, so that thereby persons purchasing goods of that description know them to be of his manufacture, no other manufacturer has a right to adopt the same stamp. By doing so he would be substantially representing the goods to be of the manufacture of the manufacturer who had previously adopted the stamp or mark in question, and so would or might be depriving him of the profit he might have made by the sale of the goods which ex hypothesi the purchaser intended to buy. The law considers this to be a wrong towards the person whose mark is thus usurped, for which he has a right of action, or, which is the more effectual remedy, a right to restrain by injunction the wrongful use of the mark thus pirated.

It is obvious that in these cases questions of considerable nicety may arise as to whether the mark adopted by one trader is or is not the same as that previously used by another trader complaining of its illegal use, and it is hardly necessary to say that, in order to entitle a party to relief, it is by no means necessary that there should be absolute identity. What degree of resemblance is necessary is, from the nature of things, a matter incapable of accurate definition a priori. All which courts of justice can do is to say that no trader can adopt a trade mark so resembling that of a rival that ordinary purchasers, purchasing with ordinary caution, are likely to be misled. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the resemblance must be such as would deceive persons who should see the two marks placed side by side. The rule so restricted would be of no practical use. If a purchaser, looking at the article offered to him, would naturally be led, from the mark impressed on it, to suppose it to be the production of the rival manufacturer, and would purchase it in that belief, the Court considers the use of such a mark to be fraudulent. But I go further. I do not consider the actual physical resemblance of the two marks to be the sole question for consideration. If the goods a manufacturer have, from the mark or device he has used, become known in the market by a peculiar name, I think that the adoption by a rival trader of any mark which will cause his goods to bear the same name in the market, may be as much a violation of the rights of that rival as the actual copy of his device.

It is mainly on this ground that I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor in the present case was perfectly correct. Ever since the year 1848 the plaintiff had caused his casks to be stamped with his coronet on the top and with his coronet and the word Seixo at the bung, and the evidence shows that his wines had thus acquired in the market the name of Crown Seixo wine. When, therefore, the defendants, in the year 1863, adopted as their device a coronet with the words Seixo de Cima, meaning upper Seixo, below it, the consequence was almost inevitable that persons with only the ordinary knowledge of the usages of the wine trade from Oporto would suppose that in purchasing a cask of wine so marked they were purchasing what was generally known in the market as Crown Seixo wine. The present case is thus brought distinctly within the principle on which all these cases rest. The plaintiff had adopted a device or trade mark which had caused his wines to obtain celebrity under a name descriptive of that trade mark. The defendants have adopted a trade mark which could not fail to lead purchasers to attribute to the wines so marked the same name as that under which the plaintiff's wines were known, and so to believe that in purchasing them they would be purchasing the wines of the plaintiff. Against the use of such a trade mark the plaintiff has, I think, a right to have the injunction of this Court.

A long and elaborate attempt was made to show that the defendants had a right to the use of the trade mark which they have adopted. They have, either as owners or lessees, a vineyard adjoining that of the plaintiff, and several small vineyards on the opposite side of the river. Seixo, it was said, means stony or pebbly. Vino do Seixo, therefore, is the same thing as Vino de Grave in France, or Steinwein in Germany. The defendants' vineyards, it was said, were, or some of them were, if not forming part of the plaintiff's Quinta do Seixo, at all events situate in what is called the Sitio de Seixo—i. e., the district of Seixo. The evidence as to the precise nature of the defendants' title to their different vineyards, and of the names by which they are known, is by no means clear, but I think it is immaterial to pursue any inquiry on this subject. For, even assuming the truth of what is contended for by the defendants—i. e., that parts of their vineyards are known by the name of Seixo—that does not justify them in adopting a device or brand, the probable effect of which is to lead the public, when purchasing their wine, to suppose that they are purchasing wine produced from the vineyards—not of the defendants, but of the plaintiff.

Cases may be imagined—though very unlikely to arise—in which a person bringing into the market for the first time the producer of a newly established manufacture, to come into competition with one already established, may really be embarrassed as to the mode in which he should describe it, so as not to interfere with the description adopted by a manufacturer who has been before him. If such a case should arise, it must be dealt with on its own merits. But here I feel it impossible to doubt that the defendants, in adopting the trade mark which they, in fact, adopted, must have known that they would be thereby likely to gain for their wines some of the celebrity which had attached to those of the plaintiff. At all events, whether this was or was not present to the minds of the defendants, this was the inevitable consequence of the course they took.

The defendants rested their argument in part on the case of The Leather Cloth Company v. The American Leather Cloth Company, decided last session in the House of Lords. But the facts of that case bear no resemblance to the present. There both parties, plaintiffs and defendants, were manufacturing and dealing in the same article—that known in the market as American leather cloth. Neither party had an exclusive right to that name, and the plaintiffs had not acquired any particular name for their American leather cloth, unless, indeed, the name of Crockett & Co. connected with it, and from whom they had purchased their business, could be so considered. But no one looking at the defendants' trade mark could be led to suppose he was purchasing goods from what was originally Crockett's manufactory. Unless a purchaser could be deceived by the similarity of the trade marks, he could not be deceived at all; and the House of Lords thought that the two trade marks were so different that no one could suppose them the same. That case, therefore, affords no support to the defendants. In order to assimilate that case to the present, we must suppose that the plaintiffs there had so marked their goods with the name of Crockett as to have obtained for them in the market the name of Crockett's American leather cloth, and then that the defendants had adopted a device which would lead purchasers to suppose that their cloth was not merely American leather cloth, which it was, but Crockett's American leather cloth, which it was not. The two cases are entirely different, and the present appeal must be dismissed, and, of course, with costs.

WYCOMBE RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE MINISTER AND POOR

14 W. R. 359; L. R. 1 Ch. 268; 14 L. T. 179; 12 Jur. N.S. 347.

Specific performance—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—Persons not sui juris—Mistake.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Where a railway company files a bill for specific performance against a person under disability, and the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act have not been complied with, the Court will not enforce the agreement.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—The Court will not enforce specific performance where the vendor proves that his understanding of the contract was other than that which the plaintiff wishes to have carried out.

This was an appeal from the Master of the Rolls, who had dismissed a bill for specific performance filed by the plaintiffs.

The company required, for the purposes of their undertaking, part of a farm belonging to the Donnington Hospital, which was in the occupation of a Mr. Walsh, at a rent of 200*l.* a-year, under a lease. The rack-rent value of the farm was nearly double that paid for it, and the portion of the 200*l.* a-year payable for the land required by the company was estimated at 10*l.* 8*s.* The company entered into negotiations with Mr. Graham, the agent and solicitor of the hospital, for the purchase of the land which they required, and the price was fixed at 1,500*l.*, of which 900*l.* was set apart as the amount to be paid to the hospital.

Ultimately Mr. Graham signed the contract for 900*l.*, subject to the lease. In an affidavit filed in the cause, Mr. Graham stated that he signed this contract on the faith of a statement by the agent of the company that Mr. Walsh had been settled with, and under the belief that what was thereby meant was that the company had agreed with Walsh to compensate him on the footing that he was to continue to pay the entire rent of 200*l.* during the remainder of his lease. Two days after the day on which he had signed the contract, Mr. Graham wrote to his surveyor stating that the agreement had been signed, and that Walsh was to pay the full rent.

The Donnington Hospital was a charitable corporation which had no power to sell its land except under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18, and by the 9th section it is provided that the purchase-money for lands to be taken from persons under disability shall not, except where it has been determined by a jury or by arbitration, be less than shall be determined by the valuation of two surveyors, one to be nominated by each party, each of which surveyors shall annex to the valuation a declaration in writing subscribed by him of the correctness thereof. No surveyor on the part of the hospital signed the declaration required in this section, and the defendants declined to complete the purchase at 900*l.*, subject to an apportionment of rent.

The plaintiffs having lodged the 900*l.* in the London and Westminster Bank, took possession of the land, and filed this bill for specific performance.

The Master of the Rolls, on the ground of mistake, dismissed the bill without costs. The railway company appealed.

Baggallay, Q.C., and J. Pearson, for the appeal, contended that the terms of the contract were clear, and that the defendants could not have understood it to have such a meaning as they now alleged. If an agreement did not contain all that it was intended to contain, a mistake in the agreement was a sufficient defence (Wood v. Smith, 2 K. & J. 33); but there was no mistake in this agreement, but only a mistake as to its effect upon the rent to be paid by the tenant. No relief could be given for a mistake in law.

Hobhouse, Q.C., and Swanston, for the respondent, argued that there was a mistake, and that the laws of the Lands Clauses Act had not been complied with, and referred to Helsham v. Langley (1 Y. & C. C. C. 175); Baxendale v. Seale (19 Beav. 601); Alvanley v. Kinnaid (2 M. & Gor. 1); Baker v. Metropolitan Railway Company (11 W. R. 18; 31 Beav. 504); Manser v. Back (6 Hare, 443); Leslie v. Thompson (9 Hare, 268); Swaishland v. Dearsley (9 W. R. 528; 29 Beav. 430).

J. Pearson, in reply, cited Gregory v. Mighell (18 Ves. 328).

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—This is an appeal from a dismissal by the Master of the Rolls of a bill filed by the purchasers of an estate for specific performance of a contract to sell, the purchasers being a railway company, and the vendors a charitable corporation. The purchasers are in possession, but, in consequence of a dispute, they have not yet paid for the estate, and have not obtained the conveyance of it. The plaintiffs filed the bill for the purpose of obtaining this conveyance, and the dispute has been, and is, substantially about the price; though the form which it has assumed is that the charity should be subjected to a rent of 10*l.* 8*s.* a-year and upwards for a certain number of years, which should operate so far as to cause a diminution of the value of the land obtained from them. The purchasers contended that this was the intention and that it was so understood. The vendors assert that the true construction of the agreement was otherwise. It was sworn by the agent of the vendors, and a letter written by him contemporaneously with the agreement bears him out in this, that he understood the agreement to mean that there was to be no diminution of the price paid to the charity on account of the rent. This being so it would be contrary to the rules of this Court to enforce an agreement against a person so swearing, and, in fact, so proving, however mistaken and however erroneous in his opinion he may have been. But there is another ground on which the purchasers must fail. The vendor is not sui juris, and a mode has been settled by the Legislature for effecting contracts between railway companies requiring land and the proprietors of the land not sui juris. No certificate has been obtained from the surveyors in the manner pointed out by the Legislature, and it would be wrong for us to treat this charity as liable to be dealt with on the footing of a private person. As the contract was not therefore complete, what has been done must go for nothing, and the bill must stand dismissed.

TURNER, L.J., agreed.—The 9th section of the Lands Clauses Act requires that the two surveyors to be appointed should certify whether they do or do not agree in their valuation. The object evidently was that the surveyors should meet and consider the proper amount, and I apprehend that it was not intended that they should fix the price without meeting. In this case there was no step taken to follow the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and I think that the Court cannot overleap this, and substitute for it the adoption of the contract without the Act of Parliament being carried out. It seems to me that this was not a complete and final contract, according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and that it is desirable that it should appear on the face of the order what was the ground of the Court's decision. There must be a declaration "that it appearing to this Court that the price to be paid by the company, in respect of the purchase in the bill mentioned, has not been ascertained in due conformity with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and that the agreement, therefore, has not become final and complete, and ought not to be specifically performed, this Court doth order that the decree be confirmed, and the bill dismissed without costs."

Baggallay, Q.C., asked that the dismissal should be declared to be without prejudice to the plaintiffs to bring any such action as they may be advised.

STUART, V.C., Jan. 22, 1866.

DOUGLAS v. SIDMOUTH RAILWAY AND HARBOUR COMPANY.*

14 W. R. 361; 13 L. T. 788.

Specific performance—Demurrer.

CONTRACT.—Demurrer to a bill by a contractor against a company, praying relief in the nature of specific performance. Allowed, with costs, on the ground that the plaintiff had omitted to perform a material stipulation which was a condition precedent to the performance of the contract by the company.

This was a demurrer to a bill for specific performance of a contract entered into by the defendant company.

The following were the material facts appearing on the face of the bill:—

In February, 1864, the defendants, through Mr. Bird, their engineer, entered into negotiations with the plaintiff, as contractor, which resulted in an arrangement with him that he should complete the defendants' railway works. The terms of the arrangement were embodied in a draft contract, which was submitted to a board meeting of directors, held on the 3rd of March, 1865, at which it was resolved—That the draft contract as read should be adopted, subject to the approval of the company's solicitor. At another board meeting, held on the 8th of March, 1865, it was resolved—That the company's seal should be affixed to the order of contract with the plaintiff so soon as the tender in conformity with the draft contract should have been signed by the plaintiff, and the articles of contract, when sealed, should be retained in the company's possession, to be exchanged for the counterpart duly executed by the plaintiff, when he should have furnished the board with approved sureties, as agreed upon, and should have completed the arrangement for the advance of 5,000*l.* to the company.

These resolutions were communicated by the engineer of the defendants to the plaintiff, and in consequence thereof the plaintiff signed, on the 13th March, 1865, a tender for the contract, which was addressed to the directors, and was as follows:—

“Gentlemen,—I, J. Douglas, hereby offer to complete such of the works of the Sidmouth Railway as are comprised in a schedule of quantities which has been supplied to me by your engineer. . . . And I agree to give a bond (such bond being distinct from another bond for 5,000*l.* provided for in the contract deed), with two sureties to be approved of by the company’s solicitor, in the sum of 9,000*l.*, for the due performance of the contract. And I also agree, in consideration of the premises, to advance to the company, upon the execution of the contract deed, a sum of 5,000*l.* to assist them in procuring lands and for the purposes of the undertaking, upon such terms as may be arranged between the company’s engineer and myself.”

At a board meeting, held on the 24th March, 1865, the tender of 13th March, 1865, was read, and it was resolved that such tender should be accepted, and that the seal of the company should be affixed to the articles of contract with the plaintiff. And such seal was accordingly affixed.

The articles of contract were in duplicate, and one copy was executed by the company in manner aforesaid, and the counterpart was executed by plaintiff. The following were the material parts of such articles:—

“The contractor will make and complete the whole of the works in accordance with this contract on or before the 1st day of October, 1866, provided that if the contractor shall be delayed in the commencement, progress, or completion, of any part of the works by reason of delay not attributable to him in the obtaining of any of the land required for the railway, the company’s engineer shall grant to the contractor such an extension of time for the completion of the railway and works as he, the said engineer, shall think just.”

With a view to assisting the contractor, and in exchange for a bond in the usual form, executed by him and by two sureties (to be approved by the company’s solicitor), conditioned for the payment to the company of the sum of 5,000*l.* in the event of such non-performance by him of his part of this contract, such bond to be in addition to the bond of a similar nature agreed to be given by the contractor and two sureties for the payment of 9,000*l.*, the company will, upon the due execution of these presents, give to the contractor, as part payment in advance (of the single bonds agreed to be given by the company as consideration for works done and materials supplied under the first part of clause 30 of these presents), single bonds to the amount of 10,000*l.* Provided always, that in order gradually to pay themselves such advance, the company shall be entitled, until such advance be re-paid, to deduct from any payments to be made to the contractor, under the said first part of clause 30 of these presents, fifty per cent. in amount of the single bonds, which from time to time would (had such advance been made by the company) have been payable to the contractor under the said first part of clause 30 of these presents. Provided also, that so soon as the company, by means of the aforesaid deductions, by this clause authorised, shall have re-paid themselves the said advance of 10,000*l.* in single bonds, the aforesaid bond to be executed by the contractor, and his sureties, in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*, shall be cancelled and delivered up to the contractor.

At a board meeting, held shortly after the execution of the contract, on the 24th of March, 1865, the engineer reported that everything had been agreed on between him and the plaintiff with reference to the said contract, with the sole exception of the terms upon which the 5,000*l.* were to be advanced. After the last stated report, the terms on which the said sum of 5,000*l.* mentioned in the tender should be advanced were agreed on between the plaintiff and the company's engineer, and were embodied in a letter of June 29, 1865, set out in the bill, and such terms were adopted by the directors, and had never been waived.

Shortly after the board meeting of the 24th of March, 1865, the plaintiff and the defendants jointly engaged in negotiations with capitalists, seeking, amongst other things, to procure a loan for the plaintiff, to enable him to advance 5,000*l.* to the defendants. Such negotiations failed, and the plaintiff thereupon applied separately to a finance company, who, in October, 1865, agreed to advance him 20,000*l.* The plaintiff, in the same month, gave notice of such agreement to the directors of the defendants' company.

On the 30th of October the plaintiff received a letter from the secretary to the directors of the defendants' company, in which he stated that having waited in vain for some signs of vitality in his proposition to become contractor for the railway, the board had come to the conclusion to consider his proposals as not made. In answer to a protest, addressed by the plaintiff to the directors on the receipt of the last-mentioned letter, he was told that the contract for making the railway had been entrusted to other hands. Some correspondence ensued between the plaintiff's solicitors and the directors of the defendants' company, which resulted in a refusal by the directors to hand the articles of contract to the plaintiff, or to employ him in making the works.

The bill prayed, amongst other things, for a declaration that the agreement made between the plaintiff and the defendants, by the tender of March 13, 1865, and the resolutions and the contract of 24th of March, were valid and capable of being carried into effect; and that (the plaintiff offering to advance the 5,000*l.*) the defendants might be ordered specifically to perform the agreement, and to exchange the articles of contract executed, but retained by them, for the bonds and counterpart copy of such articles in the plaintiff's hands; and also for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to an extension of time for the construction of the railway.

Kay for the demurrer.—The objects of the bill are (1) to make the defendants enter into a contract with the plaintiff; (2) to have specific performance of part of that contract; (3) to vary another part of it. There is, under the circumstances, no contract, for the plaintiff never fulfilled the condition relating to the loan of 5,000*l.*, which was a condition precedent to the contract. He quoted The Leominster Canal Company v. Shrewsbury, &c., Railway Company (5 W. R. 868); Jackson v. The North Wales Railway Company (6 Ry. Cas. 112).

Malins, Q.C., and Stock, for the bill.—The defendants never gave the plaintiff notice that they would abandon the contract unless he procured the 5,000*l.* at the time specified: Parkin v. Thorold (16 Beav. 59). Besides, even if there be objections to the specific performance of the entire contract, they do not apply to the simple delivery to us of the articles, which we are, at all events, entitled to: Brett v. East India and London Shipping Company (12 W. R. 596; 2 H. & M. 404); Munday v. Joliffe (5 M. & C. 167).

STUART, V.C., said that there was no sufficient agreement to induce the Court to interfere. The defendants had, with proper caution, inserted a stipulation for their own benefit which had not been fulfilled by the plaintiff, and the non-fulfillment of which barred his title to relief. That being so, it was needless to go into the other objections to the bill, which was one of a very unusual kind. The demurrer must be allowed with costs.

Lands Clauses Act, s. 92—House—Meaning of the word.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—A. occupied a house and six acres of land on the west side of a road, and bought six acres more on the east side, which he required for the convenience of his family. A railway company took part of the land on the east side:—Held, that they were not bound, under section 92 of the Lands Clauses Act, to take the whole property.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the Midland Railway Company from taking any of the land of the plaintiff, near the Edgware-road, without also taking the whole of the house and grounds occupied by him there.

The question for argument was whether all this land could be held to be included under the word "house," in the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Act.

The plaintiff resided in a large house on the west side of the road from London to Edgware, with a garden, and about six acres of meadow land adjoining. He had a large family, and kept several horses and cows. For the support of this establishment he had purchased about six acres of land on the east side of the road, and opposite to his own house. Upon this land, and adjoining the road, there were three houses. Two of them were let to tenants, and the third was used by the plaintiff for some outdoor servants to dwell in. The rest of this land consisted of pasture. The piece of land required by the company was a strip which divided the pasture into two parts.

The plaintiff had resided in the house for about twenty years, and in order to show that all the land was necessary to the enjoyment of the house, evidence was given that the possession of the land was a great pecuniary loss to him.

Rolt, Q.C., and Nalder, for the plaintiff.—The words "house" must include whatever is necessary for the enjoyment of the house: Fergusson v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (11 W. R. 1088); Grosvenor v. The Hampstead Junction Railway Company (1 De G. & J. 446); Pulling v. The London, Chatham and Dover Railway Company (12 W. R. 969; 33 Beav. 644). But even if it does not, all the land in question would pass under a conveyance of the house: 1 Inst. 5, b, 56, b; Shepherd's Touchstone, 12, 94. An extended meaning is given to the word for criminal purposes: 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 558; Reg. v. Great Northern Railway Company (12 W. R. 602; 14 C. B. N.S. 25). And in the case of manufactories: Spackman v. The Great Western Railway Company (1 Jur. N.S. 790); Hewson v. London and South-Western Railway Company (8 W. R. 467).

W. M. James, Q.C., and Speed, for the defendant company, were not called upon.

Wood, V.C., said that he was not at liberty to go beyond the authorities, and although in Fergusson v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, there was an indication in the judgment of Knight Bruce, L.J., of a more extended view of the meaning of the word "house," there had been no decision to that effect. His Honour could not, therefore, extend the view of Turner, L.J., who said that "house" must mean whatever would pass by a conveyance of the house or a devise of a house in a will. Trying it by this test, the land on the east side of Edgware-road could not be held to be part of the house. The house in question was capable of accommodating a large family, and the plaintiff's family was large. He kept a large number of horses and cows, and for their accommodation he had acquired land on the opposite side of the road, employing a cottage upon it as a house for outdoor servants; but he had already six acres on the same side of the road as his house, and his Honour was asked to hold that the word "house" would include not only the garden and curtilage, but six acres on each side of the road. If he held this he would be bound to hold that if a man in town, finding his house too small, hired another on the opposite side of the street for some outdoor servants, that would be part of his house. It would be still more unreasonable to make the word extend to all that a man chose to connect with the enjoyment of his house, and to hold that, because a man kept a large number of horses and cows, all the pasture which was necessary for them, or for the support of the dairy, was a part of the house. The land in question was land which the plaintiff had taken for the convenience of his family, outside of his house and curtilage. There was a class of cases in which the word, as applied to manufactories, had received a very large construction, but these could not have supported the plaintiff's contention unless it had been held that the pasture necessary for the support of the horses used in the manufactory would pass under the word. He would not be justified, in the present state of the authorities, in granting the injunction.

From this order the plaintiff appealed.

Feb. 8.—Rolt, Q.C., and Nalder, for the plaintiff, cited the authorities above mentioned, and also Doe v. Collins (2 T. R. 498).

W. M. James, Q.C., and Speed, for the company.

Rolt, Q.C., in reply.

Feb. 10.—TURNER, L.J., said that the appellant's case had been most ably argued, but the argument had failed to satisfy him that the Vice-Chancellor's decision was wrong. The appeal must be dismissed, and he should have dismissed it with costs, as he entertained no doubt upon the question, but as his learned brother felt some doubt, the costs would be costs in the cause.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that he thought the question one of considerable doubt, and he should have preferred reserving the point to the hearing of the cause. He agreed that the costs should be made costs in the cause.

belief that inspector had authority—Notice of action—25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 106.

LONDON PRACTICE.—By the directions of an officer of the vestry board, defendant, in the honest belief that such officer was authorised by the board to give such directions, erected an urinal on the wall of the plaintiff, such a work being a thing within the powers of the vestry board to erect under the 88th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. The officer had no express orders from the board to erect this particular work, but the parish afterwards paid the expenses of it.

Held, in an action of trespass, that defendant, as he acted bonâ fide under the direction of an officer of the board, in the erection of works which the board was empowered to order by virtue of the 88th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, was a person within the meaning of the 106th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, entitled to notice of action.

Held also, that the words in section 106 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, "their, or any of their directions," are not to be limited to the "board or vestry," but to be extended to the words following, "clerk, surveyor, contractor, officer," &c.

The declaration was in trespass for erecting an urinal against the wall of the plaintiff. Plea, not guilty by statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 106. The action was tried at Croydon in August last, before the Common Serjeant, when a verdict was entered for the defendant. It appeared that an inspector of nuisances of the vestry board of St. Mary, Lambeth, ordered defendant to erect an urinal against the wall of the plaintiff. The inspector had no order from the board, but the parish afterwards paid the expenses of the work.

A rule was subsequently obtained calling upon the defendant to show cause why there should not be a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Patchett now showed cause and cited Newton v. Ellis (5 E. & B. 115).

Houston in support of the rule.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we were, at first, in some difficulty as to whether the board had power, under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, to order the erection of an urinal. It is clear from the 88th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, that the board had power to do what the defendant in this case actually did. That being established, the question turns upon the 106th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. [His Lordship then read the section.] The question is, was defendant a person entitled to notice of action within the meaning of that section. I think that where the thing done is lawful under the Act, and the person doing it does it bonâ fide under the orders of an officer of the board, and the person honestly believes that the officer is authorised by the board, such a person is entitled to notice of action under this section. Now, by the 88th section of the first Act, there is no doubt that the board could have erected an urinal, and in this case their inspector ordered defendant to erect one. Defendant under that order did erect one. It is sufficient that defendant believed that the inspector was acting under the authority of the board. The section 106 is worded in a vague way, and it is quite possible to put a different construction upon it. But I think that the true meaning of the section is that where any person is acting under the direction of a person appointed and authorised by the board, such person is entitled to notice of action. It would be absurd if a contractor's servant were not entitled to notice of action for honestly doing what was intended to be done under the Act, when he is acting under the direction of his master, the contractor, who would in that case be entitled to notice of action? Here defendant is a person who is acting bonâ fide under the direction of an inspector, whom he honestly believes to be authorised by the board.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. For the reasons given, I think the defendant, being a person acting under the direction of the inspector, an officer of the board, is entitled to notice of action under the 106th section. Although there was no express order from the board to erect this particular urinal, yet the inspector had probably a general authority. It must be taken that defendant believed that the inspector was acting under the authority of the board, and that defendant acted bonâ fide. If there was any doubt about the bonâ fides that should have gone to the jury. Here it must be taken that defendant acted bonâ fide. The rule, therefore, must be discharged.

SHEE, J.—I had some difficulty upon the construction of the section during the course of the argument. But I agree now with the rest of the Court in thinking that the words in section 106, “or person whomsoever acting under their, or any of their, directions,” are not to be limited to the board or vestry, but are to be extended to the words following, “clerk, surveyor, contractor, officer.” Here the defendant acted under the direction of one of the persons there mentioned. Defendant, therefore, is a person entitled to notice of action.

Rule discharged.

ROLFE AND BAILEY v. FLOWER, SALTING, & CO.*

14 W. R. 377; L. R. 1 P.C. 27; 14 L. T. 144. For the report of Bank of Australasia v. Flower, see [1866] E. R. A. 1189.

Victoria—Insolvency—Joint debt—Change of partners—Transfer of liability—Evidence.

PARTNERSHIP.—Where new partners, who do not bring in any fresh capital, are taken into an existing firm, very slight circumstances will be sufficient to fix the new partnership with a liability to pay the debts of the original firm.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria, in a matter of insolvency of a firm of William Rutledge & Co., merchants, carrying on business in Belfast, in that colony, by which the respondents, Messrs. Flower, Salting, & Co., were admitted to prove against the estate of the insolvents for a debt of 53,587*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*

This case was argued with the case of the Bank of Australasia against the same defendants. The facts in each were the same, and both cases related to the same debt, but a separate judgment was delivered in each case.

The judgment appealed from was pronounced on an application by the appellants to expunge the proof of the debt of the respondents, on the ground that it was not a joint debt of all the partners in the existing firm of William Rutledge & Co., but a separate debt of a former partnership, carried on under the same name, but of which two only of the present partners, William Rutledge and Horace Flower, were members.

Their opposition involved the consideration of two questions—1. Whether the insolvent firm of William Rutledge & Co. had assumed the liability to pay the debt; and, 2. Whether Flower, Salting, & Co. had agreed to accept the insolvent firm as their debtors, and to discharge the old partnership from its liability.

* Present—Lord Chelmsford, Sir John Taylor Coleridge, Sir James W. Colvile and Sir Edward Vaughan Williams.

The firm of W. Rutledge & Co., which originally consisted of William Rutledge and Horace Flower only, was, in April, 1859, formed into a new firm by the addition of two new partners, David Talbot and Francis Forster. At that time the firm were indebted to the respondents' three firms in sums amounting in the whole to 113,710*l.* 10*s.* 7*d.*

Before the partnership deed was executed, a balance-sheet was drawn up, principally by Talbot and Forster, showing the liabilities and assets of the firm on the 30th June, 1858. Amongst the liabilities the before-mentioned debts to the respondents' firm were inserted. In an affidavit made by William Rutledge in the insolvency proceedings, he stated that this balance-sheet was the one on the basis of which Talbot and Forster entered the firm.

Neither Talbot nor Forster brought any capital into the partnership.

The new firm of Rutledge & Co., consisting of four partners, and, after the death of Talbot, of the three others, continued to trade down to the time of the sequestration, in June, 1862. On the establishment of the new partnership no alteration was made in the mode of carrying on the business; the accounts were continued in the old books as if no change had taken place, and the existing liabilities were discharged or diminished, either from the assets of the old firm, or from the funds of the new, indiscriminately. No provision was expressly made in the partnership deed for the new firm assuming the debts of the old, nor for the assets of the old firm becoming the property of the new.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., Hobhouse, Q.C., and Wickens, appeared for the appellants.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., Mellish, Q.C., Pearson, and Salting, for the respondents.

LORD CHELMSFORD delivered judgment.—In arguing the question as to the assumption of the liabilities of the old firm by the new, some reliance was placed upon probabilities. On one side it was said to be most improbable that Talbot and Forster should have agreed to undertake liabilities to the large amount of 162,000*l.*, which at any moment might occasion their ruin. On the other, it was argued that nothing was more likely than that two persons who had been clerks in the house, and who were to contribute no capital, should eagerly avail themselves of the opportunity of becoming partners upon any terms, however hazardous, in a concern which the state of the accounts showed to be, on the whole, a flourishing one. The question, however, is not to be decided upon probabilities, but upon evidence, although much evidence is not required to establish the assumption by the new firm of the debts of the old. Lord Thurlow, in Ex parte Jackson (1 Ves. Jun. 132), said—"If one man having debts, takes another into partnership with him, a very little matter respecting these debts will make both liable." And Lord Eldon in Ex parte Peele (6 Ves. 604), thought that "slight circumstances" might be sufficient to prove an agreement to undertake such a liability. The evidence in this case, however, appears not to be slight, but cogent, to fix the liabilities of the old firm upon the new. Not only was there a continuance of the former dealings of the old firm upon precisely the same footing and with the same books as before, but the liabilities of the old firm were regularly inserted in the balance-sheets of the new, and the assets of the old firm credited as belonging to the new, without any distinction between them. Large sums of money also were paid out of the general assets of the firm in reduction of the debt of Flower, Salting, & Co., and the interest upon their debt was regularly charged in the annual balance-sheets of the partnership.

It was said by the appellants that all that was done in payment of the debts of the old firm was in the discharge of a duty assumed by the new firm as agents of the old to receive their assets and discharge their liabilities. But the course of the partnership transactions scarcely admits of this argument; for, if it were merely a case of agency, it might have been expected that these assets and liabilities would have been kept separate and distinct from the partnership business, instead of being blended and intermingled with it. [His Lordship here stated the evidence which had convinced the Committee of the liability of the new firm for the debts of the old one.]

Under these circumstances, therefore, there seems to be no reasonable doubt that the insolvent partnership, at the time of its formation, assumed the debts and liabilities of the former firm of W. Rutledge & Co., including the debt due to Flower, Salting, & Co., and the only remaining question to be considered is whether Flower, Salting, & Co., being aware of this arrangement, consented to accept the liability of the new firm, and to discharge their original debtors. Upon this question, as upon that of the agreement of the partners inter se, it was said by Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Williams (Buck, 16), "A very little will do to make out an assent by the creditors to the agreement." This case is different from many of the cases mentioned in the course of the argument, where there had been a change in a firm of which a person trading with it had notice, and went on dealing with the new firm, and afterwards sought to make the old firm liable, and a question arose whether, by his conduct, he had not discharged the old firm and adopted the liability of the new. Here the creditors of the old firm, knowing of the change of partnership, and that the new partners had taken over all the assets, and had agreed to be subject to all the liabilities of the former firm, not only continued their dealings with the new firm upon the same footing as with the old, and received payment of a portion of their debt out of the blended assets of the old and new firms, but themselves proved that from the time when they understood that the new partners took over all the assets and became subject to all the liabilities of the preceding firm, they thenceforth treated the partners in that firm as their debtors in respect of the debt owing to them at the time of the creation of that firm, or of so much thereof as for the time being remained due. If the respondents had, under these circumstances, endeavoured to enforce the payment of their debt from the partners of the old firm of W. Rutledge & Co., there would have been ample evidence to satisfy a jury that they had discharged the old firm and had accepted the new one as their debtor.

Their Lordships, therefore, affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court, being of opinion that the respondents were entitled to prove against the estate of the insolvent firm of W. Rutledge & Co., for the amount still owing to them of the debt originally due from the former firm.

Judgment affirmed.

ROMILLY, M.R., Feb. 14, 1866.

TIMOTHY v. HINDLEY.

14 W. R. 382.

Bankrupt's assignee—Right to an account—Costs.

PARTNERSHIP.—The usual rule as to costs in partnership suits applies also to a suit for winding up the affairs of a partnership which had been dissolved before the filing of the bill.

This cause came on for further consideration. The bill was filed by the assignee of a bankrupt against a late partner of the bankrupt, and the person, who, on the dissolution of the partnership previously to the bankruptcy, had been, by a deed poll executed, made assignee of the partnership assets, for the purpose of realizing them for the benefit of the partnership. The question now for consideration was as to the costs of the suit.

Hobhouse, Q.C., and J. T. Humphrey, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff had a right to an account. The assignee appointed for the purpose of realizing the partnership assets, left the business to be managed by the late partner of the bankrupt, who was in the position of trustee and agent for the purposes of such realization. The defendants made payments on account of the partnership matters, after an account had repeatedly been requested; and the accounts rendered on the suit were partly made up from such payments. The defendants did not render their accounts within a reasonable time: Collyer v. Dudley (T. & R. 421). No costs were asked against the defendants, but they ought to pay their own costs.

Baggallay, Q.C., and A. Thomson, for the defendants.—The plaintiff filed this bill on an unfounded representation by the bankrupt. At the hearing it was admitted that strictly the plaintiff was entitled to an account. The question of costs was reserved—the plaintiff had been informed that the defendants were in fact creditors of the bankrupt's estate. If, after this, he went on to take the account, he did so at his peril. This was not an ordinary partnership suit. Here the partnership had been already dissolved—where a substantial balance was found in favour of either party in taking on account the party in whose favour the balance was found was entitled to his costs: Hawkins v. Parsons (10 W. R. 377); May v. Biggenden (24 Beav. 207); Remnant v. Hood (27 Beav. 74; 7 W. R. 606); Harmer v. Priestly (16 Beav. 569; 1 W. R. 343).

Hobhouse, Q.C., in reply.—The items brought in since the bill filed had the effect of making a balance due from the bankrupt to the defendants. The defendant was bound to give an account, and the plaintiff had made frequent applications, but been unable to obtain one, it was in fact refused. There was no estate of the bankrupt to pay costs with, and a trustee, who was seeking no more than he was entitled, was never made to pay costs out of his own pocket. Here the defendants had claimed a much larger balance than had been found due, and had therefore virtually failed. The plaintiff had endeavoured to avoid litigation, but could get no account without it.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I must follow the usual rule. No costs will be given on either side.

Wood, V.C., Feb. 8, 1865.

TANGYE v. STOTT.

14 W. R. 386.

Motion for new trial—Misdirection—Patent.

The summing up of Mr. Justice Patteson in Jones v. Pearce has not been impeached by the House of Lords in the Househill Company v. Neilson.

This was a motion for a new trial. In December last a trial had taken place before his Honour and a special jury, for the purpose of determining the validity of the patent, the subject of the suit, and also the question of infringement. The jury found for the plaintiffs on all the issues.

The plaintiffs were the sole assignees of the patent, which was the invention of one Weston. The defendant James Stott alleged want of novelty in the invention.

Willcock, Q.C., Daniel, Q.C., and J. L. Bird, for James Stott, supported the motion on the following grounds:—1. That the judge had improperly rejected evidence of want of novelty. 2. That he had improperly described, as disreputable, the affidavit sworn in the cause by a witness, who at the trial was cross-examined. 3. That the judge had misdirected the jury in point of law. 4. That the judge omitted to direct the jury as to the particulars of similarity or difference between the alleged invention of Weston and the alleged prior invention. 5. That the verdict was against evidence. They cited—Stead v. Williams (7 M. & G. 840; 2 Web. 126); Lang v. Gisborne (31 Beav. 135; 10 W. R. 638); Gamble v. Kurtz (3 C. B. 425); Stead v. Anderson (4 C. B. 806); Carpenter v. Smith (9 M. & W. 300; 1 Webst. 530, 540); The Househill Company v. Neilson (1 Webst. 708; 9 Cl. & Fin. 788).

Druce, for John Stott, the other defendant, took no part in the argument.

Grove, Q.C., Giffard, Q.C., T. Aston, and W. N. Lawson, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

Wood, V.C., could not put the parties to the expense of a new trial. He felt that his refusal could not give rise to any failure of justice. With respect to the alleged misdirection to the jury he must remark that in his summing up he had adopted the expressions of the late Mr. Justice Patteson in Jones v. Pearce (1 Webst. 124), in his statement of the law, and he, the Vice-Chancellor, must confess that, until he had had the case in the House of Lords (The Househill Company v. Neilson) mentioned to him, he had thought that the words used in that statement were plain enough. His Honour then referred at some length to the remarks of counsel, and of Baron Alderson, in Carpenter v. Smith, on Mr. Justice Patteson's words, and to the judgments delivered in the case of The Househill Company v. Neilson, and went on to say that, in the present case, the facts were stronger in favour of the plaintiff than those in the case before Mr. Justice Patteson, and that the alleged prior invention was a mere experiment, which had been carried on for some time, but was eventually discarded. He considered that it was impossible any misconception could arise from the summing up; that the House of Lords' case did not decide that the ruling of Mr. Justice Patteson was wrong, and, therefore that he was not wrong in following it. With respect to the evidence, he was perfectly satisfied with the verdict of the jury. His Honour refused the motion.

Feb. 12.—The suit now came on for hearing.

Willcock, Q.C., Daniel, Q.C., and J. L. Bird, for the defendant.

The plaintiffs' counsel were not heard.

Wood, V.C., said he must grant the injunction prayed. The Court always did so except where a motion for a new trial was pending. The injunction must be in the terms of the first paragraph of the prayer of the bill, and there must be a decree for delivery up of the pulleys made in infringement of the patent as prayed for by the third paragraph. The plaintiffs must have their costs.

HADLEY v. ROBINS.

14 W. R. 387; 14 L. T. 100.

Sale by order of the Court—Conditions of sale.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—Where conditions of sale incorrectly state the effect of the trusts of a reversionary interest, the purchaser of that interest is not bound to accept the title.

This was a summons adjourned into Court for the purpose of determining whether a purchaser was bound to accept the title to a sum of stock under the following circumstances. In the month of June, 1865, a sale was advertised of "a life interest in the dividends arising from a sum of 5,000*l.* New 3*l.* per Cent. Bank Annuities, now standing in the name of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery in trust in a suit of Williams v. Williams; and also the reversion of the said capital sum of 5,000*l.* Stock as within mentioned, which will be sold by auction, pursuant to an order made in the above cause of Hadley v. Robins, and with the approbation of his Honour, Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, the judge to whose court this cause is attached." The seventh of the conditions of sale accompanying this description was (so far as is necessary to be stated) as follows:—

"The interests now to be sold as above described are derived under the will of the late Mr. Thomas Edward Williams, who bequeathed the sum of stock in question upon trusts, which (in the events which have happened) were, in effect, as follows:—The dividends to his daughter, Mrs. Maria Ann Hardwick, for her life, after her death one moiety of the capital to such of her children as shall survive her, provided (if sons) they attain twenty-one, or (if daughters) they attain that age or marry; and, in default of such children, that moiety to pass to the testator's residuary legatees."

The trusts of the will of Mr. Williams, so far as they related to this reversionary interest, were as follows:—

"As to the sum of 500*l.* 3½ per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, part thereof, in case my said daughter shall be living at the decease of my said wife upon trust to pay the dividends interest and annual produce thereof into the proper hands of my said daughter for and during the term of her natural life free from the debts, control, and interference of any husband with whom she may intermarry. And I direct that the receipt of my said daughter and her receipt alone shall be a sufficient discharge to my said executors and trustees, and the trustees and trustee for the time being of this my will for the said dividends, interest, and annual produce of the said sum of 5,000*l.* Consolidated Bank Annuities. And from and after the decease of my said daughter, upon trust to pay, assign, and transfer one moiety of the said sum of 5,000*l.* Consolidated Bank Annuities, unto and equally between all and every the children and child of my said daughter, living at her decease, who being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall live to attain that age, or marry under that age, equally to be divided between such children, if more than one, as tenants in common, their respective executors, administrators, or assigns. And as to the other or remaining moiety of the said sum of 5,000*l.* Consolidated Bank Annuities, and the dividends, interest, and annual produce thereof, from and after the decease of my said daughter, upon trust to pay, assign, and transfer the same unto and equally between all and every my sons who shall be living at the decease of my said daughter. But in case my said daughter shall die in the lifetime of my said wife without issue, then upon trust to pay, assign, and transfer the whole of the said sum of 5,000*l.* Consolidated Bank Annuities unto and equally between all and every my sons who shall be living at the decease of my said wife. But in case all my said sons shall die in the lifetime of my said daughter, then upon trust to pay, assign, and transfer the whole of the said sum of 5,000*l.* Consolidated Bank Annuities unto my said daughter, or to such person or persons as she shall direct or appoint; yet so, nevertheless, that the said sum of 5,000*l.* Consolidated Bank Annuities shall be for the sole and separate use of my said daughter, and shall not be subject to the debts, control, or engagements of any husband with whom she may intermarry." The purchasers, on perusing the abstract furnished by the vendors, made the following requisition amongst others.

"The 7th condition of sale does not state accurately the effect of Mr. Williams's will, inasmuch as the 5,000*l.* stock is in case all the testator's sons should die in the lifetime of his daughter, given to her or her appointee, and not to his sons as residuary legatees."

Daniel, Q.C., and Harrison Dalton, for the purchasers, contended that the construction of the trusts of the will, set forth in the 7th condition, was erroneous, and that they had a right to rescind the contract.

Willcock, Q.C., contra.

Wood, V.C., held that the purchasers must be discharged from their contract, and that they must have their costs.

[IN THE COMMON PLEAS.]

WALTON v. THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH-COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 395; H. & R. 424.

Contributory negligence—Leaving horse and cart unattended.

NEGLIGENCE.—The plaintiff's horse and cart were standing at his shop-door unattended, and close behind them were drawn up the defendant's horse and cart, also unattended. The defendants' cart came into collision with the plaintiff's cart, and the plaintiff's horse broke through his shop window:—Held, that there was evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which the judge was bound to leave to the jury.

1. In this action, tried by jury in the county court at Croydon, the plaintiff sought to recover compensation in damages from the defendants under the circumstances hereinafter detailed.

2. The plaintiff is a grocer carrying on business at a corner house in Park-street, Croydon, which is a private street leading out of High-street. The house has a plate glass window, consisting of three large panes, facing into Park-street on the off-side.

3. On the afternoon of the 15th of August last a horse and cart, belonging to the defendants was drawn up opposite his shop for the purpose of loading goods, the head of the horse being about opposite to the centre of the shop window.

4. The defendants' servant having occasion to go to the shop on business, drew up a horse and van of the defendants', containing about two tons weight of goods, on the near side of Park-street, two or three feet in the rear of the plaintiff's horse and cart, and went into the shop.

5. No person on behalf of the plaintiff was watching his horse and cart, but his foreman proved that he was opposite the side window of the shop at the time of the accident, and that if the plaintiff's horse had backed he must have seen it. No person on behalf of the defendants was watching their horse and van.

6. It was proved that the plaintiff's horse was a young horse, about four years old, and quiet; and that the defendants' was a quiet old horse, which had long been accustomed to the sort of work it was employed on at the time of the accident.

7. No person was called who actually saw the circumstances leading to the accident, but it was proved that the plaintiff's horse smashed and came through the shop window, and injured himself as well as the plaintiff's cart and goods.

8. The evidence as to the cause of the accident, which was given by the plaintiff's foreman, who was standing at the window, inside the shop, was, that the plaintiff's cart did not back, and that on hearing a crash he ran out, and found that it had not done so, and that he could not get the horse extricated until the defendants' carter had released his horse, which had advanced to the front of the plaintiff's cart.

9. It was proved by the plaintiff that the off-wheel of his cart was chained at the time of the accident, and that the chain was taken off after the accident had happened; but counter evidence was given on the part of the defendants, and it was proved that the hind part of the plaintiff's cart was injured on the near-side, and that the off-shaft of the defendant's van was injured.

10. It was sworn to on the part of the defendants, that their van could not have moved forward, for no skidding of the van was observable on the ground, which it was supposed would have appeared had the van moved forward, but it was proved that the kerb for a space of two feet was scratched on the near side of the street where the defendants' van stood.

11. The plaintiff sustained injury to the amount of 35*l.*

12. The counsel for the defendants, in addressing the jury, contended that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence and was not entitled to recover, and that he had contributed to the accident by allowing his horse to remain in the street unattended. He also requested the opinion of the learned judge who was trying the cause on the law relative to contributory negligence, and the learned judge told him that, in his opinion, he had put forward an extreme view of the law. The learned judge then stated that a person could not recover damages if, but for his own negligence or that of the person who represents him, the accident would not have happened, though there was negligence on the part of the defendant; and that negligence or misconduct, on the part of the plaintiff, does not prevent him recovering damages in cases where the negligence or misconduct has not been an immediate co-operative cause of the injury complained of.

13. The learned judge, in summing up, stated to the jury that the first question for them to determine was, whether the defendants' van occasioned the accident by running into plaintiff's cart, and whether the same was brought about by the negligence of the defendant's servant; and that a question might have arisen, under some circumstances, as to whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. He said that he had no hesitation in ruling, on the authority of Addison on Torts, that negligence on the part of a plaintiff will not disentitle him to recover damages, unless, but for that negligence, the accident could not have happened, nor if the defendant could, by the exercise of care on his part, have avoided the consequences of the neglect or carelessness of the plaintiff. He further stated that the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to damages if the van ran into the cart; and that, in the present case, there was no evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and that it was occasioned by the negligence of the servant in leaving the van, there could be no doubt whatever; and the only remaining question was whether the defendants' van did run into the plaintiff's cart, the evidence as to which was conflicting. The learned judge then reviewed the evidence given on either side, stating that it appeared to him not to be very material whether the off wheel of the plaintiff's cart was chained or not. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with 35*l.* damages, and judgment was accordingly given. The question for the opinion of the Court is whether the learned judge was right in so directing the jury.

Hannen, for the defendants.—The judge should not have found, as a matter of law, that there was no evidence of contributory negligence, but should have left the question to the jury. Suppose the damage had been done to the window of some person other than the plaintiff, could the plaintiff, in answer to an action by such person, say that his cart being unattended was no evidence of negligence? Illidge v. Goodwin (5 C. & P. 190); Tuff v. Warman (5 W. R.

[Stopped by the Court.]

Hopwood, for the plaintiff, contended that the learned judge did not lay it down as a matter of law that there was no evidence of contributory negligence; the whole summing up must be taken together, and then it would be seen that the judge was only expressing an opinion on the evidence. To entitle the defendants to succeed, the negligence of the plaintiff must be the proximate cause, or causa causans of the accident. See per Lord Campbell in Dowell v. The General Steam Navigation Company (3 W. R. 492, 5 El. & Bl. 195).

Hannen was not called on to reply.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that this case must be sent for a new trial, but I desire to say nothing as to what would have been the result if the proper question had been left to the jury, because the expression of an opinion on that might perhaps prejudice the fair trial of the cause. There must, however, be a new trial, because the judge took on him to decide a question of fact, in favour of the plaintiff, which should have been left to the jury, who were the only proper tribunal to dispose of it. It is very important that, in cases which frequently occur, both in the superior and in the county courts, one general rule should be observed, and not one rule in Westminster Hall and another elsewhere; and especially is that the case, in questions of collision, where the matter to be determined is one so peculiarly for the consideration of the jury. It has often been discussed what is the proper direction to the jury in these cases. Now if there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the only question is if there was negligence on the part of the defendant. If there is evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, then the question is, did it cause or proximately or directly contribute to the accident. It is obvious that that is a question which may be put in such a form as to perplex a jury, and the operation of causes is a very difficult subject to deal with. Accordingly, in Tuff v. Warman, the direction I gave to the jury in the case of a collision between two ships was objected to. I am far from saying that the objection was unreasonable; on the contrary, I think it was very reasonably made, because I made use of the words "directly contributed" instead of "proximately contributed" to the accident. My ruling was, however, adhered to in the Common Pleas; there was an appeal from that decision, and, after very great consideration for some time, the Court of Exchequer Chamber finally sustained and affirmed the ruling, on the ground that, taking the whole of the summing-up together, the effect of it was as stated in their judgment in its opening sentences, and that the jury could not have been misled by the use of the word "directly." In all these cases, where there is evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the summing-up should be in the words of Wightman, J., in that case. First, then, was there evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff? Secondly, was it such negligence as is there defined by the Court of Exchequer Chamber? (1) There was the same sort of evidence of negligence on each side. It was proved that the plaintiff's cart was drawn by a young horse, which was quiet; the defendant's van by an old quiet horse, used to the work; and therefore I do not say there was the same degree of negligence. Both were left in the street with no one to take care of them, and the judge left it to the jury that there was undoubted evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, whether or not there was any evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and on that evidence the jury determined. But, in finding negligence on the part of the defendants, there was involved this, that there was also evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. (2.) If there was evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, was it a direct cause of the accident? What was the proper question to be left to the jury? It appears to us that the proper question for the jury in this, and indeed in all other cases of the like kind, is, whether the damage was occasioned entirely by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, or whether the plaintiff himself so far contributed to the misfortune, by his own negligence or want of ordinary and common care and caution, that, but for such negligence or want of ordinary care and caution on his part, the misfortune would not have happened" (per Wightman, J., in Tuff v. Warman). Nothing can be more clear than that, or more calculated to inform the jury of the question left for their province. Was, then, the summing up here substantially in compliance with the law so laid down. I think not, because the judge told the jury there was no evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. It is said that he was only expressing a strong opinion on the evidence, and if that were so there would, of course, be no new trial. But he told them that the first question for them to determine was whether the defendants' van occasioned the accident by running into the plaintiff's cart, and whether that was brought about by the negligence of the defendants' servant, leaving out the important word in Tuff v. Warman, "entirely" brought about or occasioned; and then he told them that the question of contributory negligence might have arisen under some circumstances, but that he ruled that the plaintiff might recover, unless, but for his negligence, the accident could (or rather would) not have happened, or unless the defendant could not, by the exercise of care on his part, have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's neglect. With the law so laid down it is impossible to quarrel. But he further stated that the plaintiff was entitled to damages if the van ran into the cart, and that there was no evidence of the contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. He therefore took upon himself to decide if there was evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and did not leave to the jury whether there was such negligence as that, but for it, the misfortune would not have happened. It follows that the summing up was not substantially in accordance with Tuff v. Warman, and we are bound to grant a new trial. The question of costs remains, and we wish to say that the defendants should have the costs of this appeal in the event of their succeeding on the new trial. In the other event there will be no costs of the appeal on either side.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. We should not look too closely at the summing-up of the judge, but I cannot read his statement without seeing that it substantially withdrew from the jury the question whether there was such contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff as that without it the accident would not have happened. It is clear that he did withdraw the question, and did so advisedly. It appears to me that there clearly was evidence of such contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. I cannot say what effect it might have had, or will hereafter have, on the jury, but I cannot for a moment doubt that there was such evidence to go to them.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I have only heard the argument for the plaintiff, but I agree with the rest of the Court.

Judgment for the defendants.

In the goods of W. O. BRADLEY (deceased).

14 W. R. 409.

Grant of administration to creditor passing over next of kin—Administration suit in chancery pending—Statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77—Practice.

WILL.—Where the estate of deceased was insolvent and the subject of a suit for administration in chancery, but which was suspended by the death of administratrix, and could not be proceeded with without the appointment of an administrator by this Court; and it appeared that the children of deceased were all minors except one, and he was in New Zealand, and the solicitors for the family had intimated that none of the children, or any one on their behalf, would take out administration,

The Court, on an application to grant administration, under the 13th section of the Probate Act, to a creditor who had proved his debt in the administration suit, declined to grant administration until the children should be cited, and the particulars of the debt, as well as of the estate of deceased, brought before the Court by affidavit.

This was an application by a creditor of the estate of the deceased for letters of administration to be granted to him, under the 73rd section of the Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77).

The deceased, William Orton Bradley, died on the 3rd of August, 1860, leaving a will, dated 29th August, 1855, by which he appointed his wife, Susannah Bradley, his sole executrix, and universal legatee in trust, and residuary legatee (beneficially) for life, and on her death substituted their children as residuary legatees; but in case there should be no child living at her death, then he substituted her his residuary legatee absolutely.

Susannah Bradley died in the testator's lifetime, and he himself died a widower, without having revoked or altered his will, and leaving six children, all minors. He died on the 3rd of August, 1860, and on the 30th of October in the same year letters of administration with the will annexed of the personal estate and effects of the deceased were granted, at the Durham District Registry, to Mary Bradley, the grandmother, and one of the next of kin of the minors, for their use, and until one of them should attain twenty-one years. Mary Bradley died on the 3rd of July, 1865, and thereby the letters of administration expired, and on the 13th of August following the eldest child attained his majority, but did not apply for a grant of administration. He then resided, and still resides, in New Zealand.

About six months after the grant of letters of administration to Mary Bradley, an uncle of the minors, Richard Holland Bradley, acting as the next friend of one of them, caused a summons to issue out of Chancery, calling on the administratrix to shew cause why an order for the administration of the personal estate of the deceased should not be made, and an order for the administration was made accordingly, and the proceedings under it were pending at the time of Mary Bradley's death, but by that event they were suspended, and according to the practice of the Court of Chancery no further steps can be taken till an administrator is appointed. The estate is insolvent, and the present applicant proved his debt in the administration suit above-mentioned. Under these circumstances

A. F. Jackson moved the Court to grant letters of administration of the estate of deceased to the applicant under the 73rd section of the Probate Act, which provides, inter alia, that where it shall appear to the Court to be necessary or convenient, by reason of the insolvency of the estate of the deceased, or for any other reason, it shall be lawful for the Court to appoint some other person as administrator of the personal estate, than the person who, if the Act had not passed, would have been entitled to a grant of administration of the personal estate. He read affidavits shewing that the eldest and second sons of deceased are permanent residents in New Zealand and Calcutta, respectively, and that the third child, a daughter nineteen years of age, also resides in New Zealand. It was also shewn that the other three children aged fourteen, twelve, and ten respectively, are, the two former in the Royal Asylum of St. Ann's Society, Brixton, and the latter at Bancroft's school, Mile-end-road, London. Counsel read a clause in the affidavit of the applicant, stating his belief that it was not the intention of any child of the deceased, or any other person on their behalf, to take out administration of his estate, and that his reason for that belief was information to that effect received from Messrs. Reiroux & Bromehead, the solicitors for the uncle in the administration suit and the confidential advisers of the family. The case, therefore, would come under the 73rd section of the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—The application cannot be granted on these facts. I cannot act on that clause of the applicant's affidavit that he believes it is not the intention of any child of the deceased, or any other person on their behalf, to apply for a grant of administration. There must be something more definite than this brought before the Court. On any future application, the eldest son and other children should be cited, and all particulars of the creditor's claim and of the extent of the estate of deceased must be sworn to.

Application refused.

RYVES v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

14 W. R. 409.

Petition under Legitimacy Declaration Act—Postponement of trial—Grounds for—Affidavit that further information is likely to be obtained.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—Where, on an application for the postponement of a trial by the Attorney-General, his affidavit stated that certain documents already in his possession were likely to lead, on inquiry, to further information,

The Court granted the application on this ground.

This was a petition under the Legitimacy Declaration Act to establish the marriage of Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, with Olive Wilmot, in 1767, and that the Princess Olive of Cumberland, mother of the petitioner, was the issue of such marriage. In 1859 the petitioner filed a petition in the Court praying for a declaration of the marriage of the said Olive, her mother, with Mr. John De Serres, her father, and that the petitioner was the issue of that union.

That petition came on for hearing in 1861, when a decree was made as prayed.

The present petition was filed on the 4th August, 1865, the Attorney-General having had the required previous notice. The Attorney-General, by way of answer, merely left the petitioner to prove her case; to which the petitioner replied in like form on 7th September, 1865. On the 7th November following, the petitioner applied for leave to have the cause set down for trial by special jury (see 14 W. R. 17), which application was granted, the Attorney-General being ordered to amend his pleadings by adding a formal traverse so as to raise the issue for the jury. This was done on the 23rd November, and the petitioner replied on the 25th November. On the 27th January, 1866, the Court fixed the 28th February for the trial.

Bourke, for the Attorney-General now moved for an adjournment of the case until the next sitting of the Court. Though affidavits had been filed on the part of the Attorney-General, he submitted that the mere application of the Crown was a sufficient reason for granting an adjournment. He cited Jessop v. Jessop (9 W. R. 640; 30 L. J. P. & M. 194). The Judge-Ordinary in that case observed: "The Court of Queen's Bench held, some years ago, that faith was to be placed in the statements of the Attorney-General. When Sir C. Wetherell was Attorney-General, he applied, on behalf of the Crown, for a trial at bar, Lord Tenterden, C.J., asked—'On what ground?' The reply was—'On the ground that the Attorney-General asks it;' and the application was granted." [The JUDGE-ORDINARY.—There are many cases in the Exchequer where the prerogative was carried as high as anywhere, but it is very questionable whether they go the length of saying that a trial should be adjourned on the unsupported application of the Attorney-General. But that question need not be raised, and I need not decide it, as you have an affidavit in Court.] He then read the affidavit of Rowcliffe, solicitor to the Attorney-General. It stated that he had been in constant communication with the Solicitor to the Treasury ever since the 25th November last, and that several hundred documents, bearing upon the case, had been got together at the end of January, which it was impossible to digest in time for trial; and that the Attorney-General advised that facts affirmative and negative, with reference to several persons and events, from the year 1767 downwards, should be obtained, and that it was necessary for this purpose that the trial should be adjourned.

J. W. Smith, Dr. (D. M. Thomas with him), for the petitioner.—This application is unnecessary, because the affidavit upon the other side does not state when the documents were found, but only that they were not got together till the end of January. It does not state that they are material and necessary to be produced on the part of the respondent, or even that there is any intention to adduce them. Nor is there any statement of the nature of the documents, so as to enable the Court to form any opinion as to whether they might be necessary. The affidavits of the petitioner, and of her attorney, explain that the documents stated to be in the hands of the Solicitor of the Treasury are petitions to the Crown by the petitioner and her mother, accompanied by copies of certain certificates and other documents on which she relied, and it was thus that the many hundred documents sworn to by Rowcliffe were made up. [The JUDGE-ORDINARY.—You have sufficiently explained that. Turn your attention to the next paragraph of the affidavit.] The next paragraph merely shews that evidence about the pedigree is thought necessary by the respondents; but it was their duty to have got this before now. The petition was filed in August, the replication in September, and the amended issue was only delayed until the 25th November by the laches of the Attorney-General. A much longer time is given to the Attorney-General in this case than a defendant would have in trespass or ejectment involving the same points and much longer documentary evidence. Moreover, the Attorney-General had one month's notice before petition, and this application is made only a week before the day fixed for trial, and the Attorney-General cannot be entitled to any indulgence.

WILDE, J.O.—Assuming that the proceedings in 1861 called the attention of the Attorney-General to the first step in the pedigree, and that he had some general notion as to the nature of the claim before this application, as indeed he and the public are likely to have had, I am, nevertheless, bound to grant this application for delay in a case of this public importance. It is desirable that when the cause is tried it should be tried once for all. I feel that I cannot disregard that clause in the affidavit of the Attorney-General where he states that it is extremely desirable that certain evidence should be obtained, and that if this delay is granted it is likely that certain documents already in his possession will lead to the obtaining of such evidence. I quite concur that such evidence is very desirable, and although it has been strongly urged that the delay sought for is a hardship to the petitioners, yet the Court cannot lose sight of the fact that although the petitioner obtained a decree in 1861 to the effect that her father and mother were duly married and that she was the issue of that marriage, yet she has done nothing for a period of over four years. [Smith, Dr.—That can be explained.] It is unnecessary, as I ground my decision on the clause of the Attorney-General's affidavit already adverted to. I consider that I am bound to grant the application.

Application granted.

Costs of detaining a witness.

SHIPPING.—The expenses of detaining a witness not allowed when it cannot be shewn that such detention was necessary to ensure his attendance to give evidence, nor where his detention was for some other purpose, such as to watch the proceedings in the suit, &c.

This case was originally one of damage to goods, and this was a motion on the part of the defendants to review the registrar's taxation of a single item in the defendants' bill of costs.

Brett, Q.C., and V. Lushington, for the defendants.

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs.

Dec. 5.—DR. LUSHINGTON.—In this case I have to consider the validity of an objection taken by the defendants to the taxation of a single item in their proctor's bill of costs. The bill contained a claim of 467l. 10s. for the detention and hotel expenses of a witness for twenty-one and a-quarter months—the twenty-one and a-quarter months being calculated from the 14th March, 1863, the date of the institution of the cause, to the 20th December, 1864, one week after the delivery of the judgment. The witness was the master of the Bahia, Captain Dugas; he was never, in fact, called, but the defendants maintained that he was, nevertheless, properly detained as a necessary witness, and that the charge of 467l. 10s. was a reasonable charge for such detention. The registrar, however, disallowed the claim altogether; but finding that the master had attended in court at the hearing, to give evidence if necessary, thought it fair to allow for the expense of such attendance at the same rate as would be usual in the case of a witness of the same position reasonably brought to London from Ramsgate and attending the court for two or three days, or as would have been allowed to the master himself if he had come up for examination before an examiner. It is against this decision that the defendants now appeal. The practice at common law, in circumstances like those of the present case, seems to be well settled. If a party entitled to his costs claims costs for the detention of a witness, a strict scrutiny is made to ascertain that the witness is a necessary witness, and was detained because his detention was the necessary means of securing his attendance. If it appears that, though a witness, he was really detained for another purpose (as, for instance, to watch the proceedings), his expenses will not be allowed. Still, if it be proved that the witness's attendance was required, and that his detention was necessary to secure it, the expenses of his detention will be recoverable as part of the costs in the suit—Mount v. Larkins (8 Bing.

195), Berry v. Pratt (1 B. & C. 276), Howes v. Barber (18 Q.B. 588), Dowdell v. Australian Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company (2 W. R. 554; 3 El. & Bl. 902). The first question is, therefore, Was the master a necessary witness? The master was not, in the event, called on to give evidence at all, and the cause did not turn, as it happened, upon any issue of fact. Still, this was a suit against the vessel in respect of the detention of the cargo. In such a case, the master can hardly fail to be a necessary witness; and the counsel for the defendants, it appears, so considered him, and I do not understand that this was questioned by the registrar. It may, therefore, be assumed by the Court. The next point is, was it necessary to detain the master to secure his evidence? The Registrar, I apprehend, was of opinion that the cause of the master's detention was not that he should give evidence in this court. The master was, indeed, detained at Ramsgate during the whole continuance of the cause in this court, from first to last; but then the beginning of the period of his detention was not coincident with the beginning of the cause, nor the end with the end. His detention began on the arrival of the vessel, several weeks before her arrest, and lasted many months after the delivery of the judgment. The Registrar was also of opinion that there were reasons for holding the French litigation to have been the cause of the master's detention. The vessel itself was at Ramsgate, and it was greatly to the interest of her owner that she should remain there, for the master had, on the 2nd February, 1863, executed a deed of abandonment of her; but by the French law this was not complete until a proper certificate had been given of the unnavigability of the vessel. The underwriters, however, disputed the abandonment, wanted to remove the vessel to Dunkirk, and, in consequence, the Consul-General of France had prohibited the Vice-Consul from giving the certificate. Until, therefore, the question as to the validity of abandonment was concluded by the decree of the Court of Cassation—not delivered until March 22nd, 1864—it was still an open question whether the vessel remained the property of her original owner, or had passed to the underwriters, and, consequently, whether Captain Dugas, as being in the service of the owner, was still master of her. The Registrar thought that, under these circumstances, it would be natural—and I agree—that the master should remain with the vessel, watching the progress of affairs, and that, if the abandonment was declared invalid, he should resume command; and this is what he actually did. He never ceased to be master; he never did leave the vessel; and, finally, he navigated her from Ramsgate to her original port of destination, Dunkirk. Such seem to have been the reasons on which the Registrar acted; and, certainly, they are entitled to great weight. But, on the other hand, what was there in the French litigation with the underwriters which rendered necessary the master's presence at Ramsgate? The place of that litigation was not at Ramsgate, nor in England, but in France. Again, the vessel was out of the control of the master, if not immediately upon the execution by him of the deed of abandonment, at all events after the vessel was placed under arrest by this Court. The Master was free to leave the vessel. He was a seafaring man, and his home was in France. What was there to prevent his leaving these shores, and, in the regular course of his profession, taking charge of another vessel to distant seas? How could his evidence be secured unless he was expressly detained for the purpose of giving it? I may add to these considerations the fact that Mr. Weber has distinctly deposed that he was detained, and detained solely in order to give evidence. If so detained, it makes no matter that, during his detention, he came up to town from time to time to give instructions to the proctor; although, if his detention had been only for the purpose of enabling him to conduct the cause, the mere fact that he also gave evidence would certainly be no ground for applying for the expenses of his detention. For these reasons I cannot agree with the Registrar, who disallowed the Master's claim altogether. I think, upon the whole, that it was necessary to detain him in order to secure his evidence, and that his being also occupied in the concerns of the ship does not entirely destroy the claim.

There remains, therefore, the question of quantum. I consider this claim exorbitant. It is at the rate of 22*l.* per month, the master's wages on board ship being, exclusive of provisions, only 6*l.* per month. I think the equity of the case is to disallow all claim for wages, as the master was engaged in the affairs of the ship, but to make a moderate allowance for subsistence. The period of detention claimed for is too long. In July, 1864, when the case was ripe for hearing, the defendants, to suit their own convenience, had the hearing put off till the November Term. I consider that the master cannot claim for detention for this interval. Upon the whole, I shall allow the defendants a sum which I think adequate to meet the necessary expenses of the master's maintenance, from the arrest of the vessel on March 13, 1863, to July, 1864, when the defendants applied to have the cause put off. I fix this sum at 1*l.* per week. I can give no costs, the claim which was made being exorbitant.

Will—Construction—Costs.

WILL.—A residuary legatee has a right to institute a suit where the estate is considerable, and it is uncertain whether there will be a residue or not.

This cause came on for further consideration.

The testator by his will left a legacy of 500*l.* to his wife. By a codicil to his will he directed that in case his widow should require a larger principal sum than he had left her by his will, his trustees should pay her a sum of money up to, and not exceeding, 300*l.*, "making altogether 1,000*l.* I have given her by this my will."

The question in the suit was whether the wife took 500*l.* or 300*l.* under the codicil, on which

Pearson, for the widow, cited Milner v. Milner (1 Ves. 106), and Jordan v. Fortescue (10 Beav. 259). On the question of costs he contended that the plaintiff, who was only a possible residuary legatee, in the event of his surviving the testator's widow, was not entitled to his costs, especially as, if the widow took 500*l.* under the codicil, there would, in fact, be no residue—Otley v. Gilbey (8 Beav. 602).

Southgate, Q.C., and Everitt, for the plaintiff.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The plaintiff is entitled to his costs. He had a clear right to institute a suit for the administration of the testator's estate, which was considerable. Moreover, here there is a surplus, as I must hold that the widow only takes 300*l.* under the codicil; to hold otherwise would be to change a 3 into a 5.

BINGHAM v. KING.

Mortgage—Sale under power—Fund in court—Petition for payment by puisne mortgagees—Foreclosure suit.

MORTGAGE.—A first mortgagee sold under a power, and, after deducting his debt, &c., paid the balance into court. On the petition by a puisne mortgagee to have his debt, interest, and costs paid to him out of the fund, the order was made without an account being directed.

In a suit for the administration of an intestate's estate, part of which was subject to a mortgage, the mortgagee, who was a party to the suit, sold the mortgaged property under a power of sale contained in the mortgage deed; and after deducting from the proceeds of the sale the amount due for principal, interest, and costs, paid the balance into court.

Subsequently to the death of the intestate, and before the sale in question, his heir-at-law and sole next-of-kin, who had taken out administration to his estate, further charged the mortgaged property with two puisne mortgages in favour of persons who were not parties to the suit.

This was a petition by the puisne mortgagees for payment out of the fund in court of their respective debts, interest, and costs, the respective amounts of which were verified by affidavit.

The petitioners alleged that, at the time when they advanced the money on their securities, they were informed that their mortgagor was the intestate's heir-at-law and administrator; and that they had no notice of any debts of the intestate then owing; and submitted that their securities, were as to the real estate, prior to such debts, if any.

Jessel, Q.C., and Burt, for the petitioners.

A. G. Marten, for the other creditors of the intestate, opposed the petition, contending that it was a petition in the nature of a foreclosure suit, and that the only order that ought to be made on it should be to direct the usual mortgage account to be taken; and that, at all events, the costs ought to be subject to taxation.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—In this case the amount of debt and interest due has been verified by the affidavit of the petitioner, and the respondent has not disputed the amount. Moreover, the property has been sold under the power in the first mortgage deed, and the fund paid into court, which distinguishes this case from that of a foreclosure suit. The order must be made, but not be acted upon for a fortnight, to give the other creditors of the intestate time to contest the account, if so advised. The costs are of course subject to taxation.

HORSEY'S CASE. HELBY'S CASE. STOKES'S CASE.

14 W. R. 417; L. R. 2 Eq. 167; 14 L. T. 47.

Joint-stock company—Winding-up—Contributory—Liability notwithstanding transfer—Balance-sheet—Statute of Limitations.

COMPANY.—It was provided by the deed of settlement of a joint-stock company that whenever shares should be forfeited or properly transferred to a new holder, the transferrer should be exonerated from previous liability in respect of such shares, provided, nevertheless, that nothing in the clause contained should extend to release him from his proportion of loss sustained by the company up to the transfer. Also that the directors should, half-yearly, at meetings, produce a balance-sheet accompanied by a report. The directors never furnished any balance-sheet, but did produce reports, which were false. The company was ordered to be wound up. One shareholder had transferred his shares five years before the winding-up order; another nine years, and another twenty-three years before such order.

Held, that the clause of exoneration did not release these shareholders, but that he whose transfer was dated twenty-three years before the date of the winding-up was entitled to be absolved by the general operation of the Statute of Limitations. Also that the liability of those who were liable was limited to the time previous to their transfers. Also that the obligation on the directors to produce a balance-sheet was imperative, but as to the report optional. Costs out of the estate.

This was an adjourned summons, the object being to put Mr. Horsey, Mr. Helby, and Mr. Stokes upon the list of contributories in the winding-up of this company, which was formed on 5th April, 1839, with a deed of settlement of that date.

Samuel Horsey was the holder of five shares, by deed of transfer, signed by two directors, and dated 1st October, 1839, which he transferred to C. Price, in February, 1842. William Helby was the holder of five shares, by a deed of transfer of the first-mentioned date, which he transferred to Joseph Blake, in August, 1859; and William Stokes was the holder of fifteen shares, by a deed of transfer also of the first-mentioned date, which he transferred to the company in February, 1856, having received dividends on them in the meantime.

The clauses of the deed of settlement more immediately bearing upon the question at issue were the 26th, 37th, and the 48th. The 26th was as follows:—"Whenever, by any means whatsoever, any shares shall have become forfeited, or shall be duly and validly transferred to a new holder, then, and in such case, and not before, the responsibility of the previous holder as a member of the company in respect of such shares shall, so far as the law will in that behalf allow, cease and determine, and such previous holder shall be exonerated and released from all subsequent claim and demand, obligation, and liability in respect of the same shares, and from all future observance and performance of the covenants, conditions, and agreements contained in the deed of settlement in respect of the same shares: provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this clause contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to release the previous holder of the shares so transferred as aforesaid from his proportion of loss (if any) sustained by the company up to the period or his ceasing to be such holder as aforesaid." The 37th clause provided that each shareholder should be entitled to and interested in the profits, and be subject and liable to the losses, of the company in proportion to his shares. The 48th was as follows:—"Provided that at every general meeting in February and August, the directors shall produce a balance-sheet or general summary of the accounts of the company for the half-year, respectively ending on the 30th June and 31st December next preceding such general meeting, and such further statement or report upon the present condition and probable future progress of the affairs of the company as the directors shall deem expedient and proper for the interests of the company to be made public. And every such balance-sheet or general summary of accounts shall be binding and conclusive on all the shareholders, their executors, administrators, and assigns, at law or in equity, unless some error shall be discovered therein and made known in writing to the directors before the next general meeting, and in that case such error so notified shall be rectified."

On the 31st March, 1865, the bank stopped payment, and the losses were stated at 80,000*l.* The directors never produced any balance-sheets at the half-yearly meetings, but did produce reports, in which they stated that the company was in a very flourishing condition, and that not only were they in a situation to reserve a large fund, but could pay a 10*l.* per cent. dividend. Evidence was adduced to shew what losses the company had sustained at the different dates above-mentioned.

De Gez, Q.C., and Horton Smith, for the official liquidator, contended that, under the 26th clause of the deed, all the present parties were clearly still liable for their share of the losses of the company, and it was sworn that there had been such, and that was sufficient. It was true that balance-sheets had not been submitted to the meetings, but the reports were acquiesced in, and had therefore become binding, even if not so by the operation of the 48th section. The Statute of Limitations did not apply to this case; but, even if it did, there was a clear liability in the cases of Mr. Helby and Mr. Horsey, inasmuch as the debts were specially debts, being contracted under a deed of covenant under seal.

Glasse, Q.C., and Druce, for the alleged contributories, argued that the language of the 26th clause was inconsistent with itself, and therefore it was inoperative. The directors had entirely ignored the 48th clause; and the so-called reports being entirely fabrications, could not be binding on the shareholders. Moreover, there was no sufficient proof of loss, and the onus of shewing that there had been such loss, and to what extent, rested on the official liquidator in the present instance. The debt was a simple contract one, and, therefore, except in one case, barred by the statute, supposing the party to be otherwise liable, which he was not. The words in the 26th clause—"As far as the law will in that case allow"—referred to the responsibility remaining under the Act of 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, enabling a creditor to get a sci. fa., and the latter clauses could not suspend that liability. The winding up order was invalid.

De Gez, Q.C., in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—With respect to Mr. Helby, the question is whether, he having five years previously to the winding-up transferred his shares to another person, he is liable to contribute in respect of them, not for the purpose of being liable to all the losses, but in respect of his proportion of losses accrued previously to the date of his transfer. It was suggested that the winding-up order was invalid, but it appears to me that, even if it were so, I cannot look at that now, although, if I could, I think there is no ground to shew that it was invalid.

The question is—what is the effect of the 26th clause of the deed of settlement of the bank, which was formed many years ago. This is a most unfortunate clause, which, at the time, used to be inserted in these deeds, purporting to make a transferror of shares still liable in respect of losses accrued prior to the time of the transfer. It is a most unfortunate clause, because, assuming that that is the effect of it, the result would be that it would be utterly impossible to work out the machinery to make it effectual in discovering what each shareholder is liable for during his holding without striking a balance-sheet—for ascertaining the exact condition of the company at the hour of every transfer, even of a single share. But still there is the clause, and it must be construed according to the fair interpretation of the language. [His Honour read the clause.] If the clause had stopped at the words "in respect of the same shares," I should have thought that the proper interpretation was that the transferror was to be exonerated from all responsibility and liability not only in respect of losses incurred subsequent to, but before the transfer. I think that would be the legitimate meaning, although, no doubt, the language is ambiguous, and without what follows the intention would appear to be an absolute and unqualified exoneration from liability future and past. But that interpretation of that portion is precluded by what immediately follows. His Honour read the remainder of the clause commencing "Provided nevertheless, &c." It appears to me impossible to avoid the conclusion that whatever ambiguity there is in the prior part of the clause, this portion absolutely precludes me from taking that view of it, and I must hold that the effect is that notwithstanding the absurdity and inconvenience of it no other interpretation can be put upon it, but that it was the intention that the transferror should still, not only as between himself and the transferee, but as between himself and the rest of the shareholders, remain liable for any loss which had accrued up to the time of the transfer. This clause is almost verbatim the same as that which occurred in the case of the North of England Bank, Holmes' case (supra), before Lord St. Leonards, and in Saunderson's and Dodson's cases before Lord Justice Knight-Bruce, when Vice-Chancellor; upon those cases, and the language used by Lord St. Leonards, I do not see how I can come to any other conclusion than that he considered the effect was to leave the transferror still liable to the losses prior to the time of the transfer, and the transferee liable for those losses only which have occurred subsequently; although that case was the converse of this. I must therefore come to the same conclusion here, and hold that Mr. Helby remains liable on the deed for any loss prior to the transfer.

Then comes this question—There is another clause which provides that half-yearly meetings shall be held, at which there shall be produced by the directors a balance-sheet or summary of the accounts of the company for the past half-year, accompanied by such a report as the directors think fit. This was for the benefit of the company, it was imperative to produce the balance-sheet, optional to produce the report. As is common with these companies, the directors did not, in any single year, produce the balance-sheet, but made a report, the substance being that there was a considerable profit, enabling them to reserve a fund and pay a 10l. per cent. dividend; and the question is—is that report to be considered a substitute for the balance-sheet, and binding on the shareholders, because the clause provides that the balance-sheet shall be so binding. It appears to me that that cannot be. The object was that the directors should produce a balance-sheet in order to shew the assets, their value, and the liabilities, because it is only on that sort of statement that you can draw a rational conclusion of what is the profit. It is imperative; and if the directors had done so, the unfortunate 26th clause would have been disarmed of much of its mischief, because the shareholders would have known the condition of the company, and have had an opportunity of investigating the affairs and pointing out the errors; and the clause would have been comparatively innocuous. Then comes the question, not having done that, can it be contended by the shareholders that the report made by the directors, which was utterly false, was binding on them? It appears to me they cannot. The effect is, with respect to Mr. Helby, that he must be put on the list of contributors, with the modification of limited liability; so expressed as to render him liable for such loss only as accrued during the time he held his shares. The case of Mr. Stokes stands precisely on the same footing, except so far as he can avail himself of the Statute of Limitations. Mr. Helby's transfer took place within six years of the winding-up, but Mr. Stokes was within nine years—when did the liability accrue? It was contended that the statute did not apply; and, therefore, if the thing occurred fifty or one hundred years ago, there would still be the liability. It appears to me that the statutes ought to apply—not the statute of James, but the statutes generally; and if a man has agreed, as in the present case every shareholder did, that he would be liable for all losses up to the time of the transfer, his liability exists from the time when he makes such transfer. True, their liability was not ascertained, because no steps were taken to enforce it. Of course that was the fault of the directors, and they had no right to say, "We will not take steps for forty years, and then proceed, and you shall have no relief under the statute." The sole question is, "what statute?" That depends on whether the debt is on simple contract or speciality. It appears to me that it is by speciality, and that six years are not sufficient to bar the right; it requires twenty years, and therefore Mr. Stokes is also liable; but, Mr. Horsey, having transferred his shares twenty-three years before the winding-up, is not liable.

SIMS v. THE ESTATE COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 419; 14 L. T. 55.

The Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122) was repealed by the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.).

Statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122—"Metropolitan Building Act, 1855"—Party wall—Injunction—Jurisdiction.

LONDON.—The defendants gave notice, under the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, s. 85, to the plaintiffs that they intended to pull down and rebuild a wall of the plaintiffs, which they described in the notice as a party wall. The wall was not a party wall, but an external wall, and the notice was therefore invalid. The defendants were frequently applied to by the plaintiffs to withdraw the notice, but they refused to do so, though they said they did not intend to act upon it:—Held, that the plaintiffs were justified in filing a bill to restrain the defendants from proceeding on the notice.

The statute in question does not oust the powers of this Court in a case which is not within the provisions of the Act at all.

This was a motion that the defendants might be restrained by injunction from pulling down, removing, cutting, or otherwise injuring the wall standing on the north side of the offices of the plaintiffs, situate No. 3, Bartholomew-lane, in the city of London.

The plaintiffs were tenants of the said offices, under a lease for a term of years which would expire on the 24th June, 1872, and carried on there the business of stockbrokers.

The defendants had lately purchased the building and premises known as the Auction Mart, situate in Bartholomew-lane, and adjoining the plaintiffs' said premises, and the defendants had also obtained a long lease of the plaintiffs' said premises subject to the plaintiffs' said lease. The defendants had pulled down the Auction Mart and upon the site thereof had erected and nearly finished a new building.

Negotiations had taken place between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the purchase by the defendants of the plaintiffs' interest in the said premises, the defendants stating that they desired possession thereof, because their architect wanted the space for carrying up the staircase of the new building. These negotiations came to an end because the parties could not agree upon a price.

On the 10th October, 1865, the defendants served on the plaintiffs a notice which was headed "Metropolitan Buildings Act, 1855, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, s. 85 (Party Structures)," and was in the form prescribed by that statute. The notice stated that the defendants intended, after the lapse of three months from the date thereof, to exercise the right given to them by that statute, by taking down and re-building of increased height and thickness the party-wall separating No. 3, Bartholomew-lane, from the said new building of the defendants. The notice then stated as follows:—"Time within which consent to the above is to be expressed, or after which dissent will be inferred, fourteen days from the delivery hereof." The notice then named a surveyor on behalf of the defendants. On the back of the notice were some printed instructions, one of which was as follows:—"The time for consent and the naming of a surveyor are embodied in this notice, as thereby the requisite proceedings will be cleared and shortened."

The plaintiffs had, on the 5th October, 1865, made certain proposals to the defendants respecting the purchase of their term by the defendants; and, on the 17th October, 1865, the secretary of the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs to the effect that the directors had resolved that the plaintiffs' terms be not accepted, and that Mr. Grüning (the defendants' architect) be instructed to proceed with the staircase as originally proposed.

On receipt of the said notice the plaintiffs instructed their surveyor to survey the said wall (called in the said notice a party-wall), and he stated that the wall was an external wall and not a party-wall, so that the notice served by the defendants was of no avail. It appeared that, in fact, this was so, there having been a space of six or eight inches between No. 3, Bartholomew-lane and the Auction Mart, and that the defendants had been in error in treating the wall as a party-wall.

Various communications then took place between the parties, the plaintiffs endeavouring to induce the defendants to withdraw their notice, and ultimately, on the 3rd January, 1866, the clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitor had an interview with Mr. Goslett, the managing director of the defendants, and asked him to withdraw the notice, and said that if it were not withdrawn, a bill would be filed by the plaintiffs. Mr. Goslett then told him that the defendants had no intention whatever of interfering with the wall, but that it was wholly unnecessary to withdraw the notice, because the three months mentioned in it would expire in a day or two, and that as the defendants could not then pull down the wall and rebuild it, the notice would fall to the ground. And he also said that the defendants would not interfere with the wall without giving the plaintiffs due notice. This was the account of what Mr. Goslett said, given by his own affidavit. In addition to this account, the said clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitor swore that Mr. Goslett also said that he should object to withdraw the notice, because, if it should expire, and the defendants should still wish to interfere with the wall, they would then have to give a fresh notice, which they would be unable to do were they to withdraw the first notice, as by such withdrawal they would have given up all right to interfere with the said wall.

The bill stated that the defendants had already cut into and made holes in the said wall, and had inserted the ends of scaffolding poles therein; but Mr. Grüning in his affidavit stated that, in consequence of the depth of the excavations for the foundations of the defendants' new wall, it was necessary to support the said wall of the plaintiffs', or it would probably have given way, and that, for this purpose, timber shores and struts had been placed against and inserted in the plaintiffs' said wall, but that it had not been, and was not intended to be, otherwise interfered with.

The plaintiffs filed their bill on the 6th January, 1866. On the 9th January the defendants' solicitors, on their behalf, offered to withdraw the notice, but the plaintiffs refused to accede to this unless their costs were paid. This the defendants declined to do. It was agreed to treat the present motion as the hearing of the cause, and the principal question was whether, under the circumstances, the bill ought to have been filed.

Giffard, Q.C., and Shebbeare, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants ought to have given a written withdrawal of the notice. The notice could, by the provisions of the statute, be acted upon at once on the expiration of the three months. The defendants distinctly refused to withdraw the notice, and from their evidence it is clear that they had a reason for their refusal. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs had no alternative but to file their bill and the defendants ought to pay the costs. They referred to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, ss. 85 (cl. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9), 86.

Rolt, Q.C., and Wickens, for the defendants.—From the fact that the defendants were making a separate external wall to their new buildings, it was clearly impossible that they could have any intention of acting on their notice. The defendants' acts showed that they had no such intention, and therefore there was no such threatening or intending on the part of the defendants as would induce this Court to interfere.

Then, as to the provisions of the statute. No notice had been given to the plaintiffs to appoint a surveyor, and nothing could be done till after that. The defendants were bound by the Act to give the plaintiffs notice to appoint a surveyor. But if the notice which was actually given is to be taken as a notice to the plaintiffs to appoint a surveyor, then, the plaintiffs having made default in appointing, the defendants had power to appoint a surveyor for them. The two would then have to appoint an umpire, and after that, proceed to an arbitration. It was clear that all this could not be done without ample notice to the parties. In any view of the case, the plaintiffs would have had ample time to come here before anything could have been done by the defendants.

The notice being from the first invalid, a refusal to withdraw it is no ground for the Court's interference. But really there was no refusal to withdraw the notice, the letter of the 17th October showing that the defendants had given up the plans which would have required an interference with the wall.

At any rate, this Court has no jurisdiction, the Legislature having created a special tribunal to determine the question with which this Court will only interfere on the ground of fraud: London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith (1 M. & G. 216). [Wood, V.C.—The only question is whether the plaintiffs must not have had ten days' notice before the defendants could take any proceedings under the notice.]

Giffard, Q.C., in reply.—The only construction the plaintiffs could put on the letter of the 17th October was, that the defendants meant to proceed upon their notice. The defendants cannot, after their notice, be heard to say that the wall is not a party-wall.

The notice was then handed up to his Honour.

Wood, V.C., said that by the printed instructions on the back, notice to appoint a surveyor was actually given as part of the original notice. The notice was a distinct threat to treat the plaintiffs' wall as a party-wall. The defendants at the same time named their own surveyor, and at the back of the notice the plaintiffs were told they must appoint their surveyor within the time limited by the Act. The 6th, 7th, and 9th rules of the 85th section applied to this state of circumstances. The time required by the 9th rule had elapsed, and the defendants' position was this:—They were armed with powers to name a surveyor on behalf of the plaintiffs, the two surveyors could at once appoint a third, and then the three or any two of them would have had power to order the wall to be pulled down at any time after the expiration of the three months. They could call the plaintiffs before them, and, if they thought fit, order the thing to be done at once.

There was nothing in the Act to oust the jurisdiction of this Court in a case where the matter is really not within the Act at all. If the Act had said peremptorily that these gentlemen and no one else should decide whether the wall was a party-structure within the meaning of the Act, that would have been a different matter. There was no doubt the plaintiffs would have a right to come to this Court if a threat were clearly made and not withdrawn; and the notice was as distinct a threat as if the defendants had come with men armed with pickaxes to pull down the wall. The only question then was, whether the threat had been withdrawn. It appeared that the defendants had deliberately refused to withdraw the notice, and the reason they gave was an odd one. They said—"The three months will have expired in a few days." They said—"We do not intend to act on the notice, but we will wait till the end of the three months. We will give you notice if we mean to do anything, but we will keep ourselves armed with our statutory powers." This verbal promise was not one which the plaintiffs were bound to rely upon. The plaintiffs were entitled to file their bill when they saw this distinct arrangement made, which the defendants refused to withdraw. If the notice to appoint a surveyor had not been embodied in the original notice, so that ten days must have elapsed before anything could be done by the defendants, the plaintiffs' application might have been thought somewhat hasty; but that was very different from what really happened. The defendants had pertinaciously refused to withdraw their notice, though there had been request after request to them to do so, and under these circumstances the plaintiffs were entitled to file their bill, and were not bound to accept a mere verbal promise not to act upon the notice.

This motion being treated as the hearing of the cause, the proper order would be to stay all further proceedings except the taxation of costs, and that the defendants pay the costs of the suit.

HENSLEY v. WILLS.

14 W. R. 422; 14 L. T. 162.

Will—Construction—Joint tenancy—Tenancy in common—Heirs.

*WILL.—J., by his will, gave to his daughters, N. and S., the interest of 2,000*l.* Consols, to be paid to them in equal shares for and during the term of their natural lives. By a codicil thereto the testator declared it to be his will that after the decease of his said daughters, N. or S., the property, for which they were to receive during their lives the interest, which was thereby to be for their sole and separate use, independent of any connections they might form, the said stock should become the joint property of the lawful heirs of his four children in equal shares:—Held, that each of the daughters, N. and S., took the income of a moiety of 2,000*l.* for her life, and that on the death of one, her moiety went over at once to the heirs of the children of the testator.*

The share of the heirs of the surviving daughter was carried to a separate account for such person as should be her heir at her death.

This was a motion for decree.

John Mills made his will, dated 7th July, 1814, and thereby (inter alia) gave to his daughter Nancy Mills and to his daughter Sarah Mills 2,000*l.* Consols —viz., to each of them 1,000*l.* Stock, the same as he had before given to his daughter Lydia, and his son John, on their settling in life. And he likewise gave to his said daughters Nancy and Sarah Mills the interest of 2,000*l.* Consols, to be paid to them in equal shares, for and during the term of their natural lives, if he should die possessed of such stock; and, if he should not, then he willed that it might be purchased with the other property he died possessed of, and the said 2,000*l.* Consols to be placed in the joint names of his executors therein named, to be paid to them by equal half-yearly payments.

The said testator made a codicil to his said will, which was as follows:—
“It is likewise my will that, after the decease of my said daughters Nancy or Sarah Mills, the property for which they are to receive, during their lives, the interest, which is hereby to be for their sole and separate use, independent of any connections they may form, the said stock shall become the joint property of the lawful heirs of my said children and executors, in equal proportions, viz. —one fourth part to the heirs of my daughter Nancy Mills, one other fourth part to the heirs of my daughter Lydia Hensley, one other fourth part to the heirs of my son John Mills, and one other fourth part to the heirs of my daughter Sarah Mills.”

The defendant Sarah Wills was the same person as the daughter Sarah Mills, she having intermarried with one Wills. She was, however, a widow when the bill was filed, and she was the surviving executrix of the testator. John Mills, the son, died in the year 1837, leaving his said three sisters his co-heiresses and next-of-kin. Nancy Mills died in 1862 unmarried. The plaintiff was the eldest child of Thomas Hensley the younger, who was the eldest son of the testator's said daughter Lydia Hensley. Lydia Hensley and her husband, and Thomas Hensley the younger, were both dead. The other defendants to the suit were Emma Hensley, the plaintiff's mother, and John Walton, the trustee of a settlement made by her and the plaintiff.

The said sum of 2,000*l.* consols was standing in the sole name of the defendant Sarah Wills, and she had, since the death of Nancy Mills, applied the whole of the dividends thereon to her own use and claimed to be entitled to them for her life. The plaintiff on the contrary, alleged that Sarah Wills was not, under the will, entitled to more than a moiety of those dividends for her life.

The bill asked a declaration accordingly, and that the 2,000*l.* might be brought into Court.

Giffard, Q.C., and Ramadge, for the plaintiff.—It is clearly settled now that the words heirs is to have its strict meaning, even when applied to personality, if there be nothing in the will to show that it is used in a different sense: De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir (3 H. L. Cas. 524); Hamilton v. Mills (29 Beav. 193). The gift of the 2,000*l.* to Nancy and Sarah was a gift to them as tenants in common. The gift over by the codicil makes no difference, the word “or” cannot be construed “and,” unless no meaning can otherwise be given to it: Willes v. Douglas (10 Beav. 47); Turner v. Whittaker (23 Beav. 196; 4 W. R. 689).

C. H. Russell (Rolt, Q.C., with him), for the defendant Sarah Wills, did not dispute the construction sought to be put on the word “heirs,” but he contended that the income of the whole 2,000*l.* survived to her for life. The words of the gift create a joint tenancy, not a tenancy in common. Even the words “equally divided” are not enough to create a tenancy in common: M'Dermott v. Wallace (5 Beav. 142). In Moffatt v. Burnie (18 Beav. 211; 2 W. R. 83), a gift to husband and wife for their lives was held to be for their joint lives and the life of the survivor. In Smith v. Oakes (14 Sim. 122) “during their joint and natural lives” was held to mean “during their joint lives and the life of the survivor.” The words “share and share alike” will not create a tenancy in common where the context shows that a joint tenancy was meant: Armstrong v. Eldridge (3 Bro. C.C. 215). In the present case the gift over by the codicil is to take place on a single event, and the fund must go over as a whole. Willes v. Douglas turned entirely on the explanatory context.

Wood, V.C., said that the case had been very ably argued by Mr. Russell. The cases cited, however, turned upon there being a clear indication of an intention that the whole fund should go over at once. It might have been so here if the gift over had been to the heirs of these two ladies only. But the force of that observation was taken away, because the gift over was also to the heirs of the son John, and the heirs of the daughter Lydia, whose deaths the testator could not possibly contemplate as to occur at the periods of the deaths of either Nancy or Sarah. The difficulty caused by the use of the word "or" in the codicil was not got over by the cases cited. There is nothing here to show that the whole income was intended to continue to the one sister after the death of the other. There is no doubt they were to take it for their joint lives in equal shares, and the words creating a separate use, shewed that the testator contemplated a distinct interest for each daughter. On the whole will, the intent to be gathered out of the cloud of words used appeared to be that, on the death of one of the two daughters, her moiety of the 2,000*l.* was to go over to the persons answering the description of heirs of each of the four children. The share of the heirs of Sarah Wills must be carried to a separate account for such person as shall be her heir at her death.

MAINWARING v. CHEESE.

Indebitatus count for the purchase-money of an estate.

Plea.—Never indebted.

At the trial, at the Hereford Spring Assizes, 1865, it appeared that as long ago as 1859 the estate had been sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the deed or conveyance had been duly executed, but as the purchase-money was not paid, the vendor's solicitor retained the deed, and the vendor remained in receipt of the rents and profits. The deed contained the usual recital of the payment of the purchase-money, but did not contain any actual release in terms. Matters remained in this state until the action was brought, as the money was never, in fact, paid.

At the trial it was objected—first, that the plaintiff was estopped from denying the recital in the deed; secondly, that the deed was delivered as an escrow; thirdly, that the deed, containing an acknowledgment, the same being under seal, was equivalent to a release, and the signature of the deed at the same moment that it conveyed the estate, also released the legal right to sue for the purchase-money.

The learned Judge reserved the point, but left the case to the jury, who found, according to the facts, that the purchase-money was never paid, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff.

In Easter Term a rule was accordingly obtained, and cause was now shown against it. The plaintiff's counsel objected to the first point, that the estoppel should have been pleaded; but

The Court made the rule absolute on the third ground, without going into the first or second objections, or calling on the defendant's counsel.

[IN THE COMMON PLEAS.]

BROOKS v. JENNINGS.

14 W. R. 440; H. & R. 414; L. R. 1 C.P. 476; 14 L. T. 19; 12 Jur. N.S. 341.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192—Composition deed—Form of plea in bar to the further maintenance—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 68—Unreasonableness—Composition payable before day of registration—Practice.

BANKRUPTCY. N.—A composition deed, under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is not unreasonable because the day thereby appointed for the payment of the composition occurs before the expiration of the twenty-eight days allowed by the Act for the registration of the deed, although no trustee is appointed by the deed.

PRACTICE.—The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 68, makes it unnecessary that pleas in bar, which raise a defence upon matters which have occurred since the action, should have any formal commencement.

The declaration in this case was for goods sold and delivered, and for money due upon an account stated. It was dated on the 4th December, 1865.

The plea, which was dated 19th December, 1865, set out a composition deed made the 14th November, 1865, on which the defendant relied as a bar to the action, and which, so far as is material to the present case, was in the following terms:—

“ This indenture, made the 14th day of November, 1865, between the several persons whose names are subscribed, and seals affixed, in the schedule hereunder written (being respectively either individually or in co-partnership with the creditors of J. C. Jennings, on behalf of themselves and all and every other the creditors of the said J. C. Jennings of the first part, and the said J. C. Jennings, hereinafter called “ the said debtor,” of the second part: whereas the said debtor is indebted to the said several persons, parties hereto of the first part, in the several sums of money set opposite to their respective names in the said schedule hereunder written, and is also indebted to certain other persons in divers sums of money, and, being unable to discharge the same in full, has agreed to pay a composition of two shillings in the pound, such payment or composition to be made and paid to all and every the creditors of the said debtor, whether executing this deed or not, on the 21st day of November, inst., and to be in full discharge of all and every the debts of the said debtor, due and owing at the time of the execution of these presents. Now this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the payment by the said debtor to the said several creditors of such composition as aforesaid, they, the said several persons, parties hereto of the first part, for themselves and their several and respective partners, do hereby accept the said composition in full satisfaction and discharge of their respective debts, and do, by these presents, release and for ever quit claim unto the said debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators—all and all manner of action and actions, suit and suits, debts, &c., whatsoever, which they, the said several persons, parties hereto of the first part, and their several and respective partners now have, or at any time heretofore had, against the said debtor; and it is hereby lastly agreed and declared that these presents are intended to operate, and shall (so far as lawfully may be) operate, as a deed of composition, within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that, so soon as a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said debtor shall have executed, or in writing assented to these presents, it is intended that the same shall be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy under the 192nd section of the said Act, in order that the said debtor may obtain the protection of the Court as provided by the 198th section.” Then followed a schedule of debtors with their respective debts, &c. And the plea then went on to state that the conditions required by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, had been complied with, and that "on the 21st November, 1865, being after action," the defendant had tendered to the plaintiff the composition due upon his debt, which the plaintiff had refused to accept. To this plea there was a demurrer. This action was commenced before the execution of the composition deed set out in the plea.

Philbrick in support of the demurrer.—1st. This defence arose since the commencement of the action, and the plea should therefore have a formal commencement, this being a plea in bar, and not to the further maintenance of the action. 2nd. The deed is unreasonable, because it provides that the composition should be paid in a week from the execution, while twenty-eight days are allowed by the statute for the registration—so that a creditor must decide either to refuse or accept the composition without knowing whether the requirements of the statute would be complied with—nor is there any trustee appointed by the deed.

Jenkins (with him Besley), in support of the plea.—The first objection is disposed of in Gresty v. Gibson (11 W. R. 284; 1 L. R. Ex. 112). 2nd. The deed is not unreasonable. A deed has been upheld under which the composition was payable at the time of the execution: Ex parte Godden (32 L. J. Bkcy. 37). If the composition was accepted the creditor might sue for the residue of his debt, if the deed turned out to be bad. In the case of Dingwell v. Edwards (12 W. R. 597; 4 B. & S. 738), Blackburn and Mellor, JJ., appear to have assumed that it was no objection to a deed that the composition was to be paid on execution.

Philbrick in reply.—In Dingwell v. Edwards more than one composition was to be paid, and the release was not absolute on the payment of the first composition. There was a trustee in that case, while there is none here, and the release was upon the agreement to compound.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the objections to this deed are not sustainable, and that our judgment must be for the defendant. The first objection is that the plea shows a defence which arose after the action, and that it has no formal commencement, but only sets forth the facts. That is only a formal objection; if the plea was embarrassing the plaintiff would be allowed to correct it on application to a judge at chambers; but no such objection arises here. This objection is answered by section 68 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which was intended to meet cases like the present. The case of Owen v. Waters (2 M. & W. 91), decided that in an action on a bill of exchange it was not necessary to aver in the declaration that the time for the payment of the bill had elapsed "before the commencement of the suit." It was afterwards held that in pleas matters of defence, which had arisen since action brought, should be stated to have arisen after the commencement of the suit. That rule was in accordance with precision; but under that rule pleas might be open to objection which were in substance good. These objections were removed by section 68 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which enacts that the plea is to be pleaded according to the fact, without any formal commencement or conclusion. This put pleas on the same footing as declarations. It would be a formal commencement if the plea was pleaded to the further maintenance of the action. The plea is therefore good on this point. Then it is contended that the deed is no answer to the action as being illusory, because the debtor is to be released if the composition is tendered on a certain day, but this is not so; for the recital describing the debts amounts to a covenant to pay on the part of the debtor, and the description of the plaintiff as creditor would be sufficient to enable him to sue. Besides this the deed provides that the debt is not gone unless the composition is paid. Another objection to the deed is that the day for payment of the composition occurs within the period limited by law for the registration of the deed. That, however, is no hardship, for the creditor may either refuse the composition until the deed is found to be binding; and in that case he would not be deprived of his right to sue if the deed turned out to be bad; or he may accept the composition of two shillings, but at the same time insist on being paid the remaining eighteen shillings, whereby he would not be treated as an assenting creditor.

KEATING, J.—The want of a formal commencement is no objection to this plea. It is pleaded according to the Common Law Procedure Act. The plaintiff could not be embarrassed by it as to the nature of the defence, or in deciding upon the course he should take. As to the unreasonableness of the deed, that is no ground of objection. My brother Willes has pointed out that there would be no hardship to the plaintiff if the deed turned out to be bad.

SMITH, J.—The plea is good. Since the Common Law Procedure Act a formal commencement is unnecessary and the plea forms a good answer to the action: Ex parte Castleton (10 W. R. 851; 31 L. J. N.S. Bkey. 71). Mr. Philbrick says that it is unreasonable because the day appointed for the payment of the composition occurs before the twenty-eighth day which is appointed by the Act as the limit of the time within which the deed may be registered. But it must be observed that it may be registered at any time within the twenty-eight days; that is only the maximum period. Ex parte Godden is in favour of the defendant. There Mr. Commissioner Holroyd says "there is this further point in the case that in this deed there is not, as in Walter v. Adcock, a covenant to pay in futuro, but an engagement to pay the amount of the composition down at once." That is an authority to show that the provisions of the present deed are reasonable.

Judgment for the defendant.

CLARK v. CLARK.

Practice.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The Court will make a payment of money out of court to a married woman entitled thereto, notwithstanding that she is misdescribed in the petition, where the husband gives his consent.

On petition in this suit certain trust funds were ordered to be transferred to the petitioners after providing for payment of 500*l.* to a respondent, the plaintiff in the suit of Maddison v. Chapman.

The Registrar refused to draw up the order for payment, the petitioner being a married woman (but not so described in the petition), except upon her examination and consent in court.

Villiers having mentioned the matter,

STUART, V.C., on the husband's consenting, directed the order to be made for payment to the wife on her separate receipt.

Purchase by a person in a fiduciary relation to the vendor.

FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION.—A person undertaking to advise another, who is in pecuniary difficulties, on the arrangement of his affairs, and the best means of settling with his creditors, places himself in a fiduciary position with respect to that person; and the doctrines of the Court of Equity, which relate to purchases by a trustee from his cestui que trust, apply to a purchase made by the person advising from the person advised. A sale under such circumstances set aside after the death of the vendor at the suit of his heir-at-law, who never acquiesced in the transaction.

This was a motion for decree.

The original bill was filed so far back as February 8th, 1862. The plaintiff was William James Tate, the father, heir-at-law, and personal representative, of William Clowes Tate, deceased, who died in the year 1860, at the age of twenty-three, intestate, and without having been married; and the defendants were Robert Williamson the younger, and Hugh Henshall Williamson.

The object of the bill was to set aside a sale of real estate, made by the intestate to the defendant Robert Williamson, on the following grounds:—1st, that at the time when the sale was made, the defendant Robert Williamson stood in a fiduciary position towards the intestate; 2ndly, that on the treaty for the sale the defendant Robert Williamson, taking advantage of the youth and inexperience of the intestate, and of the fact that he was without proper professional advice, misrepresented and concealed various facts which had an important bearing on the value of the property; and, 3rdly, that the price given was a grossly inadequate one.

The material facts were as follows:—

William Clowes Tate, the only son of the plaintiff by his first wife, Eliza Tate, was born July 6th, 1836. On the death of his mother, which took place October 5th, 1837, he became entitled to an equitable estate in fee in an undivided moiety of a certain estate, situate in the parish of Norton-le-Moors, in the county of Stafford, which consisted partly of freehold and partly of copyhold lands, with the coal-mines thereunder, and was usually known as the "Whitfield Estate." The entirety of this estate, which produced a surface rental of about 440*l.* per annum, was vested in the defendant Hugh Henshall Williamson (who was great-uncle by marriage to the intestate) John Rothwell and Richard Ecroyd Payne, in fee, as joint tenants and trustees for the persons beneficially interested therein. It was, however, in fact, managed by the defendant Hugh Henshall Williamson alone, he being the only trustee resident in the neighbourhood of the estate, and being fully conversant with the superintendence of both coal-mining and farming operations.

During the minority of the intestate, a certain portion of the rents and profits of his moiety of the Whitfield Estate was paid for his education and maintenance, and the remainder was accumulated for his benefit, according to the trusts of the instrument under which he had become entitled to such moiety. He resided at Manchester with his father, the plaintiff, until the nineteenth year of his age, when he proceeded to the university of Oxford, in order to complete his education. On the 5th July, 1857, while he was still resident at the University, he attained his majority; and shortly after that date—that is to say, in August, 1857—the trustees assigned to him the accumulations of the rents during his minority, conveyed and released to him the freehold, and covenanted to surrender to him the copyhold, portion of the said moiety. The other undivided moiety, however, of the Whitfield estate being still subject to trusts in favour of certain persons, some of whom were infants, the entirety of the said estate continued as before to be managed by the defendant H. H. Williamson, who received the rents thereof, and transmitted a moiety of them to the intestate.

The personal habits of the intestate at Oxford were of an idle and extravagant kind, and had involved him in debt before he reached his majority. It was alleged, though not conclusively proved, that the whole, or, at any rate, much the larger portion of the accumulations which he received in August, 1857, and which amounted to about 2,200*l.*, was, immediately on his receipt thereof, applied by him in liquidating some of the debts which he had thus contracted; and it was shown that, on two several occasions, viz., in November, 1857, and April, 1858, he raised two several sums of 500*l.* for the purpose of paying debts. These two several sums were raised on his moiety of the Whitfield estate by way of mortgage and further charge in favour of the said R. E. Payne, with the knowledge of the defendant H. H. Williamson, who was well aware of the habits and consequent difficulties of the young man, and had himself shortly before given him, as a present, a like sum of 500*l.*, to be applied in the like manner.

The intestate continued at Oxford until June, 1859, when he finally left the university. Before that time he had become estranged from the plaintiff, his father, and so did not return to his former home, but went to reside in lodgings at Plymouth.

Previously to this time, that is to say, in or about November, 1858, the defendant H. H. Williamson, being obliged to leave Staffordshire, on account of ill health, associated the defendant R. Williamson with himself in the receipt of the rents and profits of the Whitfield estate. This step was communicated to the intestate by the defendant H. H. Williamson in a letter, dated November 16th, 1858, in which he said, "I am obliged to go to a warmer climate, but my nephew, Mr. Robert Williamson junior, will receive the rents, and, after paying Mr. Payne, will hand you an account, and enclose you the balance." The defendant R. Williamson accordingly acted in the receipt of the rents from November, 1858, until the return of the defendant H. H. Williamson to Staffordshire, which took place in or about May, 1859. After the return of the defendant H. H. Williamson both defendants acted in the receipt of the rents, the accounts of such rents being kept principally by the defendant R. Williamson, though it was the practice to enter them in the account-book in the name of the defendant H. H. Williamson alone.

In or about the end of July, 1859, the intestate being still in difficulties, and being much pressed for payment by his creditors, wrote to the defendant, H. H. Williamson, to ask him for advice on his affairs. The defendant H. H. Williamson answered the intestate's letter by a letter dated the 30th July, 1859, in which he invited the intestate to come and see him at his house, and to bring a list of his debts with him; the intestate did not accept this invitation, but ordered a certain Oxford agent named Holloway, to send a list of his debts by post to the defendant H. H. Williamson. Mr. Holloway accordingly sent a list of alleged debts, amounting in the whole to about 1,000*l.*, to the defendant, H. H. Williamson, some time before the 26th August, 1859.

On the said 26th August, 1859, the defendant R. Williamson, who up to that time was personally unknown to the intestate, entered, with the privity and consent of the defendant H. H. Williamson, into direct communication with the intestate by sending him a letter, of which the following is the material part:—

"W. C. Tate, Esq.—Dear sir,—I have before me a letter from a Mr. Holloway addressed to my uncle, and who, I am sorry to say, is not sufficiently well to attend to business matters. The letter contains a list of debts owing, and forms a very heavy amount, which Mr. Holloway expects to be paid immediately. I will meet you in the course of a few days in London, upon having a couple of days' notice, and after hearing your views on the subject will talk over the matter and see in what way it can be arranged. Although quite a stranger to you personally I know your name in a business point of view, having received the Whitfield rents for your joint account with Mrs. K., and therefore write to you on the subject."

The intestate acceded to a proposition for a meeting between himself and the defendant R. Williamson, contained in the above letter, and interviews in consequence took place between them in London on the 5th, 6th, and 14th September following. At the first of such interviews the defendant R. Williamson informed the intestate that his uncle, the defendant H. H. Williamson, had commissioned him to endeavour to compromise the Oxford debts for 500*l.* or thereabouts, which sum his said uncle was willing to advance for that purpose. The intestate positively refused to allow any negotiation for an abatement to be attempted, saying that if he did not pay his debts in full his character would be injured. According to the defendant R. Williamson, the intestate then declared his intention of selling his moiety of the Whitfield estate, adding that he had been offered 6,000*l.* for it. Upon this the defendant R. Williamson, who admitted in his answer that he had, previously to his going up to London to see the intestate, formed a desire to become the purchaser of the intestate's moiety of the Whitfield estate, should it ever come into the market, said that he would purchase it himself if the intestate would sell it for 7,000*l.*, and allow the purchase money to be paid in instalments. The intestate acceded to these terms, and it was arranged that an agreement for sale and purchase should forthwith be drawn up by Messrs. Clowes & Hickley.

The defendant R. Williamson returned home on or soon after the 6th September; and, on the 10th September, wrote a letter to the intestate advising him to consult with his father, or, at any rate, with Mr. Payne, who, it will be recollected, was one of the trustees of the Whitfield estate, and who was a solicitor, or with some other solicitor, before finally selling his property; offering to break off the agreement in case the intestate should be advised not to sell it, or should be able to obtain a higher price. No answer seems to have been given to this letter, but, on the 14th September, an interview took place between the intestate and the defendant R. Williamson, at the office of Messrs. Clowes and Hickley, and in the presence of Mr. Wedlake, then the managing clerk of that firm. The agreement had by that time been drawn up by Mr. Wedlake, acting on the instructions of the defendant R. Williamson; but Mr. Wedlake, on hearing that the intestate had not consulted with his father, nor Mr. Payne, nor any other solicitor, on the business, refused to allow him to sign the prepared agreement. The intestate said that no consideration would induce him to go to his father, but that he had no objection to consult Mr. Payne; whereupon it was agreed that he and the defendant R. Williamson should go together to Mr. Payne, who lived at Leeds, and take the agreement with them, for the purpose of submitting it to him for his consideration. The intestate accordingly wrote a letter to Mr. Payne, which letter was subsequently lost. It appeared, however, to have simply asked whether Mr. Payne was at home or not. Mr. Payne was not at home, and word to that effect was sent to the intestate. As soon as Mr. Payne had returned home the defendant R. Williamson wrote to him asking for an interview with him on business, but not stating the nature of the business. The 5th of October was appointed by Mr. Payne as the date when he could grant the request for an interview. On that day the defendant R. Williamson and the intestate met at Mr. Payne's office, in Leeds, and submitted the agreement to him for his perusal. Mr. Payne was not consulted as to the sufficiency of the price, or the time or manner of payment, but was merely asked for his opinion on the form of the agreement, and with respect to the title of the estate, with which he was acquainted. A few unimportant alterations having been made by Mr. Payne, the agreement was re-copied, as altered, and signed by both parties there and then.

While these negotiations were pending, the defendant R. Williamson had, on or about September 10th, procured a valuation to be made by a mineral agent named Cope, of the coal mines under the Whitfield estate. Mr. Cope estimated the value of such mines at 20,000*l*. That valuation had, it appeared, since been lost. The defendant R. Williamson never communicated the fact of this valuation having been made to the intestate.

Shortly after the execution of the agreement the intestate and the defendant R. Williamson left Leeds; the intestate going back to Plymouth, and the defendant R. Williamson returning to Staffordshire. A conveyance of the intestate's moiety was then prepared and engrossed; and on the 4th April, 1860, the defendant R. Williamson took the engrossment to Plymouth, where it was executed by the intestate, in the presence of a solicitor, who was called into the intestate's lodgings, but who was consulted only as to the mere formalities of execution. On the 9th April a surrender was made by the defendant H. H. Williamson, and R. E. Payne, as the surviving trustees of the Whitfield estate (the other trustee having died in 1859), and by the intestate, of the copyhold portion of the intestate's moiety, to the use of the defendant R. Williamson. The intestate did not live to receive all the instalments of the purchase-money. He died on the 11th May, 1860.

From the time at which the intestate left Oxford until his death his habits of idleness and dissipation seem to have been continually developing and growing more confirmed. The immediate cause of his death was delirium tremens; and it was alleged that, during the whole period covered by the negociation for the sale and purchase of his property, his mind was in such a weak condition, the result of excessive drinking, that he was incapable of giving due attention to business matters. He was, moreover, very despondent about his affairs, and had an unduly exaggerated idea as to the extent of his liabilities, and the difficulty he should find in extricating himself from them.

It appeared from the evidence that all the money paid by the defendant R. Williamson, towards payment of the purchase-money for the intestate's moiety of the Whitfield estate, was advanced by the defendant H. H. Williamson to the defendant R. Williamson, for the express purpose of purchasing the property. In consequence of this fact being known to the plaintiff, the defendant H. H. Williamson was treated in the original bill as the purchaser of the property, or, at any rate, as having an interest in it to the extent of the sums so advanced towards payment. The defendant H. H. Williamson however, disclaimed all interest in the property, and in his answer to the re-amended bill, stated that the money so advanced by him to the defendant R. Williamson was given as an absolute gift; that, soon after one of the aforesaid interviews between the intestate and the defendant R. Williamson, in London, the defendant R. Williamson had communicated to him his intention of purchasing the intestate's moiety of the Whitfield estate; and that thereupon he, the defendant H. H. Williamson, had offered to make him a present of whatever money should be requisite for the purchase thereof.

Much evidence was gone into with the object of connecting the purchase by the defendant R. Williamson of the property, with an arrangement which, about the time of the completion of the purchase, was made between the defendant H. H. Williamson and the agent of Lord Sidmouth, with respect to the working of the mines under an estate of Lord Sidmouth, adjoining the Whitfield estate, in conjunction with the mines under the Whitfield estate. And it was contended that even if the defendant H. H. Williamson had no personal interest in the moiety of the Whitfield estate purchased by the defendant R. Williamson from the intestate, yet the interests of the two defendants might be considered as identical, since their relative position to each other was more like that of father and son than what it really was, that of uncle and nephew.

With respect to the actual value of the Whitfield estate, much conflicting evidence was offered by the parties to the cause. Some of the plaintiff's witnesses valued the whole estate and the minerals thereunder nearly as high as 75,000*l*.; while the opinion of experts who valued the whole estate with the mines at less than half that sum, was offered in evidence by the defendants.

The plaintiff's witnesses, too, considered that the whole estate could easily be so divided into moieties that each moiety would be of the value of half the value of the entirety; while the defendant's witnesses were of opinion that no such division into moieties could possibly be made.

It was also shown that the mines under the Whitfield estate had been worked, though with indifferent success, during some portion of the intestate's minority; and that such working had been discontinued about the year 1844. Since that time, however, the facilities for distributing the coals under the Whitfield estate have been so materially increased by the construction of a new railway, that the working of the mines at present would undoubtedly bring in a large profit.

It should be stated that the defendant R. Williamson is a man of mature age, and that he has for many years been the proprietor of land and mines in the county of Stafford.

Some time since the death of the intestate, the defendant R. Williamson offered an instalment of the purchase-money to the plaintiff, as his legal personal representative, but the plaintiff refused to take it.

W. M. James, Q.C., and Little, for the plaintiff.

Giffard, Q.C., and Kay, for the defendant H. H. Williamson, disclaimed all interest in the estate, and contended that the defendant H. H. Williamson, having been charged with scheming and combining with the other defendant, which charge had not been substantiated, was entitled to have his costs paid by the plaintiff.

*Rolt, Q.C., and Bristowe, for the defendant R. Williamson, denied that his having been employed by the defendant H. H. Williamson, to receive the rents of the Whitfield estate, placed him generally, or for the purposes of the suit, in a fiduciary position towards the intestate. The defendant R. Williamson had not, as agent, acquired any knowledge of the value of the estate, his agency having been strictly limited to receiving the rents and attending the rent dinners. They referred to Dart. Ven. & Pur. pp. 21, 22, and to Rossiter v. Walsh (4 Dr. & W. 485).*

No reply was called for.

Wood, V.C.—This case is one of a very painful character, and, as is not unusual in this class of suits, the whole matter has been brought forward in a state of considerable exaggeration on the part of the plaintiff. Persons, however, who allow themselves to be mixed up with the transactions of this sort have only themselves to blame, if, in the investigations which necessarily attend the subsequent impeachment of their transactions, imputations are made which in the end fail to be established. Upon the broad, well-settled, and most sacred principle which guides the action of this Court in its dealings with purchases made by persons standing in a fiduciary relation to the seller, it is impossible to sustain the present transaction. That principle may be stated in these few words: whenever there exists between two persons confidence, of whatever character and of whatever amount, for the Court will not define the exact character or the exact amount which is necessary to enable it to interpose, the Court will not sustain a purchase by the person trusted and confided in from the person trusting and confiding in him, unless it is shown that there was, on the treaty for the purchase, the fullest and fairest explanation and communication of every particular which rested in the breast of the person trusted or confided in. The present case might have been reduced to this one point—The young man, William Clowes Tate, being in great pecuniary difficulties, or rather in pecuniary difficulties which he considered to be great, wrote to the defendant H. H. Williamson, in whom he naturally placed the very greatest confidence, for his advice. The defendant H. H. Williamson, who is a gentleman of advanced age, and who was at the time suffering from ill health, and unable to attend to business, requested his nephew, the defendant R. Williamson, to act for him in the matter. The defendant R. Williamson accordingly took upon himself to advise the young man with reference to the arrangement of his affairs. He went to see him for that purpose, and, at his first interview with him, proposals were made for the purchase of the young man's property by his adviser. It is important to know what was the intestate's object in wishing to sell his property. Clearly he was under the impression that that was the only, or at least, the best, means in his power of raising money wherewith to pay his debts, and so get rid of his difficulties. Having made an offer for the purchase of the intestate's property at 7,000*l.*, the defendant R. Williamson's next step is to go secretly to a mineral agent and procure a valuation from him of the coal under the estate of which the intestate owned a moiety. The agent valued such coal at 20,000*l.* Now, making all due allowance for the probable difference in value between the coal under the whole estate and the coal under the two moieties of it, when they might come to be divided, it is certain that the defendant R. Williamson, soon after he had made his first proposals for the purchase of the intestate's property, was in possession of the knowledge that what he had offered for it was not so much as the value of the mines under it. Yet he says nothing of all this to the young man.

Much has been said at the bar about the advice which, during the negotiations for the purchase, the defendant R. Williamson gave the testator to consult his father or Mr. Payne, who was a solicitor, or some other solicitor. It should be observed, however, that the defendant R. Williamson never once advised the young man to consult a mineral agent. The conduct of the defendant R. Williamson, in himself consulting such an agent, has been declared to have been most natural, and what any sensible person would do after making an offer for land in a mineral district. That is quite true; but is it not equally natural for the vendor of such land to have the minerals valued previous to his selling it? Surely it is. Yet the defendant R. Williamson never even hinted to the young man, whom he had undertaken to advise, that such would be the natural and proper course of a sensible person in the young man's place.

Now let us look at the position of the intestate. He was a young man, just twenty-three years of age, and in possession of a landed property, which, even without counting the minerals under it, would have sufficed to maintain him decently and respectably. He had gone to Oxford when in his nineteenth year, and while there had entered upon a course of extravagance and recklessness. Before he had left the university he had become estranged from his father, whether in consequence of his own improvidence or for other reasons I do not stop to inquire. On attaining his majority, and while he was still at the university, he had spent, in paying debts incurred there, the sum of 1,500*l.*; 1,000*l.* of which he had raised by mortgaging his property, and the remaining 500*l.* he had received as a present from his great-uncle, the defendant H. H. Williamson. Soon afterwards, and when he was leaving Oxford, being again in difficulties, and being, as I have said, estranged from his father, he had naturally turned to this kind relative, the defendant H. H. Williamson, for advice. [His Honour then went through the facts relating to the interview between the intestate and the defendant R. Williamson in London.] At the first interview between the young man and his adviser, who up to that time had had no personal knowledge of each other, the former made an observation which would at once shew to a man of experience, like the other, how utterly deficient he was in knowledge of business and of the world. That observation was, that if any negotiations were undertaken to obtain an abatement from his Oxford debts, his character would be injured. Could anything be more absurd than this? A young man, who had already paid away 1,500*l.* in satisfying the claims of Oxford tradesmen, thinks his character will be injured if any attempt is made to compound another set of similar debts amounting to 1,000*l.* It is important to bear in mind that the defendant R. Williamson admits that, before he went up to see the intestate, he had formed a wish to become the purchaser of this property, should it ever come into the market, an event which he naturally thought not an improbable one. That being so, when the intestate says, "I am in great and pressing difficulties; I must have money at once; I shall sell my share of Whitfield;" the defendant R. Williamson doesn't say what any unbiassed person would have said—viz., that such a course was quite uncalled for; he doesn't remind the young man that the property being worth at least 7,000*l.*, and the only charge on it being a mortgage for 1,000*l.*, nothing would be easier than to raise more than sufficient money on it with which to pay in full all his alleged debts. The defendant R. Williamson confesses his position to have been such that he was unable to give unbiassed advice, and, that being the case, he had no right to undertake the duty of advising the young man at all. [His Honour then went through the transactions subsequent to the first interview, and commented on the fact that the mineral agent employed by the defendant R. Williamson had every opportunity of informing himself as to the nature and condition of the mines, in consequence of the defendant R. Williamson's uncle, the other defendant, being in possession of the estate as managing trustee.]

With respect to the letter written to the intestate by the defendant R. Williamson, on the 10th September, it may be asked, why did the defendant R. Williamson advise the intestate to consult with his father? It was not, I think, as was suggested at the bar, because he thought and believed that the intestate would not go to his father. I hope, and I see no reason to doubt, that the defendant R. Williamson was desirous, as he says in that letter that he was, to bring about a reconciliation between the young man and his father. The view I take of it is, that the defendant R. Williamson, knowing the doctrine of this Court on purchases like the one which he was then negotiating, wished to lessen the responsibility which he would otherwise incur. "If I can put him into independent hands," he thought, "I shall not be bound to disclose this valuation of the coal mines which I have had made; but if he is thrown on me altogether I shall have to tell him of it." Whether, if he had succeeded in sending the intestate to some independent adviser, this Court would on that account have held him absolved from the duty of making the valuation known or not, I will not say. I think it would not. Then, again, notice the expression in the same letter of the 10th September, that, in case the young man should wish it, he, the defendant R. Williamson, would break off the agreement; and couple that expression with the fact that there was no binding agreement at that time, and with the knowledge which the defendant R. Williamson possessed of the notions which the young man had about his character and honour. He impresses upon the young man's mind that there was an agreement, but that, plainly as an act of kindness on his part, he would not insist upon his rights, if the intestate should repent of his having entered into the contract.

With respect to the defendant H. H. Williamson, who now disclaims all interest in the purchased property, at the time the bill was filed it was by no means clear that he was not interested in it, and no blame can be attached to the plaintiff for having charged him with combining with the other defendant. As the matter now stands, however, it is clear that the defendant H. H. Williamson was informed, soon after the proposals for sale and purchase, of such proposals, and also of the valuation of the coal mines made for the defendant R. Williamson. It was the plain duty of the defendant H. H. Williamson, under the circumstances, to have at once communicated the fact of the valuation to the intestate. Instead of that, he says nothing about it, but actually advances the purchase-money for the property as a gift to the defendant R. Williamson. The defendant H. H. Williamson has shown himself to be a man of a most kind disposition towards his relatives, but in this instance he has consulted the interests of one of them at the expense of those of another. Though the bill, therefore, must be dismissed against him, it must be dismissed without costs. The sale must be set aside upon the usual terms. The plaintiff's costs must, of course, be paid by the defendant R. Williamson; and, as the form of the accounts to be taken will be upon the basis of a settled account, the decree will direct the payment by him of "the costs of the suit."

DAVENPORT v. MOSS.

14 W. R. 453; 14 L. T. 133.

Executors—Receiver—Assets.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—The retainer of his debt by an executor as against a receiver appointed by the Court is improper.

In this case the plaintiff had been appointed receiver of the estate of one Levi, the testator in the cause. The receiver was interested in the estate as mortgagee of the annuity mentioned below. The testator, by his will, had given an annuity to his daughter Mrs. Moss, who was one of his executors. She had received money from her co-executors for payment to the receiver, but, instead of doing so, had retained it on account of her annuity. Her co-executors had had notice of her assignment of her annuity to the mortgagee. There was another suit of Levi v. Moss pending, which affected the testator's estate.

Giffard, Q.C., and Daly, moved to have the money so retained by Mrs. Moss paid to the receiver by the executors.

Hardy, for Messrs. Saunders, the co-executors of Mrs. Moss, resisted the demand, on the ground that it was sought in effect to make them personally liable.

Caldecott for Mrs. Moss.

Wood, V.C., said that Mrs. Moss's conduct in retaining a sum remitted to her by her co-executors, for the purpose of being paid into court, to answer the annuity left to her, but which she had mortgaged, was highly improper. With regard to her co-executors, the notice which they had received of her assignment of her annuity, ought to have precluded them from paying any portion of it to her. Considering that the Court did not know the state of the assets, the order to be made would be (without prejudice to any application by any of the persons interested in the other suit of Levi v. Moss), that the defendants Messrs. Saunders, as executors of the testator, should, out of any assets now in their or any of their hands, or which might thereafter come to their or any of their hands, on account of income of the testator's estate, pay to the plaintiff, as receiver, the arrears and growing payments of the annuity given by the will of the testator to Rebecca Moss. Mrs. Moss must not have her costs of the motion. The mortgagee to add his costs to his debt. There would be no order as to the costs of the co-executors.

THE PENINSULAR, WEST INDIAN, AND SOUTHERN BANK
(LIMITED) v. DARTHEZ.

14 W. R. 454.

Injunction to restrain proceedings at law—Delay—Answer.

Where a defendant has not, within a reasonable time, put in his answer to a bill charging fraud against him, he cannot resist an injunction to restrain him from proceeding in his action at law.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain proceedings in an action at law on certain bills of exchange, and to obtain a commission to examine witnesses abroad. The bills in question had been drawn on the bank by the defendant Guilhou, and accepted by them. Guilhou having indorsed them (by procuration) to Darthez, Darthez presented them on maturity, and, on the bank refusing payment, brought his action. The bank alleged that the bills had been accepted by them on the faith of Guilhou's agreement with them to furnish the requisite funds for payment on their arriving at maturity, and also to indemnify them, but that Guilhou had not done so. The plaintiffs also charged that Darthez never gave any consideration for the indorsement, and that he was aware of the agreement between the bank and Guilhou; also that he was not a bonâ fide holder of the bills, but, in fact, the nominee or agent of Guilhou. The bill had been filed a month ago, but no answer had been put in.

An interim order had been granted to stay proceedings in the action.

Daniel, Q.C., and Cottrell, in support of the motion.

Willcock, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for the defendant Darthez.

In the course of the arguments a discussion arose as to whether the bank was or was not being wound up in compliance with the provisions of the Companies' Act. His Honour, however, intimated his opinion that the whole question was whether the defendant ought to have the money before putting in his answer.

Wood, V.C.—The official liquidator must make an affidavit as to the assets in his hands, and undertake not to part with them without the order of the Court. This was an attempt to introduce a practice of forcing on a motion for injunction, and then displacing the primâ facie case made by the bill by means of cross-examination, without putting in an answer. The old rule was that on filing a bill an injunction was granted at once to restrain an action at law; but the new Act had modified this practice by enacting that there should be no injunction simply for want of an answer. Under the old practice bills had been constantly filed for the mere purpose of causing delay. In such cases no answer was required, and therefore none needed to be put in. This was different from a case where an action was to be tried, and the defendant relied on his chance of breaking down the plaintiff's case on cross-examination. Assuming that there is no winding-up proved, he must order that the motion do stand over till the answer has been put in. Under the circumstances he must assume against Darthez that the allegations of the bill are correct, and they show grounds for the interference of a court of equity. He must therefore extend the interim order for a fortnight, the plaintiffs undertaking to be accountable for damages. The motion for the commission must also stand over.

Wood, V.C., Feb. 17, 19, 1866.

WOODS v. SOWERBY.

14 W. R. 454.

Practice—Creditors' suit.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where there is a clear debt the Court will not consider the interest of the debtor's estate in considering what steps should be taken for enforcing it, at least if there be any conflict of interest between the debtor and creditor.

This was an adjourned summons.

Alfred and Robert Hyde, both deceased, brothers and co-partners, were defendants in the suit of Woods v. Hyde, a suit for specific performance of a contract to purchase a freehold cotton-mill for 25,000*l.* A decree for the plaintiff was made in that suit. Before payment of the purchase-money both the Hydes died, each of them having appointed the same gentleman as one of his trustees and executors. This gentleman had been a co-partner with the brothers in their business, and is still a member of the firm to which they belonged.

The present bill was filed against both sets of executors, asking for specific performance of the contract. The answer to this bill was, in effect, "no assets." The bill was turned into a creditor's bill, and accounts of the estates of both the testators were ordered to be taken. From these accounts it appeared that the only debt due from the testator's estates was the above-mentioned debt of 25,000*l.*; that Robert Hyde's assets amounted to between 25,000*l.* and 26,000*l.*, of which 24,000*l.* was due to his estate from the said firm; and that Alfred Hyde's assets amounted to about 40,000*l.*, of which about 20,000*l.* was due from the same firm on promissory notes given by the said firm, with the understanding that the money should not be required until May, 1871. The executors of both testators said that it was impossible to realise assets at the present time sufficient to enable them to pay the whole of the purchase-money for the mill; and that with respect to the promissory notes, it would be improper and undesirable to send them into the market to be discounted at what would necessarily be a ruinous rate.

The plaintiff, who is an infant, is entitled to the whole of the purchase-money for the mill, subject to the payment thereof to her father, of the sum 10,000*l.*, secured on the mill by way of mortgage. And by the trusts of the will under which the plaintiff claims, her portion of the purchase-money, if paid into court, would forthwith have to be invested in the purchase or on the security of real estate.

The plaintiff took out a summons for leave to take such steps as might be necessary to get in the estates of the testators, Alfred and Robert Hyde.

Role, Q.C., and Bury, for the plaintiff, said that the object of the executors was to delay payment of the purchase money as long as possible, the money being more profitably employed in the business of the firm than it would be if applied in satisfying the debt due to the plaintiff. The personal estate of the testators must be got in and exhausted before the plaintiff could proceed against the realty.

E. K. Karlake and W. W. Karlake, for the defendants, offered immediate payment of the 10,000*l.* due to the plaintiff's father; and asked the Court to allow the 15,000*l.* to remain on the security of the property, such security being, as they said, ample, and of the very kind pointed out by the will. The defendants would execute a proper legal mortgage, and would pay interest at 5*l.* per cent. If the Court were to accede to this proposal the Court would be saved the trouble of finding good real security on which to invest the infant ward's money; the infant's estate would be benefited by the high rate of interest which would be paid, and the convenience of the defendants, who were engaged in cotton spinning, a business just recovering from a recent and great depression would be best consulted.

Wood, V.C., said that it was not for a debtor to consider what was best for his creditor. The debtor's duty was to pay the debt, and there his duty ended. In the present case his Honour had to consult the interests of the plaintiff, those of the debtors would be cared for only to the extent which might be necessary to avoid any risk of affecting the safe and speedy satisfaction of the debt. The plaintiff's father should be appointed receiver, of course without salary, to get in the outstanding assets of both testators, under the direction of the judge at chambers. In consequence of the receiver having a charge on the estate to the extent of 10,000*l.* no security would be required of him. His Honour would not undertake to say what course should be taken with respect to the payment of the purchase-money, as he was unwilling to prejudge questions which would come before him in chambers. Costs of the summons to be costs in the cause.

[ADMIRALTY.]

"THE ALEXANDRA."

14 W. R. 466; 14 L. T. 742.

SHIPPING.—Damage to goods—Burden of proof.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs as the owners and assignees of two bills of lading, dated respectively the 3rd of September, 1863, signed by the master of the foreign steamship Alexandra, and given for 92 casks of butter shipped in Copenhagen, and which were therein undertaken to be carried in the Alexandra from Copenhagen to Hull, and there delivered in good order and condition (the dangers and accidents of the seas excepted). On the arrival of the Alexandra at the port of Hull, nearly the whole of the plaintiffs' butter was found to be wasted and spoilt, and mixed with bran. The plaintiffs alleged that the damage was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants, and more particularly by their having improperly stowed the plaintiffs' butter in juxta-position with a quantity of bran near the engine-room of the steamer, so that the heat of the engine-room caused the liquifaction of the butter; and that the improper stowage caused the bran to mix with it.

The defendants denied that the damage was occasioned by their negligence, or by improper stowage; and, on the other hand, alleged that the cargo of the Alexandra had been properly stowed, but that, after leaving Copenhagen, the Alexandra met with heavy gales of wind which caused her to roll and labour heavily, and caused her cargo to shift, and the butter casks to break, and that the damage complained of was thereby occasioned; so that, by the terms of the bills of lading, the defendants were absolved from liability.

The hearing of the cause occupied the Court two days (30th and 31st of January), and the evidence was of a conflicting character.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and V. Lushington, for the plaintiffs.

Brett, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.

Feb. 13.—Dr. LUSHINGTON (having reviewed the evidence and recapitu-lated the facts) said—There is, undoubtedly, a serious conflict of evidence, and that, too, amongst witnesses apparently entitled to the confidence of the Court. All the Court can do, under such circumstances, is impartially to weigh that evidence, and say which, under all the circumstances, ought to preponderate. The plaintiffs are bound to establish their own case affirmatively, to the extent of proving that their goods, on arrival at the port of discharge, are in a damaged condition. This proved, the onus then falls on the defendants of proving that the original stowage was good, and that perils of the seas subsequently occurring created the damage. I think the evidence shows that the original stowage was done in the ordinary form, and with the usual precautions; that the butter became mixed with the bran, not from heat, but by the displacement and shaking up of the cargo, and that this displacement may fairly be attributed to the storm to which the vessel was undoubtedly exposed on her voyage to Christiansand; in short, that the damage arose from perils of the seas excepted in the bills of lading. I must pronounce in favour of the defendants, and dismiss the suit with costs.

Salvage.

SHIPPING.—An appraisement made by the marshal is conclusive as to the value of the property salvaged.

This was a salvage suit instituted on behalf of the respective masters, owners, and crews of the luggers Enterprise, Eclipse, Unity, Secret, Alert, and Ocean, of the cutter Fear Not, and of the life-boat Friend of all Nations, against the cargo lately laden on board the brig Venus, to obtain a reward for services rendered off the Tongue light-ship on the 10th November last.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs.

V. Lushington for the defendants.

The facts in this case were not denied by the defendants, the argument being as to the value upon which the salvage was to be rewarded.

On the 18th December the plaintiff's proctor filed commission with inventory and appraisement of the cargo annexed, the value certified by the appraisers appointed by the marshal being 1,906*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

On the 1st March an affidavit was filed on the part of the defendants, the owners, stating that the cargo had been sold and realized 1,295*l.*, less about 350*l.* for sundry expenses.

Deane, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the appraisement by the marshal ought to be held to be conclusive as to the value.

V. Lushington, for the defendants, contended that the trust test of value was the sum actually realized in the sale of the cargo.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Nothing in my opinion, unless under very extraordinary circumstances, would be so imprudent on the part of the Court as to allow an appraisement made by the authority of the Court to be departed from. An appraisement made by the authority of this Court is made with great care and impartiality, and must be deemed conclusive, unless it is objected to at the time it is brought in. I shall adhere to the appraised value, and I award the plaintiffs one-third of that value with costs.

Salvage—Appeal—Cinque Ports.

SHIPPING.—The value stated by the owners of salvaged property in proceedings before commissioners is not conclusive upon the salvor, even though assented to at the time.

This was a motion on an appeal from an award of salvage made by the Commissioners of the Cinque Ports at Ramsgate. The owners of the property salvaged had, in the proceeding before the commissioners, asserted that the value of the cargo salvaged amounted to 2,000*l.* only. The salvors not having any information on the point had tacitly consented to such value, but they had, subsequently to the award being made, discovered that the cargo had been declared at the Custom House to be of the value of 8,900*l.*

The appellants now moved the Court to direct the defendants to prove the value of the vessel, as also the quality, quantity, description, and value of the cargo.

Brett, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the appellants.

Deane, Q.C., for the respondents.

The Court granted the motion with costs.

EARL HOWE v. THE EARL OF LICHFIELD.

Equitable conversion—Legacy and succession duty.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—A certificate from the Inland Revenue Office that no further duty is payable, is all that a purchaser is entitled to under the Succession Duty Act.

This was a suit for specific performance of a contract to purchase realty.

The Hon. Robert Curzon, by his will dated October 3, 1862, devised his real property (part of which was on mortgage to the plaintiff, Earl Howe, and another), on trust by mortgage or by sale to raise a sum of 20,000*l.* for portions, and 12,500*l.* due from the testator on the said mortgage, and subject thereto in trust for Mr. Curzon, his son.

The testator died in May, 1863. The trustees, on the 14th October, 1863, put up the Hagley estate for auction in fifteen lots, and the defendant was declared the purchaser of lots 2 and 15.

On the 25th March, 1864, the defendant entered into possession of the property so purchased by him.

On the 15th July, 1864, the mortgages being paid off with the concurrence of the trustees, re-conveyed the mortgaged property to the plaintiff, Mr. Curzon, and thereupon the defendant sent a requisition, stating that "as Mr. Curzon is now to be treated as vendor by virtue of his beneficial interest under his father's will, it must be proved by the usual evidence that succession duty was paid."

The plaintiff's solicitors replied that as the devise in trust for sale was absolute, legacy duty, and not succession duty, was payable, and had been paid.

This was the only question in the suit, the defendant asserting that he was willing to complete the purchase, but that he ought not to be forced to take a title without being satisfied that the proper duty had been paid upon the succession. On the question being referred by the plaintiff to the Office of Inland Revenue, Mr. Trevor replied that "all duty in respect of the land sold had been properly paid;" but the defendants required a more definite answer, and refused to complete till that was obtained.

Selwyn, Q.C., and G. O. Morgan, for the plaintiff.—There was an absolute trust for sale, and therefore legacy duty was payable, and has been paid; but if not, we have offered to indemnify the defendant against any claim in respect of succession duty.

Hobhouse, Q.C., and Cecil Russell, for the defendant.—We purchased not under the directions contained in the will, but direct from Mr. Curzon, therefore succession duty was payable, and we ought to have a proper certificate that it has been paid, so that our title may be made a marketable one, and they cited Hobson v. Neale (17 Beav. 178).

March 13.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—In my opinion the defendant has been ill-advised, and must submit to a decree. When a certificate had been obtained from the Inland Revenue Office that no more duty was payable, the defendant was not entitled to obtain any more exact or formal certificate as to whether succession or legacy duty was properly payable. I consider, however, that under the circumstances legacy duty, and not succession duty, was payable. The fact that after the reconveyance from the mortgagees Mr. Curzon became the proper person to complete the contract, by conveying the legal estate, did not alter the character of the original contract, or disturb the equitable conversion. The trustees were the true contractors, and in their hands the property was converted into personalty, under the power of sale. No new contract was substituted for the original one, though the son of the testator became, after two years, the proper party to convey the legal estate.

The defendant must pay the costs of the suit.

WILKINSON v. EYKYN.

14 W. R. 470; 14 L. T. 158.

Partnership—Pledging the assets.

PARTNERSHIP.—W. and L. being solicitors in partnership, L., on behalf of the firm, purchased shares in an association, and paid for them by a cheque drawn on behalf of the firm although they were registered in his name alone. L. transferred the shares to W., and the partnership was dissolved. W. then applied to Messrs. E., brokers, who purchased the shares and had them in their hands, to hand them over, but they claimed a lien on them, on the ground that L., against whom Messrs. E. had recovered judgment, had requested them to accept 100*l.* as part, and hold the shares for a week for the rest. W. then filed a bill for delivery of the shares, to restrain Messrs. E.

from parting with them, and the association from registering, and for damages and costs:—Held, that W. was entitled to delivery of the shares, subject to the right of Messrs. L. to have the benefit whatever interest E. had in them.

This bill was filed for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who were sharebrokers, from handing over certain shares in the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association to any one but the plaintiff, and the association from registering any one as the holder of such shares, or paying dividends to any one but the plaintiff. It also prayed for delivery of the shares by Messrs. Eykyn to the plaintiff, and that they might pay damages and costs.

The plaintiff and A. W. D. Leather were in partnership as solicitors previously to December, 1864. In March previous the defendant Eykyn's firm (Messrs. Eykyn & Cuvelje) bought for the partners, as it was alleged, fifty shares in the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association (Limited), twenty-five of which were sold in April, and Leather paid for the remainder by a check, on behalf of the partnership, for 345*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, and the shares were registered in the name of Leather alone. On the 16th of December, 1864, the partnership of Wilkinson and Leather was dissolved, and Leather, as the bill alleged, was a considerable debtor to the firm; and the shares were transferred to the plaintiff by Leather, first in blank and then regularly. On the plaintiff sending to Messrs. Eykyn for the certificates of the shares, they, by their solicitor, claimed to hold them for a private debt due from Leather, and a correspondence took place; and on the 30th of December the plaintiff gave the company notice in writing that the shares were the property of the partnership, and requested to know the numbers of the shares, which were furnished. On the 5th of January, 1865, the plaintiff wrote to Mr. Taylor, Messrs. Eykyn's solicitor, saying he should file a bill, which was done on the 20th of March. The bill charged knowledge by Messrs. Eykyn that the transaction was a partnership one, and that they had represented to Leather that it was the common practice to register in one name of a firm; and the plaintiff insisted that Messrs. Eykyn had no claim upon the shares, and prayed as above. Mr. Eykyn (the substantial defendant, Cuvelje having only subsequently become a partner,) by his answer alleged an agreement by Leather for the lien, and that he claimed the absolute right in the shares; he denied that he had represented that it was a common practice to register in one name of a firm, and asserted that the plaintiff had been told by Leather of the pledge of the shares. Since the filing of the bill Leather had become bankrupt.

It appeared, on the evidence, that Messrs. Eykyn had recovered judgment against Leather in an action of debt, and that he had proposed, through his solicitor, to pay them 100*l.* in part thereof, and had asked them to hold the shares for a week for the balance.

Glasse, Q.C., and Charles Walker, for the plaintiff.—On the question of the right of a partner to pledge the property of the partnership for a private debt of his own, cited Young v. Keighly (15 Ves. 557); Allen v. Kilbre (4 Madd. 464).

Baily, Q.C., and Surrage, for the defendant Eykyn.

Glasse, Q.C., in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. (after stating the facts), said that he considered that the shares in question had been purchased with monies belonging to the partnership, and in the name of the firm, and that the fact that the transaction had been conducted by one partner (Mr. Leather) made no difference. Mr. Eykyn was aware of this fact, and the evidence did not go to show that there was any special authority given by Mr. Leather to him (Eykyn) to retain possession of the shares, so as to give a lien upon them for a personal debt due from Leather to Eykyn. The only thing that appeared was that judgment had been recovered in an action of debt by Eykyn against Leather, and that Leather, after such judgment, by his solicitor, proposed that Eykyn should take 100*l.* in part payment, and hold the shares for a week in respect of what was further due. Leather gave an equitable assignment of his interest in the shares of Eykyn, nothing more; and, having so done, he transferred them to the plaintiff. Then came the dissolution of the partnership, and the plaintiff (Leather being bankrupt) was a sort of continuing partner, and had a right as such to have the shares delivered up to him to be realized for the benefit of the partnership. Subject to this, Eykyn had a right to have the benefit of whatever interest Leather had in the shares (if any), which was paramount to the plaintiff's right by transfer. There must be a decree with costs, with a declaration that the certificates should be handed over to the plaintiff, Messrs. Eykyn being entitled to such right (if any) as Leather had in the shares, in priority of the plaintiff's right under the transfer. The company were entitled to their costs.

Railway company—Costs—Suits in another court authorising purchase—Jurisdiction.

· COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Railway purchase-money standing to a devisee's account in Vice-Chancellor Kindersley's court was sought to be applied to make up the purchase-money for the purchase authorised in a suit at the Rolls, and the costs of the investment and of the petition were asked against the company in proportion to the sum asked to be paid out. Although the company submitted to pay a portion of the costs of conveyance:—Held, that they were only liable to pay the costs of the application. All that the Court could do was to order payment to the vendor.

This petition prayed the application of 1,013*l.* Consols towards making up a sum of 6,200*l.*, proposed to be laid out in the purchase of land, and asked the costs against the company.

The facts were these:—The London and North-Western Railway Company had purchased a portion of the Bagot settled estates, and paid into court 900*l.*, now represented by the 1,013*l.* Consols, and standing in court to the account of the devisees under the will of the Rev. Robert Bagot. Two suits were instituted in the Rolls Court, viz., Bagot v. Bagot and Legge v. Legge, and a purchase being contemplated for 6,200*l.*, as above, and authorised by the Court in those suits, it was proposed that the 1,013*l.* should be applied in part payment of that sum. The petition stated these facts, and prayed that the 1,013*l.* might be so applied and paid to the vendors on certificate of the chief clerk of the execution of the conveyance; and further, that the company might be ordered to pay the costs of the investment and of such petition, in proportion to the amount of the fund in court now sought to be taken out.

F. Kelly, in support of the petition, at the request of the Court, stated the position of the proceedings at the Rolls, and urged that the company were liable to pay to the same extent as though the application were for the 1,013*l.* to be laid out by this branch of the Court, and in this matter. He also contended that the petitioner was entitled, to some extent, to ask a proportion of the costs of the conveyance.

Benson Blundell, for the company, resisted the right of the petitioners, on the ground that however correct the proceedings in such suits might be, they were not proceedings within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act, under which such sum was paid in, and under which only it could be taken out; submitting, however, that if it were so asked, the amount should be transferred from the present account into those suits; and submitting, also, to pay a proportion of the costs of the conveyance, and those of this application.

Authorities on the point:—Haynes v. Barton (14 W. R. 257); Brown v. Fenwick (14 W. R. 257); Re Lathropp's Charity (14 W. R. 326).

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I consider that the utmost order that can be asked is the payment over of the amount entitled in this matter to the vendor in the suit in the Rolls Court, upon his being duly certified as such vendor, and on his having executed the conveyance. But I cannot make any order as to part payment of the costs of the conveyance; I can only give the costs of this application.

Re SAMPSON. LESITER v. CAMM.

Practice—Administration summons—Parties—Married woman—Real and personal estate.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—A married woman, who was pecuniary legatee to her separate use under a will, took out an administration summons against one out of two trustees by her mother and next friend, without making her husband a party. It was alleged that the other trustee had disclaimed, but there was nothing but information to prove it; and, admitting that her husband was alive six months since, she stated that she was inclined to believe he was dead. On adjourned summons to take a decree in the husband's absence, summons dismissed with costs.

This was an adjourned summons on the question whether, on an administration summons in chambers, taken out by Susannah Lesiter, suing as plaintiff by Mary Fielding, her mother and next friend, and described as the wife of Charles Lesiter, the said Charles Lesiter was a necessary party.

The summons was taken out to administer the estate of William Woodall Sampson, Susannah Lesiter being his great-niece, and a pecuniary legatee under his will; and it was originally sought to administer both his real and personal estate, but the chief clerk struck out the words "the real and," and confined it to the personalty. The defendant was executor, and the suit being instituted without previous notice to him, he took that objection in chambers; but it was overruled by the chief clerk. The defendant's solicitor then objected that, the plaintiff being a married woman, her husband ought to be made a defendant. In answer to this the plaintiff, by her affidavit, swore that she believed her husband was dead. Time was asked to answer this affidavit, but was refused. It was insisted by the defendant that the husband was, in fact, alive, although living separate, and only in July last legal proceedings were taken to compel him to support her. The property being vested in two trustees, the defendant, the executor, and William Rooth, it was then insisted that Rooth was a necessary party, unless evidence of his disclaimer were forthcoming. No proof of such disclaimer having been given, the chief clerk confined the summons to the personal estate, as above. This was opposed, on the ground that the objection taken was an objection for want of parties, and could not be cured in that stage of the suit; but this was overruled by the chief clerk.

The plaintiff swore that the defendant threatened to sell the property: that she had been told that William Rooth had declined to act: that her husband did not reside with her at Dunnington, in Yorkshire, where she and her four children were, but at Auston, two miles distant, and that she saw or heard from him daily until six months ago, when he left Auston: that an execution was out against him for 200*l.*: that for two years previously he had been in very ill health, and was of very intemperate habits: that since he had left Auston she had never seen or heard of him, although she had used considerable exertions to do so: and that from his state of health and habits, she was inclined to believe that he was dead. The defendant swore that he believed that Lesiter was alive, but keeping out of the way to avoid process.

Lindley appeared in support of the summons, and contended that, even supposing the husband were living, he had no interest; but there was every reason to suppose that he was dead. The plaintiff was entitled to her separate use.

Roberts, contra.—The husband was a necessary party, and there was no proof of his death nor of the disclaimer of Mr. Booth. The summons must be dismissed with costs.

Authorities cited:—Johnston v. Kirkwood (4 Dr. & W. 379); Daniell's Ch. Prac. 91, 98, 118, 160, 197, 199.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., said, that having a discretionary power upon an application of this nature, he thought he ought to refuse what was asked, there being at present no sufficient proof that the husband could not be made a party. He was certainly alive six months ago, and in an adjoining village to that in which the wife was residing,—although, if that were the only difficulty, the case might be ordered to stand over for further evidence. There was, however, a difficulty in making the husband a party at all; for, on an administration summons, as a general rule, the executor or trustee only was made a party; yet in this case, no doubt, prima facie, the husband must be a party to the suit. In the case of an administration summons a decree was taken at once; whereas, on a bill filed, it might be alleged that the husband was out of the jurisdiction, and the fact might be then proved. Here realty and personalty were blended together, and no doubt it was inconvenient that one should be administered without the other. As to Mr. Rooth, in the absence of proof, it must be assumed that he had not disclaimed. This was a case in which an administration summons was a very inconvenient course. The summons must be dismissed with costs.

Re FINCH'S ESTATE.

14 W. R. 472; 14 L. T. 394.

Practice—Corporation—Costs of remaindermen.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—In a petition for the investment in Consols of a fund paid into court under the Lands Clauses Act, and payment of the dividends to the person for the time being entitled thereto, it is necessary and sufficient that the tenant of the immediate freehold should appear.

Therefore where the land was subject to a lease for ninety-nine years, if the lessee should so long live, it was—Held, that the company must pay the costs both of the lessee and the trustees in whom the freehold was vested, but not of any of the parties entitled in remainder.

This was a petition for the investment of 11,500*l.* paid into court by the Corporation of the City of London, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act as representing the purchase-money for certain hereditaments taken by them for the purposes of the Holborn Valley Improvement Act. The only question was—What costs were properly chargeable against the corporation.

The facts were peculiar:—Robert Finch, by his will, dated 19th August, 1858, devised certain freeholds and leaseholds to four trustees (all now deceased) upon trust to pay the income to Maria Finch his wife (also dead) for life, and then upon trust during the life of the petitioner (who was an alien) to retain the rents and profits, and to pay them to him for his own use and benefit. And after certain other limitations (which had all failed) there was in ultimate gift of the freeholds and leaseholds to such son of William Macdonald (one of the trustees) as should attain twenty-five, with a name and arms clause; and the testator appointed Thomas Webster his executor.

The testator died in September, 1830, his wife died in March, 1839.

The will afterwards became the subject of a suit, to which the Attorney-General was made a party as representing the Crown, on an allegation that there was no heir at law of the testator in existence, and that it was questionable whether the ultimate gift was or not void for remoteness, and whether in that case the trustees would or not be entitled to hold the lands discharged of the trust.

In the year 1845 the Vice-Chancellor of England declared that the question of remoteness could not be decided during the petitioner's life. This decision is reported under the name of Burney v. Macdonald (15 Sim. 6). The cause had since totally abated by the death of the plaintiffs.

In October, 1845, the petitioner obtained letters of denization, and thereupon the trustees, by deed dated in December, 1846, conveyed the freeholds to him for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, at a pepper-corn rent.

The land having been taken by agreement with the acting trustees, the devisees in trust of the last surviving trustee, and the money paid into Court, this petition was presented for investment in Consols, and payment of dividends to the petitioner for his life. The said acting trustees, the eldest son of William Macdonald, and the Attorney-General, had been served with the petition and appeared.

Faber, for the petitioner, stated the facts, and submitted that, under the circumstances, all the respondents were necessary parties to appear on this application, and that the corporation ought to pay their costs: The Duke of Cleveland's Harte Estate (8 W. R. 336; 1 Dr. & Sm. 46).

E. F. Smith, Q.C., for the trustees, asked for their costs. On the death of the petitioner, the question raised in Burgess v. Wheate (1 Eden, 177), would arise, and therefore the trustees had a personal interest in the fund.

Dickinson, for William Macdonald, submitted that he must have his costs either from the City or the petitioner, and declined to enter into the question which was the party liable.

A. E. Miller, for the City of London.—[KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I am of opinion that you are not bound to pay the costs of the son of Mr. Macdonald, or of the Attorney-General. I will hear you as to the trustees' costs.] This is a mere petition for an interim investment in Consols, no one but the petitioner is interested in the order, as no one could be heard to oppose the investment. In all the cases where trustees have had their costs the petition has been for investment in land, and even in that case there ought to be only one set of costs in such a case as this: Ex parte Staples (1 D. M. G. 295).

Wickens for the Attorney-General.

W. M. James, Q.C., as amicus curiæ, said that V.C. Wood, in every case where a man's property was taken, whatever his interest was, was of opinion that the company taking the land must pay all the costs.

Faber in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The question in these cases always is, whether the Court has before it all parties interested in the fund. The general rule is that the tenant for life, and he alone, should appear, and the Act of Parliament authorises him to deal with the company on behalf of all parties. But where there is a leaseholder, the tenant for life is not competent to act for him, but he must be settled with separately. If this lease had been made after the notice to treat it would have been different, but as the case stands, I think the Corporation must pay the costs of the trustees, who are, in fact, the tenants of the immediate freehold of this land.

SETTLED LAND.—Leases and Settled Estates Act—Mining lease—General power of leasing mines.

This was a petition by the assignee of the interest of a tenant for life in freehold lands, the life-interest in the surface of which had been conveyed to another person, for leave to grant a mining lease, and for a general power to grant similar leases. The application was made under the Leases and Settled Estates Act. There were several tenants for life in remainder, who refused their consent.

Prendergast, for the petitioner, referred to a precedent in 1 Seton on Decrees, 529, as illustrating the practice of the Court.

STUART, V.C.—But this decree refers to the consent of all parties. Here all parties do not consent, and the Court is obliged to be doubly cautious in the exercise of its discretion. I certainly have power under the Act to give a general power of leasing, but I cannot do so without the consent of all parties. You may take an order for this particular lease, which can be settled in chambers.

Markham Law, for four tenants for life in remainder, asked for a receiver.

STUART, V.C.—I have no power to grant you a receiver on this petition.

Haynes, for the tenants pur autre ne of the surface, objected to the form of lease to be taken.

STUART, V.C.—That can be arranged in chambers.

FORBES v. AMEEROONISSA BEGUM AND OTHERS.*

14 W. R. 481.

Mortgage — Foreclosure — Bye-bil-wufa — Production of accounts by mortgagee.

INDIA.—Regulation XVII. of 1806 first introduced a modification of the rights given to the holder of a bye-bil-wufa by the strict terms of the contract. The 7th section gives the mortgagor a right of redemption within one year after an application by the mortgagee to the Zillah Court under the 8th section. After such an application the mortgagor must either pay or tender the sum lent, or the balance due if any part of the principal has been discharged, and if the mortgagee has not been in possession, any interest that may be due, or he must make a deposit pursuant to section 2 of Regulation I. of 1798. The general effect of these regulations is that if anything be due on the mortgage, and the mortgagor make no deposit or an insufficient one, the right of redemption is gone at the expiration of the year of grace; but even then the title of the mortgagee is not complete, for he must bring a suit to recover possession if he is out of possession, or to obtain a declaration of his absolute title if he is in possession, and in that suit the mortgagor may contest the validity of the conditional sale, or the regularity of the proceedings taken under the regulation in order to make it absolute, or he may prove that nothing is due, or that the deposit is sufficient to cover what is due; but the issue, in so far as the right of redemption is concerned, will be whether anything remained due to the mortgagee at the end of the year of grace, and if so, whether the necessary deposit had been then made. If that is found against the mortgagor, the right of redemption is gone.

It is not always necessary for a mortgagee who has been in possession to produce his accounts on taking proceedings to foreclose. This necessity arises, first, when the mortgagor has deposited the principal, leaving the question of interest to be settled on an adjustment of the account; secondly, when he has deposited all that he admits or alleges to be due; thirdly, when he pleads and undertakes to prove that the whole of the principal and interest has been liquidated by the usufruct of the property.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, dated the 21st of April, 1862, which affirmed a decree of the officiating civil judge of Zillah Purneah in the province of Bengal, dated the 29th of March, 1859.

The question in this case was whether certain proceedings taken by the appellant for the purpose of foreclosing a mortgage had been effectual. The Zillah judge had dismissed his suit, and that decree had been confirmed by that of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

On the 13th of March, 1850, Shah Ally Reza, the late husband of the present respondent, executed an instrument which, upon the face of it, purported to be an absolute bill of sale to the appellant of the talook and lands therein described, in consideration of the sum of 39,500rs. On the same day the appellant executed to Shah Ally Reza an ikrah or agreement, importing that on payment of the sum of 39,500rs., with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, on the 13th March, 1851, the sale should be void, but that in the event of the seller not paying the principal and interest according to his engagement, the ikrah was to be null and void, and the purchaser (the appellant) was to become the absolute proprietor of the property. The effect of these two instruments was simply to secure the repayment of the sums lent by the appellant to Shah Ally Reza with interest on the day named, by means of that kind of mortgage which is known in India as bye-bil-wufa, or conditional sale.

The transaction between the parties, however, included something more. On the 12th of March, the day before the date of the bill of sale, Shah Ally Reza had granted a lease of the mortgaged premises for three years, ostensibly to Mr. Alexander Demetrius Forbes, the son of the appellant, and had taken the corresponding Kabooleut from him. The latter showed that the lessee had bound himself, after paying the Government revenue and other charges on the lands, to pay to the lessor, by way of rent, for the Bengali year 1258, the sum of 2,000rs.; for the year 1259, 2,332rs. 9a. 6p.; and for the year 1260, 2,399rs. 2a. 6p. And it appeared on the face of the ikrah that Shah Ally Reza had given an order to the lessee to pay by instalments out of this rent to the appellant the sum of 2,101rs., in part satisfaction of 4,740rs., which would become due on the 13th of March, 1851, for one year's interest on the 39,500rs.

It had been proved, and was not now disputed, that the grant of this beneficial lease was what is called in India a Benamtee transaction; that though taken in the name of his son it was really a lease to the appellant, who, under colour of it, obtained possession of the mortgaged premises. On the 5th April, 1851, the time fixed for the repayment of the mortgage money having expired, the appellant commenced the proceedings which must be taken in order to foreclose a mortgage of this kind and make the conditional sale absolute. And the question on this appeal was whether these proceedings had been effectual.

On the 31st of August, 1852, the Principal Sudder Ameen of the Zillah, in whose court the proceedings had been had, made an order which, after stating all that had taken place, including the claims of certain third parties, concluded thus:—"Forasmuch as the term of one year has expired from the date of the issue of notice, and the mortgagor has not deposited the amount of the mortgage, and the plea of the before-mentioned third parties is not cognizable in this miscellaneous case, therefore considering that Regulation XVII. of 1806 has been complied with, it is ordered that this suit be decided, and that the papers of the case be forwarded to the judge's court."

Upon this, on the 28th of January, 1853, the appellant commenced this suit in order to complete his title under the foreclosure. Treating, however, the lease to his son as a subsisting lease to that person, and himself as out of possession, he asked to have possession decreed to him, together with mesne profits from the 13th of March, 1851, calculated upon the rent reserved by the lease.

The answer of Shah Ally Reza alleged, by way of defence, that the appellant, before filing his petition for foreclosure in the Zillah Court, had not made the demand required by law; and, after stating the circumstances under which the lease was granted, insisted that by virtue thereof the appellant had fraudulently held possession of the mortgaged property in his son's name; and, in order to show what was the value of this possession, the answer contains a passage which, after stating the gross revenue of the various portions of the mortgaged property, amounting in all to 9,601rs. 7a. 2p., and the charges thereon amounting in all to 3,921rs. 9a. 4p., proceeds thus:—"There remains 5,666rs. 13a. 10p., as annual profit. Out of this amount, deducting 4,740rs. as interest due on the principal, the remaining sum of 926rs. 13a. 10p. must have been annually received by the plaintiff on account of the said amount of principal." The answer also insisted that the appellant was bound to render an account in conformity with sections 10 and 11 of Regulation XV. of 1793, and that the bye-bil-wufa had been vitiated by the fact of his having realized the whole of the interest, as well as a portion of the principal from the profits of the mortgaged property, and that the appellant was bound to render an account in order that the Court might be satisfied how much was due, and from whom.

The material issues settled by the judge were:—1st. Whether the plaintiff had performed the conditions prescribed by section 8 of Regulation XVII. of 1806, and was entitled to possession. 2nd. Whether plaintiff was or was not in possession. 3rd. Whether the claim for mesne profits was correct. 4th. Whether the receipt by the plaintiff of interest on the purchase-money invalidated the bye-bil-wufa.

The cause was tried by Mr. Loch, the Civil Judge of Purneah, on the 18th December, 1854.

The principal point contested on the first issue was whether there had been a sufficient demand, and this issue was found in the plaintiff's favour. On the second and the last issues the judge found that the lease was, in fact, taken by the plaintiff, who must be taken to have been, under colour of it, in possession of the mortgaged property; but that inasmuch as it was not attempted to show that the collections realized by the plaintiff covered the principal and interest of the debt, and it was, in fact, admitted that when the notice under section 8 of Regulation XVII. of 1806 was filed, a balance was due, and that there was nothing to show that the defendant had paid any part of it, the bye-bil-wufa was not invalidated, and that the plaintiff was then absolutely entitled to the property. On the third issue he found, inconsistently with his finding on the question of possession, that the claim for mesne profits was correct. The decree was for possession with the mesne profits claimed.

The defendant Shah Ally Reza appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. That Court, by its order dated the 22nd of January, 1857, held that the judge had been wrong in decreeing wassilât, or mesne profits; and further, that as the plaintiff had been found to have been in possession, he was bound, before he was entitled to have his conditional sale made absolute, to render accounts, and to show that the loan had not been liquidated with interest from the usufruct of the property; and it remanded the case, in order that the judge might call upon the plaintiff for his accounts, and then, with reference to the above remarks, decide the case according to the results shown by them.

The case went back, the plaintiff produced accounts in which he charged himself, not with the gross collections, but with the rents reserved by the lease. The then Acting Judge (Mr. Brodhurst) held that these accounts were insufficient, and that the proper accounts not having been produced he was precluded from deciding as to the balance due to the plaintiff, and accordingly by his decree, dated the 29th of March, 1859, dismissed the suit.

Against this decree the plaintiff appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, but that Court, by its order of the 21st of April, 1862, dismissed the appeal with costs; refusing to remand the cause again, in order to give the appellant an opportunity of producing the proper accounts.

He afterwards applied for a review of judgment on affidavits directed to show that he had tendered the proper accounts in the Court below, but this application was also rejected with costs, on the 21st of January, 1863.

The present appeal was from the decree dismissing the suit.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., and Melville, appeared for the appellant.

Rolt, Q.C., and Leith, for the respondent.

Sir J. COLVILLE delivered judgment.—So many points touching the regularity of those proceedings have been raised at the bar that it is desirable to state what, in their Lordships' apprehension, the law of foreclosure, as established by the regulations and the practice of the courts in Bengal is. Up to the year 1806, the rights of the holder of a bye-bil-wufa were enforceable according to the strict terms of the contract: it was necessary for the mortgagor, if he wished to save his estate from forfeiture, to tender the amount due or to pay it into court pursuant to the provisions of Regulation I. of 1798, within the stipulated period for the repayment of the loan. Regulation XVII. of 1806 first introduced a modification of the strict rights given by the contract analogous to, though by no means identical with, that which courts of equity have long imposed on mortgagees in this country. The 7th section of the regulation extended the period within which the mortgagor might redeem to any time within one year from and after the application of the mortgagee to the Zillah Court under the following section. And that section, the 8th, provided that a mortgagee, desirous of foreclosing the mortgage and rendering the sale conclusive, should, on the expiration of the stipulated period, or at any time subsequent before the sum lent was repaid, after demanding payment from the borrower or his representatives, apply for that purpose by a written petition to the Zillah judge, who should cause the mortgagor to be furnished with a copy of the application, and notify to him that if he did not redeem the property in the manner provided by the preceding section within one year from the date of the notification, the mortgage would be finally foreclosed and the conditional sale made absolute. Hence, when these proceedings have been had, it becomes incumbent on the mortgagor to take within the year the steps towards redemption which are prescribed by the 7th section. Within that period he must either pay or tender (and the proof of such payment or tender will lie on him) the sum lent, or the balance due if any part of the principal has been discharged, and also in the case in which the mortgagee has not been put into possession of the mortgaged property, any interest that may be due; or (and this is the alternative commonly adopted) he must make a deposit pursuant to section 2 of Regulation I. of 1798. That enactment, of which the object was to relieve mortgagors seeking to redeem from the difficulties of proving a tender by enabling them to pay the proper amount into Court, thus prescribes what the deposit is to be. "When the lender has not obtained possession of the lands the deposit is to be the principal sum lent with the stipulated interest thereon; but if the lender has held possession of the land, the principal sum borrowed only need be deposited, leaving the interest to be settled on an adjustment of the lender's receipts and disbursements during the period he has been in possession. In either of these cases the deposit preserves to the borrower his full right of redemption, and entitles him to immediate possession of the land if that is in the possession of the lender, subject to the adjustment of the accounts." A third case is then provided for as follows:—"If the borrower in any case shall deposit a less sum than above required, alleging that the sum deposited is the total sum due to the lender for principal and interest, after deducting the proceeds of the lands in his possession, or otherwise, such deposit shall be received, and notice given to the lender as above directed, and if the amount so deposited be admitted by the lender, or be established on investigation to be the total amount due to him, the right of redemption shall be considered to have been fully preserved to the borrower, who will not however in such cases be entitled to the recovery of the lands until it be admitted or established that he has paid the full amount due from him. The 3rd section prescribes the manner in which the lender is to account in those cases in which an account shall be necessary.

The general effect of these regulations is, that if anything be due on the mortgage, and the mortgagor makes an insufficient deposit, and a fortiori if he makes no deposit at all, the right of redemption is gone at the expiration of the year of grace. The title of the mortgagee, however, is not even then complete. It was ruled by the circular order of the 22nd July, 1813, No. 37, and has ever since been settled law, that the functions of the judge under Regulation XVII. of 1806, section 8, are purely ministerial, and that a mortgagee, after having done all that this regulation requires to be done in order to foreclose the mortgage and make the conditional sale absolute, must bring a regular suit to recover possession if he is out of possession, or to obtain a declaration of his absolute title if he is in possession. In that suit the mortgagor may contest on any sufficient grounds the validity of the conditional sale, or the regularity of the proceedings taken under the regulation in order to make it absolute. He may also allege and prove, if he can, that nothing is due, or that the deposit (if any) which he has made is sufficient to cover what is due; but the issue, in so far as the right of redemption is concerned, will be whether anything, at the end of the year of grace, remained due to the mortgagee, and if so, whether the necessary deposit had been then made. If that is found against the mortgagor the right of redemption is gone. The learned counsel for the respondent, in the course of their able argument, maintained the propriety of the dismissal of this suit upon various grounds, of which some do, and some do not, directly arise upon the decrees now under appeal. And it seems convenient to consider the latter in the first instance.

Mr. Rolt insisted that inasmuch as it had been conclusively found that the appellant was in possession of the mortgaged premises, and the plaint was, nevertheless, for possession and mesne profits, the form of the suit was of itself a sufficient ground for its dismissal. Such, however, was not the view taken in the courts below. If it be granted that this point is raised, and it is not very clearly raised by the answer, it does not appear to have been among the grounds of the respondent's appeal from Mr. Loch's decree; which, though not set out in extenso in the record, are noticed by the Sudder Court in its judgment of the 22nd January, 1857. The objection, if made, was certainly not treated as a valid one by the Sudder Court, which did not dismiss the suit, but remanded it for re-trial on the production of the accounts. That remand implied that the appellant might succeed. The real object of the suit is to perfect his title as absolute owner of the property; and their Lordships do not see why he should not have that relief, if he be otherwise entitled to it, because, under an erroneous view of the effect of the lease, he has asked for it by his plaint in a somewhat different form, and with something to which he is not entitled. It was also urged that the bye-bil-wufa, the ikra, the lease, and the kabooleut must be taken together as one transaction; that the effect of the two latter so qualified that of the two former that the mortgage must be taken to have been in its inception one for the term of three years, and that, until the expiration of the term, the appellant was not at liberty to take any step towards foreclosure. Their Lordships have to observe that this was not one of the issues in the cause, and that the point is not even raised on the pleadings, nor do they think that this defence could have been successfully raised. The respondent cannot both repudiate the obligations of the lease and claim the benefit of it. That transaction has been held, and properly held, not to effect that for which it was probably designed, viz., to save the appellant from the liabilities, whilst it gave him the advantages of a mortgagee in possession: still less can it be taken to do what it was never meant to do—viz., modify the terms of the conditional sale. It was further urged that the proceedings in the Sudder Ameen's Court, under section 8 of Regulation XVII. of 1806, were irregular, both by reason of the insufficiency of the demand, and the non-production of the accounts in the course of those proceedings. One of the issues in the cause, when it was before Mr. Loch, was whether the plaintiff had performed the conditions prescribed by the Regulations, and that issue was found in his favour. As far as appears from the printed record, the respondent did not appeal from that finding. He had undoubtedly raised in the Zillah Court the question whether there had been a sufficient demand, and the fact had been found against him. He had not taken the point that the accounts ought to have been produced in the preliminary proceedings. Their Lordships are disposed to think that upon the true construction of the Regulations, and of the Circular Order, it is not necessary either that the demand should be for the specific sum ultimately ascertained to be due, or that the accounts of a mortgagee in possession should be produced in these preliminary proceedings, in which they cannot be investigated.

The questions which really arise upon the decrees under appeal, and on which the determination of this appeal depends, are these:—1st. Whether the Sudder Court was right in requiring the appellant to produce his accounts, and in remanding the cause for re-trial on the production of those accounts by, its order of the 22nd January, 1857. 2ndly. Whether, if it were wrong in so remanding the cause, the appellant is not now bound by that decree, against which he did not appeal. 3rdly. Whether the Zillah judge and the Sudder Court were right in dismissing the suit because the appellant had not produced the proper accounts, or whether they ought to have given him further time for so doing. Their Lordships, considering the first question independently of the authority of decided cases are of opinion that, upon the true construction of these regulations, there was no necessity for calling for the production of the accounts, and consequently, that the order for the remand was wrong. The issue upon which the determination of the cause depended, and upon which even by the order of remand it was made to depend, was whether the loan had been liquidated, with interest, from the usufruct of the property. Now, not only was there no allegation on the pleadings, or issue raised in the cause, to the effect that the loan had been thus liquidated, but there was an express admission on the face of the defendant's answer that even on his mode of stating the account, the principal sum of 39,500rs. had, when the foreclosure proceedings were commenced, and when he ought to have made the requisite deposit, been reduced by no more than 927rs. It was therefore clear, upon the face of the proceedings, that the question to be tried could be answered only in one way, and that in favour of the appellant. And the order of remand can be supported only on the principle that, in all cases, it is imperative upon a mortgagee who has been in possession to produce his accounts. For this position their lordships can find no grounds in the regulations. The words of the 3rd section of Regulation I. of 1798, from which (if at all) an inflexible obligation to produce the accounts must be inferred, are, "In all instances wherein the lender on a bye-bil-wufa may have been put in possession of the land, and an adjustment of accounts may consequently become necessary between him and the borrower, the lender is to account, &c." Two conditions are expressed, the possession of the mortgagee, and the necessity of an account. And a comparison of this, with the preceding section, and with Regulation XVII, of 1806, shows that the necessity arises, and need only arise, first, when the mortgagor has deposited the principal leaving the question of interest to be settled on an adjustment of the account; 2ndly, when he has deposited all that he admits or alleges to be due; 3rdly, when he pleads, and undertakes to prove, that the whole of the principal and interest has been liquidated by the usufruct of the property.

It remains to be seen whether the proposition that the mortgagee, who has been in possession, must in all cases produce his accounts, has been conclusively established by the authority of decided cases. The cases cited by the Sudder Court, in its judgment, and now relied on by the respondent, are reported in the decisions of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal for 1852, pp. 678 and 1063. The transactions out of which these cases arose were not mortgages by way of conditional sale, but mortgages of a different character, and governed by different rules. Neither authority, therefore, seems to touch the point now under consideration. On the other hand, in a more recent case, which is reported amongst the decisions of the same Court for 1859, at p. 492, the Court held that, there being no averment in the answers, that the plaintiff had paid himself by the usufruct of the property, the objection that the mortgagee had not produced his accounts could not be entertained on the appeal. The question, therefore, cannot be said to have been concluded against the appellant by authority; and their Lordships have already intimated their opinion that upon principle the obligation to produce the accounts should depend on the circumstances of the case and the nature of the issues raised. Upon the question whether the appellant is so bound by the order of the 22nd of January, 1857, against which he did not appeal, that he cannot impeach the correctness of the remand, their Lordships have to observe that the order was an interlocutory one; that it did not purport to dispose of the cause; and, consequently, that upon the principle laid down by the committee in the case of Maharajah Moheshur Sing v. The Bengal Government (7 W. R. 322; 7 Moo. I. Ap. 283), upon which their Lordships have very recently acted in a case from Oude, the appellant is not now precluded from insisting that the remand for the production of the accounts was erroneous; or that the cause should have been decided in his favour, notwithstanding the non-production of the accounts. In truth, the learned judges of the Sudder Court, by their judgment of the 21st April, 1862, treated the latter point as still open to the appellant, although, upon grounds which appear to their Lordships to be unsatisfactory, they determined it against him.

The view which their Lordships have taken of the questions already considered renders it unnecessary to determine whether the appellant ought to have been allowed further time, or a second opportunity for the production of the accounts required from him. Their Lordships will only say, upon this point, that the affidavits filed by him on an application for a review are, when contrasted with his grounds of appeal, extremely unsatisfactory, and that he appears to have done little to entitle him to the indulgence of the Court. They are therefore not prepared to say that if the production of the accounts required had been necessary, those delivered were insufficient; or that in that case there would have been any such improper exercise of the discretion of the Court below as their Lordships would have interfered with. But they think that the error of the Court below was in the dismissal of the suit, on the assumption that the production of any accounts was necessary in a case in which there was neither plea nor proof that the usufruct had liquidated principal and interest, and no deposit had been made to cover the balance admitted to be due.

Their Lordships, on the whole case, are of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and they will humbly recommend her Majesty to reverse the decrees appealed against, and also the order of remand of the 22nd January, 1857, and to vary the decree of the 18th December, 1854, by declaring that the appellant was entitled to the possession of the mortgaged premises as absolute owner, by virtue of the conditional sale which had been duly made absolute, but was not entitled to a decree for any mesne profits. Their Lordships think that the appellant is entitled to the costs of this appeal, and also to all costs of the suit below, up to and including the costs of the order of the 22nd January, 1857. Considering that he might have appealed against that order, and that his conduct in the subsequent proceedings in the court below has not been satisfactory, their Lordships are not disposed to recommend that he should have the costs of those proceedings against the opposite party. He will of course be entitled to a refund of the costs (if any) which have been paid by him under any of the decrees reversed.

Decree reversed.

SOUTHERN v. HARRIMAN.

14 W. R. 487.

Specific performance—Purchase of lease—Uncertainty of term.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—The Court will not assume that a purchaser has agreed to purchase the vendor's interest, whatever it may be, unless the language of the agreement is clear.

An agreement for the purchase of a lease, which does not mention the length of the term granted by the lease, is void for uncertainty, and cannot be enforced.

This was a bill for specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of a lease of a coal mine and fireclay called Whickham Pit.

George Southern was a lessee under the late Lord Ravensworth, of Whickham Pit for twenty years from the 13th of March, 1847, but no formal lease was ever executed. Lord Ravensworth and George Southern both died in March, 1855, and the plaintiffs continued to work the pit.

In April, 1860, negotiations were entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants, which ended in an agreement of the 25th of April, 1860. The following were the material parts:—

“The terms of agreement made between Harriman & Co., and Southern Brothers, for Whickham Pit. Amount of purchase-money to be 900*l.*” payable as therein mentioned. “Southern Brothers to get the rent of coals to Lord Ravensworth reduced to fifteen shillings per ton; fireclay to four shillings per ton. The lease and agreement to be subject to Harriman & Co.’s solicitor’s approval.”

It appeared that the memorandum under which the late George Southern held, was not mentioned to the defendants when the agreement was executed. The defendants were let into possession on the 1st of May, 1860, and worked the mines.

On the 1st of October, 1862, the plaintiffs obtained a lease for twelve years from the 24th of April, 1862, from Lord Ravensworth, and shortly afterwards informed the defendants of it, and required them to complete their contract. The defendants refused to do so, and this bill was filed on the 23rd of May, 1863.

The defendants admitted the agreement, and the taking possession, but refused to perform the agreement on several grounds. The meaning of the term “Whickham Pit” was doubtful. The agreement did not state the length of term, or the amount of the rents and royalties. The plaintiffs were not in a position to perform their part of the agreement, and had been guilty of gross delay; and the defendants had given up possession in April, 1862.

The case came on to be heard before Vice-Chancellor Wood, in April, 1864, when a decree was made in favour of the plaintiffs. The case is reported, and the facts are more fully stated, in 12 W. R. 704.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Willcock, Q.C., and Faber, for the plaintiffs, the respondents.

Rolt, Q.C., Giffard, Q.C., and Hardy, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.

Willcock, Q.C., in reply.

Feb. 9.—LORD CRANWORTH, C., after stating the facts, and the decree of the Vice-Chancellor, proceeded as follows:—His Honour construed the agreement as an agreement to purchase, not the mines, or a lease of the mines, but only the estate and interest of the plaintiffs in the mines. I confess I am unable to agree with his Honour in so construing the agreement. The defendants certainly knew that what they were purchasing was a lease only, and was not the fee simple; that is apparent from the terms of the agreement, but I can discover nothing on the face of the agreement to show that they did not suppose they were to have a good and valid lease, but were to be content with a demise or assignment of the interest of the plaintiffs, whatever that interest might be. No doubt a person may, when entering into a contract of purchase, agree to accept, and be content with, whatever title the seller can give him; but such a condition cannot be imported into a contract unless the language is such as clearly to warrant it; and here I can discover nothing of the sort. The agreement is very loosely and imperfectly worded, but the subject-matter of the intended demise, the price to be paid for it, and the rent to be reserved, sufficiently appear. The subject-matter of the demise was Whickham Pit, and what that consisted of was a matter to be shown by parol evidence. The sum to be paid was 900*l.*, to become due by certain stipulated instalments, and the mining rent was to be one and threepence per ton for coal, and fourpence per ton for fireclay. So far the agreement is sufficiently clear and definite. But the agreement is silent as to the length of the term for which the lease was to be granted. The defendants, by their answer, among other objections, insist on this as a reason why they ought not to be called on to perform the agreement. I own that I think the objection is well founded. The omission to fix the term made the whole agreement uncertain. It was therefore the duty of the Court to dismiss the bill at the hearing, unless it could discover from the pleadings and evidence then before it, circumstances enabling it to decree a specific performance in spite of the uncertainty of the agreement itself. This might be; for, though by reason of uncertainty in its terms, the Court may be unable to enforce an agreement which is wholly unperformed; yet, if the agreement has been so acted upon that the Court is able to deduce from the conduct of the parties a supplemental parol agreement partly performed, and making certain that which was previously uncertain, it may then decree specific performance of the original agreement, notwithstanding its uncertainty, qualifying and adding to it in such manner as the conduct of the parties may warrant. I have looked through the pleadings and the evidence at the hearing, but I can find nothing which shows what the term was to be for which a lease was to be granted to the defendants. According to the construction which the Vice-Chancellor put on the agreement, all difficulty on this head was removed. The defendants were, according to his Honour's construction of the agreement, to have whatever interest the plaintiffs had, and no more; and it was immaterial, therefore, whether their term was longer or shorter. But, in the view which I take of the case, there is no such limitation as to the defendants' right under the agreement, and it is therefore absolutely necessary to ascertain what length of term they were entitled to claim. Neither the agreement itself, nor the conduct of the parties, enables me to ascertain this. The evidence at the hearing showed that, at the date of the agreement, the plaintiffs were working the mines under an agreement of April, 1846, by which the late Lord Ravensworth had agreed to demise them to George Southern, deceased, father of the plaintiffs, for a term of twenty years from March, 1847. It was not however shown that this, even if it was material, was ever communicated to the defendants. They were let into possession a few days after the date of the agreement of the 25th of April, 1860, and continued in possession, as they say, up to the 30th of April, 1862, as the plaintiffs say, up to the filing of the bill. When they were in possession a great deal of correspondence passed between them and the plaintiffs, but from no part of it can I even now discover what was the term to which the defendants were to be entitled. On the 1st of October, 1862, after the defendants say they had given up possession, the plaintiffs obtained a lease to themselves from the present Lord Ravensworth, for a term of twelve years from April, 1862; and, by their bill, they offer to assign this term to the defendants, or to make to them an underlease co-extensive with it, I presume, in point of duration. But there was nothing before the Court, at the hearing, tending to show that the defendants had agreed to accept such term. The original defect, therefore, from uncertainty, remained wholly unremoved; and it was, in my opinion, the duty of the Court to dismiss the bill. The view which I have thus taken on this point of uncertainty makes it unnecessary for me to consider the other objections insisted on by the defendants. I am of opinion that the case is one on which no relief can be given, and it is therefore my duty to reverse the original decree and the subsequent order on further consideration, and to order the bill to be dismissed with costs.

HOPE v. CARNEGIE.

14 W. R. 489; L. R. 1 Ch. 320; 14 L. T. 117; 12 Jur. N.S. 284: affirming, [1866] E. R. A. 2682; 14 W. R. 260; 13 L. T. 624 (V.C.).

Injunction—Restraining proceedings in a foreign court—Domicil.

INJUNCTION. INTERNATIONAL LAW.—A testator made his will in England, disposing of both real and personal estate in England and Holland. A decree was made in a common administration suit in this court for the administration of the estate. One of the legatees, not a party to the administration suit, alleging that the testator was domiciled in Holland, commenced proceedings there for the distribution of the whole of the estate, real and personal. A bill was then filed to restrain those proceedings, and an injunction for that purpose was granted in the court below, but no restraint was put upon any future proceedings in Holland with reference only to the real estate situate in that country.

On appeal, that order was affirmed (dissentiente KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., as to a part thereof).

Per KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J.—The appellant ought to have liberty to continue, if she could, the suit already instituted in Holland, in respect only of the real estate situate there.

Per TURNER, L.J.—It lay upon the appellant to show that the proceedings in Holland were capable of being continued in respect of one class of property alone, and, that not having been shown, she ought to be restrained from continuing those proceedings.

This was an appeal, by way of motion, from an order made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart, granting an injunction to restrain the defendant, Miss Hope, from continuing certain legal proceedings in Holland, or instituting any other proceedings there in regard to the personal property of the testator in the cause.

The facts of the case are stated 14 W. R. 260.

Swanston (Bacon, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—The defendant ought not, at any rate, to be compelled to institute new proceedings in Holland in respect of the real estate situate there. Moreover no step was taken to obtain an injunction till six months after this bill was filed. All this time the defendant was allowed to go on with the proceedings in Holland, and there has clearly been laches. It is plain, from the evidence, that there is a serious question as to the domicil of the testator. This question was not raised in the suit of Hope v. Beresford Hope, which was a common administration suit; but the question having been first raised in the Dutch court, it should be decided there. At any rate this would be the most convenient course. The fact that no decree has been yet made in a suit in which the question of domicil is raised, distinguishes the present case from Bunbury v. Bunbury (1 Beav. 318).

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., Malins, Q.C., and Hemming, for the respondents.—The injunction ought to have been extended further than it was by the Vice-Chancellor, so as to prevent the defendant from instituting any future proceedings as to the real estate in Holland. The testator has clearly expressed his intention to dispose by his will of his real property wherever situate, and the certificate was made in the other suit before the proceedings in the Dutch court were commenced. The real estate in Holland is but of small value, and, according to the defendant's own showing, she would be entitled by Dutch law to only one-fifth of three-fourths of that estate. The persons entitled to the other four-fifths acquiesce in the English proceedings. The proceedings already instituted in Holland are for the distribution of the whole moveable and immoveable property of the testator, and there is nothing to show that they can be continued with regard to the real estate alone. As to the alleged delay, nothing has been done in the Dutch proceedings, but to serve the summons on the executors, to which they have appeared and given security for costs. The case is clearly within the principle of Bunbury v. Bunbury. The real estate is necessarily connected with the administration of the whole property. The plaintiffs are quite willing to give such an undertaking as was given in Bunbury v. Bunbury, with reference to the proceedings in the Dutch court.

Swanston, in reply.—The defendant was not a party to the other suit, nor served with notice of the decree. The question of domicile would never have been raised had she not instituted the proceedings in Holland.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J.—My impression is that the order of the Vice-Chancellor must stand, except so far as it restrains the proceedings as to the landed property in the Netherlands. It may or may not be possible to proceed as to the landed property in the Netherlands, without proceeding as to the personal estate. That must depend on the course of law there. Whatever may be the effect of this Court's declining to prohibit proceedings as to the landed estate in the Netherlands, my impression is it ought not to be done, and that the appellant should be at liberty, if she can do so according to the law of the Netherlands, to proceed there as she may be advised as to the landed estate in the Netherlands. Subject to that, I think the order is substantially right; but as my learned Brother is of opinion that, under the special circumstances of the case, the order should stand, even as to restraining proceedings as to the landed estate in the Netherlands, the whole order will stand, although I dissent from a portion of it.

TURNER, L.J.—I think that the whole of the order must stand, so as to restrain proceedings as to the landed estate in the Netherlands; that is, I mean, to restrain proceedings in the suit instituted there, both as to the landed estate, and as to the personal estate; because, in my opinion, it rests upon the party making this motion to show that it is possible, in the suit which has been instituted in the Netherlands, to distinguish the proceedings as to the landed estate from the proceedings as to the personal estate. I go no further than that, because it is unnecessary to go further upon the present motion. If it had been shown that the landed estate in the Netherlands could be separated from the personal estate there, another and a different question would have arisen. I do not enter into that question at all, as it is not before us on the present occasion. We cannot, upon the present application, extend adversely to the appellant the order which the Vice-Chancellor has made, so as to restrain proceedings in the Netherlands altogether in respect of any part of the real estate. I am not at all sure how that question might ultimately stand if that application were brought before us, because this Court, according to my view of the case, and I have looked pretty carefully into it, must necessarily take the question as to the real estate in the Netherlands, and ascertain for itself what the law of the Netherlands is with reference to the power which the testator had to devise the estate, and with reference also to the question whether, if he had not the power to devise the whole estate, he had not at least the power to devise one-fourth of the estate; and so this suit might have to be dealt with as supplemental to the administration suit. And that brings the case very close upon the case of Bunbury v. Bunbury, which Lord Langdale dealt with on that principle, taking the undertaking of the party who applied to this court for its intervention to be bound by any order which this court might afterwards make, in order to use the proceedings in a foreign court for the purpose of determining a question which this Court was compelled to determine, whether the estate did or did not pass. It appears to me that the whole matter had better be treated in this court. If the parties object to that I do not think we can alter the order adversely to them at the present time. The plaintiff's costs of the appeal will be costs in the cause, and if the defendant will agree to the same form of order as was made in Bunbury v. Bunbury, her costs may come out of the estate, otherwise there will be no order as to her costs.

GILL v. NEWTON.

14 W. R. 490; 14 L. T. 240; 12 Jur. N.S. 220.

Mortgage—Power of sale—Notice—Subsequent deed of arrangement—Mortgagee in possession.

MORTGAGE.—A mortgage deed contained (inter alia) a power of sale, exercisable by the mortgagee on three months' notice to the mortgagor, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or any or either of them. Some time after the execution of the mortgage deed a deed of arrangement was made between the same parties, by which the mortgagee was empowered to enter into possession of the mortgaged property, and to receive the rents on certain trusts therein declared. There was a declaration that nothing in this deed contained should prejudice the rights of powers of the mortgagee under the mortgage deed, and a further declaration that the mortgagee might, at any time after a specified day, determine the trusts thereof, and that, on delivering of such notice, the mortgagee should be at liberty to exercise the powers vested in him by the mortgage deed to the same extent as if such trusts had never been declared. The mortgagee entered into possession under this second deed, and some time after the said specified day he gave notice to exercise his power of sale, but he never gave any notice to determine the trusts of the second deed:—Held, reversing the order of the Master of the Rolls, that the power of sale could not be exercised so long as notice had not been given to determine the trusts of the deed of arrangement.

It is not necessary to give notice of the intention to exercise a power of sale contained in a mortgage deed to a devisee of the mortgagor when the mortgage deed provides that the notice is to be given to the mortgagor, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or any or either of them.

By an indenture dated the 11th April, 1847, and made between Thomas Gill (since deceased), the husband of the plaintiff, of the one part, and the defendant of the other part, certain property was conveyed to the defendant by way of mortgage. In the indenture was contained a power of sale, with a proviso that the defendant, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should not exercise it, unless and until he or they should have given a notice in writing to Thomas Gill, his heirs, executors, or administrators, any or either of them, to pay off the moneys owing on the security of the said indenture, and default should have been made in payment of such moneys for three calendar months from the time of giving such notice.

Several further charges were made upon the property in favour of the defendant, and ultimately an indenture, dated the 5th July, 1861, and indorsed on the original mortgage, was made between the same parties, whereby the property was made subject to a further charge in favour of the defendant, and the defendant was authorised and empowered by the plaintiff to enter into possession of the property, and to receive the rents and profits thereof, upon certain trusts therein mentioned. And it was thereby declared and agreed, that nothing therein contained should prejudice or affect the rights, remedies, powers and authorities respectively vested in the defendant, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, under or by virtue of the therewithin written indenture, and other the securities thereinbefore mentioned, referred to, and contained, or any of them, or the provisions for the safety or the protection of the purchasers contained in the therewithin written indenture, or any of them, it being the true intent and meaning of the parties thereto, that the indenture now in statement should take effect as a deed of arrangement between the parties thereto, but should not affect the title to the said premises comprised therein. And it was further declared and agreed that it should be lawful for the defendant, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, on, or at any time after the 31st December then next, upon notice in writing to Thomas Gill, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or any or either of them, to determine and put an end to all and every the trusts by the said indenture now in statement declared of the rents and profits to be received by the defendant after the said 31st December, and that, upon the delivery of such notice, the defendant, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, should be at liberty to use and exercise the rights, remedies, powers, and authorities respectively vested in him, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, under or by virtue of the said mortgage deed and other the securities thereinbefore mentioned, referred to, and contained, or any of them, to the same extent, and in the same manner, in every respect, as if such trusts had never been created or declared.

Shortly after the execution of this last deed the defendant entered into possession under it, and he had never given any notice to determine the trusts thereof.

Thomas Gill died on the 20th October, 1861, having devised and bequeathed to the plaintiff all his real and personal estate, and having appointed three other persons executors, one of whom alone proved the will.

The defendant gave notice on the 2nd November, 1865, to the executor, of his intention to exercise the power of sale.

This bill was filed by the devisee against the mortgagee on the 31st January, 1866, and it prayed the usual accounts and decree for redemption, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling the property.

The Master of the Rolls refused the injunction.

Selwyn, Q.C., and C. H. Smith, for the appellant.—The injunction ought to have been granted for two reasons:—First, the notice to exercise the power of sale was given only to the legal personal representative of the deceased mortgagor, who had no interest in the property. It ought, on a fair and equitable construction of the proviso, to have been given to the devisee, who was the only person interested in the property. This is not a question of the rights of a purchaser, who might be entitled to protection under the terms of the proviso, but it is entirely a question between the parties to the mortgage deed. Secondly, the true construction of the deed of arrangement is, that the mortgagee could never exercise the power of sale at all, so long as he was in possession under the terms of that second deed. He was in possession as a trustee, and not in the position of a receiver under a common receivership deed, and that possession could only be terminated by giving notice in the way provided by the second deed. This notice has never been given. They cited O'Connor v. Spaight (1 Sch. & Lef. 309); Jenner v. Morris (9 W. R. 391, 3 D. F. J. 45).

Baggallay, Q.C., and E. Charles, for the respondent.—The argument on the other side really comes to this—that after notice had been given to exercise the power of sale, the exercise of that power could be at once stopped if the mortgagor chose to file a redemption bill. At any rate there can be no doubt that the word "assigns" was purposely left out of the proviso for notice of the exercise of the power of sale in order to simplify the position of the mortgagee, and the parties must be bound by the terms of their contract. As to the second deed: its object was merely to enable the mortgagee to enter into possession without incurring the liabilities of a mortgagee in possession. It is simply equivalent to a common receivership deed, which would not affect the mortgagee's rights at all. The notice to terminate the trusts of the second deed might be given at any moment before the actual sale. At any rate it would be nugatory to grant an injunction, since notice could be given to-morrow to determine the possession under the second deed, and then a sale could be made in three months. In King v. Heenan (3 D. M. G. 890), it was held that a receivership deed did not interfere with the rights of a mortgagee, though there was no declaration as there is in the present case to that effect. The registration of this suit at a lis pendens would be quite enough to affect any purchaser under the power of sale.

Selwyn, Q.C., in reply.—If the sale could not take place for three months we should have ample time to pay off the mortgage debt. The effect of registration as a lis pendens would simply be to depreciate the price obtained at the sale.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J.—Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I think that the order under appeal should be discharged, and that there should be an injunction to restrain this sale, but without prejudice to any question in the cause, the plaintiff undertaking to speed the cause, and to abide by any order the Court may ultimately make as to the property. My opinion is founded on the very peculiar character of the instruments, and especially of the deed of arrangement, the validity and consequences of which deserve great consideration, and are open to much argument. But, for the existence of that deed, I am by no means satisfied that I should have thought the injunction due. The costs must be altogether reserved.

TURNER, L.J.—With great respect to the Master of the Rolls, I also think that the injunction is due. In saying this I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not at all proceed upon the ground that the amount due upon the mortgage is in dispute. If that were so, a mortgagor would have but to raise a dispute about the sum due, in order to deprive his mortgagee of his remedies under the mortgage deed. Nor should I be inclined to interfere upon the facts as they stand with regard to the mortgage deed. That deed has provided a particular mode in which notice of the intention to exercise the power of sale must be given, and the notice has been so given. The party who has entered into such a contract cannot complain of its consequences. But, with regard to the second deed, there is a substantial ground upon which the Court is bound to interfere. It is not, as has been argued, a simple receivership deed. It contains an express clause that, upon a particular act being done, the mortgagee shall be at liberty to exercise his powers and rights under the mortgage deed. I think it a serious question whether the true construction of this deed is not, that the reservation to the mortgagee, in the former part of the deed, of all his powers under the mortgage deed, is to be taken as made by the latter part of the deed, to be subject to this exception—that they are not to be exercised except upon the delivery of the notice mentioned in the latter part of the deed. This seems to be a reasonable and fair construction, and at any rate it is so open to argument, that I think the injunction must be granted. The costs, both here and at the Rolls, must be costs to the cause.

By consent an immediate decree for redemption was taken.

THOMAS v. TAYLOR.

14 W. R. 493.

This was an application, on the part of the defendant, to take the amended bill off the file for irregularity. The plaintiff had, after the defendant had answered, obtained an order of course to amend on payment of twenty shillings costs. He filed his amended bill on the last day limited for that purpose, but did not, till after that day, tender the twenty shillings to the defendant. Vice-Chancellor Stuart refused the application with costs, and the defendant appealed.

Caldecott, for the appellant, now moved accordingly.

Rodwell, for the plaintiff, contrà.

The LORDS JUSTICES refused the motion with costs, and the defendant, by his counsel, now admitting and undertaking to admit at the hearing the facts stated by way of amendment, ordered that no answer be required in respect of the amendments.

Re TRUMP.

14 W. R. 494.

Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192—Registration of deed of assignment for benefit of creditors—Affidavit of debtor.

BANKRUPTCY. N.—The affidavit of the debtor usually required upon the registration of a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors may be dispensed with.

This was an application for a direction to the Registrar in bankruptcy to register a deed of assignment, made by Trump for the benefit of his creditors, without the usual affidavit of the debtor, but upon an affidavit of an accountant who had investigated the position of the estate. The application had been made to Commissioner Goulburn, and he had refused it. Trump was abroad, and this was the last day for making the registration.

Swanston now applied to the Court ex parte. He referred to section 192 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and to the 19th of General Orders made thereon. The affidavit has been, in some cases, dispensed with, as, for instance, where the debtor was in gaol, and refused to make the affidavit.

The LORDS JUSTICES directed notice to be given to the creditors who had not executed the deed, and the matter to be then mentioned again. Meanwhile, the deed to be provisionally registered.

March 8.—Swanston now stated that he had an affidavit of service on the creditors who had not executed, and that they did not appear.

The LORDS JUSTICES accordingly made an order for registration of the deed, as of the day when the application was originally made.

HUME v. POCOCK.

14 W. R. 495; L. R. 1 Eq. 662; 14 L. T. 127; 12 Jur. N.S. 223.

Vendor and purchaser—Insufficiency of title.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—Where a vendor makes an erroneous statement as to title in the contract of sale, which title, in a suit for specific performance, and on a reference ordered by the Court, is declared not such as to enable him to convey, but the purchaser, with knowledge of the defect, enters into possession, and improperly takes advantage of his information to his own advantage and adversely to the vendor, the Court will permit the vendor to amend his bill with a view of obtaining a modified performance of the contract, within the principles laid down in Murrell v. Goodyear (2 Giff. 51).

This case came on for further consideration. The original bill was for specific performance of a contract to purchase certain lands, of which the plaintiff, in the contract for sale, alleged himself to be mortgagee in fee, with a power of sale. The purchaser, however, as was alleged, in perusing the abstract of title, discovered the plaintiff to be a mortgagee for a term of 1,000 years only, and without a power of sale; and, upon discovering this, purchased the reversion in fee from the mortgagor for a nominal consideration. In the meantime the purchaser had been admitted into possession, and had expended considerable sums in the erection of works on the property; and he refused to accept the mortgagee's title, offering, however, to pay off the amount of his mortgage-money and interest—a sum considerably less than the amount of the purchase-money. The Lords Justices, before whom the hearing came on appeal, made a decree for specific performance, and ordered the purchase-money and interest to be paid into court and to be charged on the estate, subject, however, to a reference as to title. The chief clerk found that the plaintiff was a mortgagee for a term only, without a power of sale as to part of the lands sold, and that his title was not such as to enable him to convey.

Malins, Q.C., and Fry, for the plaintiff.—The purchaser is not entitled to use his information of defects in vendor's title to his own advantage adversely to the vendor. He cannot under such circumstances avail himself of the purchase of the equity of redemption to defeat his contract: Murrell v. Goodyear (8 W. R. 398; 2 Giff. 51, 1 D. F. J. 432).

Bacon, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the defendant.—The bill should be dismissed with costs. The plaintiff has not fulfilled the terms of the agreement for sale, and can make no title.

March 8.—STUART, V.C.—This case has now come before the Court under extraordinary circumstances. The decree of the Lords Justices has directed the specific performance of the agreement, provided that a good title can be made. The certificate now shows that a good title cannot be made, and the defendant asks, as of course, that the bill be dismissed out of court, there being no motion by the plaintiff to vary the certificate. But other parts of the Lords Justices' decree seem rather to indicate that the Court foresaw the ultimate possibility of a modified performance of the agreement to purchase. The possession of and dealing with the property by the defendant may account for that part of the decree which directs the defendant to pay into court the interest on the purchase-money, and the still more important and unusual declaration that the purchase-money with interest is a charge upon the estate. This seems to show that the Court had in view the ultimate possibility that even if a good title could not be shown by the plaintiff, he might still be entitled to some relief as a vendor, and this is confirmed by the fact that the decree was made after the defendant, by his answer, admitted that he had, subsequently to the contract, purchased the equity of redemption, and by the variation made by the decree in the order as to payment of purchase-money (an order made before the answer was filed). The certificate is conclusive against the title. The plaintiff now relies on the principle of the case of Murrell v. Goodyear, one of the class of cases in which a modified performance of the agreement has been decreed. If the frame of the bill justified it, there is certainly enough in the decree to entitle him to proceed now to show his right to relief on that footing. But the bill prayed no alternative relief, and contains no averments on which any other relief can be given than on the footing of the plaintiff being a mortgagee in fee, with power of sale. It is quite possible that if the plaintiff had amended his bill with reference to some of the statements in the answer, he might have averred and proved a case for relief on the principle that since the contract the defendant had ascertained and himself cured the defect in the title by purchasing the equity of redemption, and that he is now, by means of the contract, in possession and enjoyment of the plaintiff's beneficial interest in the property. On such ground he might be entitled to recover, if not the whole, at least some other sum less than the contract price. But a case of that kind must be distinctly averred and proved so as to give the defendant an opportunity to make out a case against relief of that kind. Considering the terms of the decree and the declaration of lien in favour of the plaintiff, I think that the court cannot dismiss this bill, and thereby allow the defendant to continue in possession of the plaintiff's interest in the property without paying any price or making any compensation. The case must stand over with liberty to the plaintiff to amend the bill or to file such supplemental bill as he may be advised.

Practice—"The Trustee Act, 1850"—Costs—How to be raised.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Where an order had been made for the appointment of new trustees under "The Trustee Act, 1850," and for the payment of the costs out of the trust estate; and it was subsequently shown that the trust estate consisted entirely of realty; the order was amended by the insertion of words authorising the trustees to raise the costs out of the realty by way of mortgage, the mortgage deed to be approved by the judge at chambers.

In this matter an order had been made for the appointment of new trustees under "The Trustee Act, 1850," and for the payment of the costs attending such appointment out of the trust estate.

Batten stated that the trust estate consisted of realty only, and asked that the order might be amended by the addition of words authorising the trustees to raise the costs out of the estate by way of mortgage. He referred to Ex parte Davies (16 Jur. 882), where Vice-Chancellor Parker, upon appointing a new trustee under the Act, by consent directed that the costs of the proceedings, with interest thereon at 4l. per cent., should form a charge on the inheritance. There was no opposition to the present application.

Wood, V.C., allowed the application, and said that the order should be amended by the insertion of words directing the costs, when taxed, to be a charge on the inheritance, such charge to be raised by way of mortgage, and the mortgage deed to be approved by the judge at chambers.

Patent—Trial—Power of the Court—Alteration of the record.

PATENT.—When a cause is set down for trial the Court will not alter the record by the addition of an issue not raised in the pleadings.

This was an adjourned summons to add further issues; it was taken out by the defendant in the suit, which was to restrain the infringement of a patent. Replication had been filed, and the cause had been set down for hearing.

The present application was, according to the decision of the Court, an application to raise an issue which had not been raised in the pleadings.

Fooks for the defendant in the cause.

W. Pearson for the plaintiff.

Wood, V.C., said the application was not a matter of form. Certain issues had been raised by the answer. The defendant now wished to suggest an additional issue. This he should have done by a supplemental answer. For the Court to direct an issue to be raised that had not been raised in the pleadings, would be for the Court to exceed the power of control which it possessed over its own general orders. The application must be dismissed with costs.

[BANKRUPTCY.]

Ex parte MADDISON. Re MADDISON.

14 W. R. 501.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 185, 186, 187—Form of deed under—Right of non-assenting creditors to sue—Inequality.

BANKRUPTCY.—A deed of composition, under the 185th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, made between the debtor of the one part, and the creditors who execute, on behalf of themselves and all other the creditors of the debtor, of the other part, is objectionable, on the ground that the creditors who are not parties have no right of action thereunder.

And where it is shown in evidence that a creditor for 342l. has received preferentially bills of exchange for 50l. and 30l., irrespective of the composition payable under the deed.

The Court dismissed an application for a supersedeas of the bankruptcy with costs.

This was an application on behalf of the bankrupt, Henry Maddison, for an order under the 187th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, declaring that the terms of a deed entered into by the bankrupt with his creditors were reasonable, and calculated to benefit the general body of the creditors under the estate, and for an order declaring the complete execution of the deed, and for a direction that the same should be registered with the chief registrar and the bankruptcy annulled.

By the deed, which was dated the 15th December, 1865, and made between the debtor of the one part, and "the creditors who execute on behalf of themselves and all other the creditors of the debtor" of the other part, the debtor covenanted to pay to his creditors a composition of three shillings in the pound upon the amounts of the debts due to them respectively, and the creditors thereby released their claims.

R. Griffiths, who supported the application, produced the deed, which had been executed by or on behalf of three-fourths in number and value of the creditors.

Brough, for opposing creditors, took a preliminary objection on the ground that the costs of a former application of a similar nature by the bankrupt had not been paid.

HOLROYD, Commr., intimated that he would not proceed unless the costs were paid.

The amount of costs was then discharged and the hearing proceeded.

It was elicited upon an examination of the bankrupt that he became bankrupt about a year since, and that he had obtained an order of discharge. The second petition bore date the 7th September, 1865, the bankrupt's debts being about 1,400l. Mr. Hemming, of Birmingham, jeweller, was a creditor for 171l., in respect of goods supplied; 86l. at the end of May, and 85l. in the middle of July; and Mr. George Blunt was a creditor for 29l., in respect of goods delivered in June. At a sitting for examination, held before Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, an adjournment sine die was ordered and protection disallowed. Mr. Samuel Powell, of Birmingham, was a creditor for 342l., and he had executed the deed. At the time of such execution Powell received two bills of exchange for 50l. and 30l. each, drawn by the bankrupt upon and accepted by one Thwaites, an accountant. According to the bankrupt's evidence Powell had stated that if he would hand him the additional bills he would, at a future time, deliver to him further goods. Powell had since died.

Brough submitted upon this evidence that Mr. Powell having been induced to execute by the delivery of two bills of exchange preferentially, the deed was bad. The deed was objectionable upon the further ground that the creditors who were not parties could not sue upon the covenant of the debtor. He referred to Gurrian v. Kopera (13 W. R. 843), Chesterfield and Midland, &c., Company v. Hawkins (13 W. R. 841).

R. Griffiths contended that the bills having been given in consideration of a promise to deliver goods at a future date, the circumstances did not amount to a preference. [HOLROYD, Commr.—It is unfortunate that the bills were handed over at the time of the execution of the deed by Mr. Powell.]

HOLROYD, Commr.—Here is a clear case of inequality, and it is impossible for the Court to hold that the deed is reasonable. The deed is also objectionable upon the further ground which has been pointed out. The application must be dismissed with costs.

[PROBATE.]

Feb. 20, 1866.

In the goods of ANNA MARIA BELLAMY (deceased).

14 W. R. 501.

Will written partly in ink and partly in pencil—Probate of—Intention—Appearance of document—Indorsement of envelope—Codicil.

WILL.—Where a will seemed to have been first written in pencil and afterwards traced with ink, but not completely, words in some cases being written in ink above, and apparently in substitution for, the pencil writing, and in other parts the pencil writing standing alone,

The Court declined to include the pencil writing in the grant of probate of the will.

The fact that a will is found with a codicil in an envelope indorsed as containing the codicil only will not raise any presumption that the will was not meant to take effect.

The deceased died on the 29th of October, 1863. Previous to her death, on the 3rd of the same month, she produced to her brother George Bellamy a sealed envelope with the following indorsement:—"August 20th, 1865. This is my last will. Anna Maria Bellamy. Witnessed by my two servants, Mary Hill and Mary Martyn." The indorsement was in her own handwriting. On the afternoon of the same day she produced to him another paper in her own handwriting partly in ink and partly in pencil, and requested him to write it out for her, which he did exactly in the form in which he found it written by herself. It was dated September, and, as he concluded that it must be a mistake for October, he mentioned it to her the following day, on which she desired him to correct it, which he did by drawing his pen through the word September and writing "October" under it. Previous to this he had been desired by her to send to her room the two servants mentioned in the indorsement as having attested her will. He did so, and it was when he went into her room with them that he mentioned the mistake and corrected it. Having done so, and delivered her the copy he had made, he went out of the room, leaving her with the two servants. After the death of the testatrix, her brothers and the person who was appointed co-executor with them found, in a small leathern bag in which she usually kept her papers, the envelope endorsed "August 20th, &c.," above referred to, but it was empty; and also another envelope endorsed "Codicil to my last will—witnessed by my two servants, October 3rd, 1865, Mary Hill and Mary Martyn." This last envelope contained the codicil above referred to as having been copied and corrected by George Bellamy, a will bearing date the 20th of August, 1865, signed by the testatrix, and attested by the two persons already mentioned, and another paper dated the 2nd of May, 1864, at its beginning, and December 29, 1864, at its end, and signed by the testatrix only. This paper contained various dispositions. The will and informal paper were in the handwriting of deceased, and the codicil was in the writing of George Bellamy. The will appeared to have been first written in pencil, and such pencilling was afterwards traced by a pen; but in some parts the ink did not follow the writing in pencil, but seemed to have been written in substitution for it, but the pencilling was not erased. In some parts there was no ink writing over the pencil, so that there was more pencil than ink writing. The two attesting witnesses swore to having signed the will and codicil, but stated that they could say nothing as to the pencil writing.

Spinks, Dr., now moved for grant of probate of the will and codicil to the executors named.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—Probate may pass of the will and codicil, but not of such writing in pencil in the will as is not traced with the pen, as it seems to have been the intention of testatrix to have the ink writing only regarded as her will.

THE "HELEN."

14 W. R. 502.

Master's wages—Amount in which action entered insufficient to cover claim and costs.

SHIPPING.—The defendants having occasioned great delay and extra expense, so that the amount in which the action had been entered proved insufficient to cover the amount pronounced to be due to the plaintiff with his costs of suit, the Court ordered that the ship should not be released from arrest until payment of the plaintiff's claim and costs should have been made.

This was a cause of wages instituted by the master of the Helen against that vessel and her owners intervening. The action was entered in the sum of 450*l.*, and the plaintiff claimed the sum of 234*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, being the amount shown to be due to him by an account which had been given to the plaintiff at the office of the defendants, by a clerk in their employment. The defendants, by objecting to the admission of the plaintiff's petition, and by setting up an untenable defence (see 14 W. R. 136), and by neglecting to file their counter claim after the Court had referred the matter to the registrar, had occasioned very great delay, so that, although the plaintiff had filed his petition on the 22nd of May, 1865, it was not until the 21st of February, 1866, that the registrar was able to make his report, when he reported that the sum of 205*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* was due to the plaintiff, with interest till the time of payment. The plaintiff had been necessarily detained on shore for the purpose of giving evidence in support of his claim from the time of the institution of the cause until the 19th February, 1866, on which day he gave evidence before the registrar and merchants. The amount in which the action had been entered proved to be insufficient to meet the plaintiff's claim and costs. The defendants had not bailed the Helen, which, consequently, was still under arrest.

Clarkson, for the plaintiff, now moved the Court for leave to increase the amount of the action from 450*l.* to 900*l.*, and to amend the warrant of arrest accordingly, and to condemn the Helen in the amount reported by the registrar to be due to the plaintiff, and in costs, and to order the Helen to be appraised and sold. He submitted that, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was justified in having entered his action in 450*l.* only, as he had no reason to expect that the defendants would take the vexatious course which they had pursued, but for which the amount of the action would have been sufficient. He cited the Temiscouata (1 Jur. N.S. 479).

Pritchard, for the defendants, opposed the motion.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff was justified in thinking that the amount in which he entered his action would prove sufficient. Parties are frequently obliged to find bail for large sums when there is no occasion, and are thereby greatly harassed. In this case great delay has been occasioned by the course pursued by the defendants, and expenses consequent thereon have been incurred by the plaintiff, who has been compelled to remain on shore for ten months in order to give his evidence. I shall now make an order which will probably cut this matter short. I order that the Helen be not released from arrest until the amount due to the plaintiff, together with his costs, including the costs of this motion, have been paid.

THE "CORNELIA HENRIETTA."

14 W. R. 502.

Bottomry bond on English ship—Payment by bondholders of wages, subsistence-money, and expenses of return of foreign seamen—Repayment to bondholders out of proceeds of sale of ship.

SHIPPING.—This was a motion to pronounce for the validity of a bottomry bond, and also to decree repayment out of the proceeds of the sale of the ship of sums paid for seamen's wages, &c.

The Cornelia Henrietta, a British ship, belonging to the port of Margate, was forced, while in distress on her homeward voyage, in the month of August last, to put into the port of Martinique. The master, requiring funds, gave a bond on bottomry of ship, freight, and cargo for 2,290*l.* 12*s.* Many of the crew having died of yellow fever, he was short of hands, and accordingly, with the aid of the governor of Martinique, he obtained twenty men on condition that, as soon as the vessel arrived home, five of them should be sent to Havre, and the remaining fifteen back to Martinique. The vessel was arrested on her arrival in this country, and sold at the suit of the Salvage Association at Lloyds, who were the bondholders, and who, at the request of the French Consul, and after the suit had been instituted, paid for the wages, subsistence-money, and return-expenses of the foreign seamen a sum amounting to 526*l.* 19*s.*

Potter, on behalf of the bondholders, now moved that the bond should be pronounced valid, and that the sums paid for seamen's wages, &c., should be repaid out of the proceeds of sale of the ship. He cited the case of the Lisbonnaise (reported in the Solicitors' Journal, vol. 10, p. 441), where the Court had allowed a sum, which the bondholder had paid to the French Consul at Newcastle on account of a destitute crew, to be repaid to him out of the proceeds in the registry, and submitted that since by these payments the expense of a separate suit for seamen's wages, &c., had been saved, the parties affected by the bond could not object.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., for the owners of the cargo, said that he should not oppose the application since an arrangement had been come to between the parties to abide by the decision of the Court in the matter.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The payment of these wages and expenses is undoubtedly a great irregularity on the part of the plaintiffs. When once a suit of this kind has been instituted, the Court, and the Court only, should direct payment of wages, and the direction of the Court can be taken at any time, either with or without a separate suit. It is true that the Court has been asked to sanction a similar payment before now, but it is the last time that such a motion will be granted. I shall allow the plaintiffs to be recouped in the present instance, but I wish all parties to understand that if, after this warning, cases like the present occur, the same indulgence will not be extended to them.

Motion granted with costs.

SIDEBOTTOM v. SIDEBOTTOM. SIDEBOTTOM v. WOODCROFT.

15 W. R. 507.

WILL.—The first of these suits was a suit for the administration of the estate of one Joe Sidebottom.

The widow of the testator was alleged to be a large debtor to the estate. A decree was made for administration. Before it was decided whether the alleged claim against the widow was valid, she died. She had bequeathed a large legacy to the plaintiff in the second suit, which was instituted to obtain payment of the legacy. The first suit was in Vice-Chancellor Wood's court; the second in Vice-Chancellor Stuart's. Vice-Chancellor Stuart made a decree for payment of the legacy, but its actual payment depended upon the non-establishment of the claim in the first suit. If that claim were established there would not be assets to pay the legacy. Under these circumstances Vice-Chancellor Stuart suggested that it would be better to transfer the second suit into Vice-Chancellor Wood's court.

Osborne Morgan now applied accordingly.

E. K. Karslake opposed, on the ground that Vice-Chancellor Wood's court was so blocked up with business that the causes could not be heard for a long time.

The LORDS JUSTICES said that it was clear that both causes ought to be heard by the same judge. On the question, which Court would be the most proper for the purpose, their Lordships expressed no opinion, but they could not disregard the opinion of Vice-Chancellor Stuart that both the causes should be heard by Vice-Chancellor Wood. They would, therefore, order the transfer as asked.

BUTT v. THE IMPERIAL GAS LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY.

15 W. R. 92 (L.C.).

Injunction—Nuisance—Obstruction of view—Practice.

EASEMENTS. GAS. INJUNCTION. NUISANCE.—A gas company granted a lease of a piece of ground abutting on the Regent's Canal at Hackney, with a covenant by the lessee to erect a lime kiln and keep up a road, and by the lessors to make the road, and, if it should be necessary to remove it (which they had power to do), to make a new one of like materials. The lessee built the kiln and premises, and the lessors made the road. In 1865 the lessors (having built two gasometers) proposed to erect a third, and enlarge a basin or lay-by, which would render the diversion of the road necessary, but it was proposed to reinstate it with a slight curve. The lessee filed a bill to restrain the erection of the gasometer and the alteration of the road: as to the gasometer, on the ground of nuisance and obstruction of the view of the plaintiff's premises; and, as to the road, that it was a mere device to alter the road. On motion an injunction as to the gasometer was refused; but that as to the road granted, on the usual undertaking by the plaintiff as to damages.

The bill was afterwards dismissed with costs. An inquiry was then asked for as to damages, and the order of dismissal was made without prejudice to any application as to damages.

This bill was filed in March, 1865, to restrain the Imperial Gas Light and Coke Company from altering a road, except to the south of a certain lay-by or basin, lying on the side of the Regent's Canal, in the parishes of St. John's, Hackney, and St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, and from erecting a gasometer, on the ground that it would be a nuisance, and would obstruct the view of the plaintiff's warehouse from the public.

The property in question (with other lands) originally belonged to the Regent's Canal Company, and the immediate site was occupied by a pond or pit called "Bonker's Pond," which had formed the receptacle for offal found floating in the canal, but was purchased by the defendant company; and in December, 1844, the plaintiff became their lessee for sixty years, at a rent of 15*l.*, of forty-five square yards. The lease contained two covenants, one by the plaintiff to build a lime kiln and buildings and keep up the road to be formed by the lessors, which he had done, and carried on the trade of a lime burner and seller of tiles, drain-pipes, &c.; and the other by the lessors, to make a good and hard road for carts and waggons on the bank of the lay-by, and in case it should be removed by the lessors (which they had power to do), to provide a new one of like materials. The access to the premises in question was from some houses called "Anne's-place," and now "Pritchard's-road," about 200 yards from the lay-by, the road being through gates, and, in fact, an accommodation road. In 1853 the defendants erected a gasometer, and in 1857 another, south of the lay-by; and in 1864 they desired to erect a third, and to enlarge the lay-by, at a considerable cost, which would necessitate an encroachment on the road, and an alteration of its course. This they did, and continued it nearly straight, so as to fall into the old one by a slight curve. The plaintiff remonstrated against the proposed gasometer, on the ground of nuisance, and to the alteration of the road as an infringement of the covenant of the lease, and filed this bill in March, 1865, and, on the 5th May, moved for an injunction—which was refused as to the nuisance, but granted as to the road on the plaintiff undertaking to abide by any order the Court might make as to damages.

On the question of nuisance scientific witnesses were examined, and inter alios—Dr. Letheby for the defendants, and Dr. Lankester for the plaintiff—who learnedly discussed the relative qualities of the two things; gas being spoken of by the one as comparatively harmless, and the lime burning a noxious operation; whereas, on the other hand, gas was characterised as unwholesome, and the lime burning as only causing vapours which formed a component part of common articles of consumption. It was also insisted by the plaintiff that the public in Anne's-place (where the gasometer was erected) would be unable to see his warehouse, and that his trade, as to chance custom, would be thereby injured. As to the road, he contended that the defendants had no right to make it as they were doing, but were, in fact, using the proposed enlargement of the lay-by merely as a device, in order to create a sham necessity for diverting the road. To these contentions it was answered that, as to the obstruction of view, the Court could not grant an injunction; and as to the road, what was proposed and being done was strictly within the terms of the covenant, and the expense of increasing the lay-by was a sufficient proof of the bona fides of the work.

Glasse, Q.C., and Rudall, appeared for the plaintiff, and argued that the third gasometer would operate as a great nuisance, would shut out the view of the public from the plaintiff's premises, and he would be injured by losing chance customers; and that the enlargement of the lay-by was a mere device to alter the road.

Baily, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the defendants, insisted that this neighbourhood was devoted to noisome manufactures, and therefore there could be no nuisance: that the obstruction of view could not be the subject of injunction; and they denied that the enlargement of the lay-by was made malâ fide; on the contrary, it would be a great expense.

Glasse, Q.C., in reply.

Authorities cited: Newby v. Harrison (9 W. R. 849).

March 5.—KINDERSLEY, V.C. (after stating the facts).—With respect to the question of nuisance let us consider the nature of this region which has been long devoted to gloomy operations, which fortunately have of necessity been banished from the inhabited parishes of London; and previously the site was occupied by an old pond, the receptacle of dead dogs and cats, and other offal found floating in the canal. Since gasometers have been built, rather an improvement has taken place; for being plunged in water and inverted, all escape of noxious effluvia seems to be prevented: and moreover the plaintiffs' manufacture is of a very analogous nature. The conflict of the evidence of Dr. Letheby, Dr. Lankester, and the other scientific witnesses is somewhat amusing. [His Honour referred to their opinions.] But if I were called on to elect between gas making and lime burning I should say both were very disagreeable, although, no doubt, some of the elements evolved by the latter may be imbibed in soda-water, ginger-beer, and champagne. The question, however, is, whether the plaintiff has a right to restrain this erection. As to the ground that it will prevent the view of persons in Anne's-place, it is impossible that that can be a ground for an injunction. As to the question of nuisance, the plaintiff cannot sustain the bill. With respect to the road, no doubt it is possible so to make the new road, that, after passing west, it should strike north and join the old road by a serpentine course. But it is sworn that the enlargement of the lay-by, which was an expensive operation, and therefore not likely to be otherwise than bonâ fide, is not a device, as the plaintiff charges, and that the new road is superior to the old one; the dates are in support of this view, for the contract was not till subsequently to the correspondence. The plaintiff's object is not an unfair one; but he comes here unreasonably, and requires from the defendants an alteration of the road which would, in fact, render it the worst possible for him. I cannot, therefore, grant the injunction, and therefore the bill must be dismissed with costs.

Baily, Q.C., and Bagshawe, then asked for an inquiry as to damages sustained by the defendants.

Glasse, Q.C., and Rudall, contended that this was impossible, as the bill was gone; and before the Court could grant a reference of this kind there must be some proof of damage, of which there was none; there was no evidence on the subject. It would be a mere roving inquiry.

Baily, Q.C., in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—If the defendants have sustained damage by reason of the injunction, justice requires that in some way means should be found to compensate them, and the question is whether I should now require an application to be made and evidence adduced to show damage, or whether I should give leave to make an application for an inquiry as to damage. I consider what is before the Court now does not prove damage, and if I were to dismiss the bill, and at the same time by the decree direct a reference as to damage, I should be deviating, technically, from the course of the Court, and it would be an anomaly. I think, therefore, I ought not to direct an inquiry, there being also the objection that there has been an answer not making a case of damages; although, if that were the only objection, there is, I think, sufficient primâ facie evidence to lead to the inference that there has been some damage, as the nature of the case renders it hardly doubtful that there has been peculiar detriment. It is not, therefore, inconsistent in dismissing the bill, to do so without prejudice to any application by the defendant in respect of damages. The defendant must then show a primâ facie case sufficient to justify an inquiry.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., March 6, 7, 1866.

COMPANY OF PROPRIETORS OF THE SHEFFIELD WATERWORKS
v. YEOMANS.

14 W. R. 509: affirmed, 15 W. R. 76; L. R. 2 Ch. 8; 15 L. T. 342 (L. C.).

Practice—Demurrer—Bill of peace.

PEACE (BILL OF).—Under an Act of Parliament certain parties had a right to certificates of claim against the plaintiffs, to be regarded as costs to be taxed in the usual way, and if unpaid within twenty-eight days to operate as judgments, with the same rights. Application being made by a solicitor, and not by the claimants, or by their written authority, 1,500 of the claims were not made within the time limited by the Act, but certificates were signed and sealed and delivered to the custos appointed under the Act and marked "not issued." On demurrer to a bill filed to restrain such custos from handing them over, and for delivery up and cancellation:—Held, that it was a bill in the nature of a bill of peace, and demurrer overruled on that ground; the question of validity of the certificates reserved until the hearing.

This bill was filed by the Sheffield Waterworks Company to restrain the town-clerk from issuing certain certificates in his hands, and for delivery up and cancellation of such certificates.

In consequence of the well-known Sheffield inundation, an Act of Parliament (27 & 28 Vict. c. cxxiv.) was passed to enable the sufferers to recover compensation against the Sheffield Waterworks Company. The facts were these:—In March, 1864, the inundation occurred, causing great loss of life and property; and by the Act as passed, three commissioners were appointed to assess the damage, and it was provided that the commissioners should, within six months after the date of their general certificate, make certificates of claims in favour of the several persons injured, which certificates should entitle the claimants to their costs, to be taxed by the taxing-master, and paid by the plaintiffs. And it was provided that if such costs should not be paid within twenty-eight days after demand, the certificate was to be regarded as a judgment, to be entered up at any time on production of the certificate, and execution should issue as on ordinary judgments, and the claimants should have the same rights as judgment-creditors. 7,315 claimants came forward, almost all of them in humble life, and a large fund was subscribed for their relief and a committee appointed under the presidency of the Mayor of Sheffield, of which the defendant Yeomans, the town-clerk, was solicitor and secretary; and sums of money were paid to the sufferers on their assigning over their claims to the committee. The powers of the commissioners under the Act ceased on 26th August, 1865, and the Act provided that all claims were to be brought in before that time. 1,500 of the claimants applied through a solicitor named Broadbent, but he did not produce their authority, and the commissioners came to a resolution that they would not issue any certificates except on personal application or written authority, and the certificates of these claimants were therefore delivered to Yeomans (who, under the provisions of the Act, was to have the custody of them) by Mr. Newbould, the clerk to the commissioners, who marked them "not issued." Upon the expiration of the limited time the plaintiffs required that the unissued certificates should be cancelled. A correspondence took place, and Yeomans stated his intention to deliver the certificates to the claimants unless restrained by injunction; and this bill was accordingly filed for an injunction, and delivery and cancellation of the certificates as above. The defendants other than Yeomans were John Ellis, William Ellis, V. Hickman, George Dumfield, and William Locke, as representing the 1,500 claimants, and they demurred generally for want of equity, on the ground that the plaintiffs' remedy, if they had any, was at law. To this it was answered that these documents, being stamped and sealed out of time, were invalid, and therefore could not be recovered, and, moreover, that this was bill of peace: Story's Equity, 174, 3rd edit.

Baily, Q.C., and Rodwell, for the demurrer, insisted that the claimants were entitled to the certificates as soon as sealed. They stood on the footing of an award: Brooke v. Mitchell (6 M. & W. 477).

Glasse, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the plaintiffs.

Lindley, for Yeomans.

Baily, Q.C., in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—There are two questions—one, whether, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and the circumstances under which the documents, now in the hands of the town clerk, came into existence, those documents are such that the parties who may be called claimants are entitled to avail themselves of the demurrer, so as to require that the amount of their costs should be taxed by the taxing-master—that is the main question. The other relates to the nature and form of the bill, whether, whatever may be the rights of the parties, it is such a bill as it is competent for the plaintiff to file. As to the latter question, of course if the bill is not such a bill as it is competent for them to file in its form and nature, then it would be unnecessary to discuss the other question. I shall first consider the latter question.

This is a bill by the company raising this case. Here is a number of persons, each alleging that he is entitled as against the company to be paid a certain sum to be ascertained in respect of costs. Each claim is founded on the same state of circumstances; and what would be successful in one case would be so in all, there is no distinction, although in some cases there might be disputed facts. Each insists that he is entitled to have, out of the custody of the town clerk, these documents, in order to adopt the process under the Act to recover the costs, that is, go to the taxing master and get judgment entered up and issue execution. It is, therefore, the case of one body against a number of separate individuals, each claiming as against the one body a certain right, the right being the same in all, and the same reasons and arguments applying to all. Now the question is whether this is not precisely the case for a bill of peace, and if so, whether this is a proper bill quoad the nature of the case, and I think as to that, having considered the matter since yesterday, that this bill, quoad the form and nature of the bill, is a proper bill of peace. Where there are a number of persons claiming against one, or one person claims against a number, and where all are claiming alike, although at law they may be entirely disputed cases, that is the very case for a bill of peace; and I think this comes within the true object of such a bill. The bill seeks to restrain the issuing of the documents, i.e., that the town clerk may not issue them pending the question. So far the demurrer cannot be sustained. The other question is, whether the documents ought to be delivered up and cancelled, or whether the parties ought to be allowed to have them and pursue their remedy. That depends on whether these are proper certificates; and this, again, depends on all the details and facts; what was done by the commissioners and their clerk by their direction, &c. Under the circumstances I shall not decide that question on demurrer, it is a question for the hearing. The demurrer must be simply overruled, reserving to the defendants the benefit thereof at the hearing, and reserving the question of costs.

SLATTERY v. AXTON.

14 W. R. 511; 14 L. T. 510.

Practice—County court appeals.

Under the 19th General Order, made by the Lord Chancellor under the County Court Act (Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865), an appeal from an equity claim must be brought on upon a case stated before this Court, as the judge appointed to hear such appeal.

Waller applied to the Court for direction under these circumstances. This was a claim in equity under the County Court Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99); reported 10 Sol. Jour. 462, for the specific performance of a contract to purchase a plot of land, the subject-matter being just under 500*l.* The judge, after hearing the plaintiff's counsel, and after witnesses on his behalf had been examined, cross-examined, and re-examined, and after hearing the counsel for the defendant, but no witnesses on his behalf, had dismissed the claim with costs, without hearing a reply. He (Waller) had protested against this course, and given immediate notice of appeal; but the question now was how that was to be prosecuted. There was no record except the judge's notes, as there had been only vivâ voce examination of witnesses, and no shorthand note taken.

Andrew Thomson, for the defendant, said he was anxious to facilitate the appeal, and was only anxious on the question of costs.

Baily, Q.C., as amicus curiæ, said that the 19th County Court Order only provided for a case to be stated.

Glassey, Q.C., amicus curiæ, said that at common law that was the course.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., said that that was his view, and he must decline to do anything except on a case stated; there was nothing now before him.

14 W. R. 511; 14 L. T. 183.

Ancient lights.

EASEMENTS.—Principles upon which the Court proceeds in determining the quantum of damages in cases of injury to ancient lights.

This was a suit by a lessee of certain premises in the Mile End Road, to restrain the defendant from erecting a riding-school contiguous to plaintiff's premises, in such a way as to interfere with his rights to light and air. At the back of plaintiff's house, facing due south, was a workshop in which the plaintiff carried on his business as a repairer of jewellery and watches, and ship-model maker, and through a window on the south side by which he obtained his light. This was bounded on the south at a distance of sixteen feet by a wall eight feet nine inches in height and about twenty-eight feet in length. The defendant was the lessee of premises on the south side of this wall, which, before the proposed erection, consisted of vacant ground for a width of forty-seven feet. Upon this ground the defendant had commenced building a riding-school, using the party-wall to the south side of the plaintiff's yard as a support for one side of the building. From the top of this wall the defendant carried a sloping roof, to the purline of which was a distance of about twenty-three feet, and from the purline to the higher portion of the roof about twenty feet. To restrain the defendant from proceeding with this building, the plaintiff filed his bill. There was the usual conflicting evidence as to the quantum of injury.

Malins, Q.C., and Surrage, for plaintiff.

Greene, Q.C., and F. H. Colt, for defendant, referred to Robson v. Whittingham (14 W. R. 291), Clarke v. Clarke (14 W. R. 115; 1 L. R. App. 16), The Attorney-General v. Nicol (16 Ves. 338), Durell v. Pritchard (1 L. R. App. 244; 14 W. R. 212); also to the Metropolitan Buildings Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122.

STUART, V.C.—This case has occupied a great deal of time, and has been discussed with reference to various dicta of high authorities, more particularly as to what was said in Clarke v. Clarke. After all it seems to me that none of the dicta or cases referred to intended to alter the long-settled doctrine in questions of this kind. The right to light and air are recognised by law and are protected by it. There is a positive and peremptory enactment, giving an undisturbed enjoyment after twenty years and upwards. With reference to what has been said as to quantum of injury, no doubt the question is embarrassed by some dicta referred to in the argument, or rather by the construction which has, perhaps, been unfortunately put upon them, and which might seem to indicate that there is one rule for the enjoyment of light and air for great towns and another for country places—that because a man in a town has generally less light and air than a man in the country, that small quantity of the property he enjoys may be more readily invaded. But this result, I am sure, was never intended or even contemplated.

Again, it is said that the quantum of injury is to be ascertained by the Metropolitan Buildings Act, which practically establishes that, if a street be forty feet wide, and the buildings on each side forty feet high, any one desirous of raising his walls must extend their distance in the same proportion. In other words the distance and height must be in the same proportions. That principle seems to me a very good one, but the application of it to this case would show the plaintiff to have sustained a loss of light and air which the legislature did not think desirable.

The plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, although not one of a mandatory kind. If the parties consent I will fix the amount of damages at chambers. The defendant will pay the costs of the suit.

Wood, V.C., March 3, 1866.

TURNER v. ELKINS.

14 W. R. 512.

Will—Gift to children—Time of ascertaining the class—Period of distribution.

WILL.—Where there is a gift to children at twenty-one, a child born after the eldest attains twenty-one will be excluded.

The rule of Whitbread v. St. John is well established, and is only to be departed from in cases clearly exceptional.

This was a special case agreed upon for the purpose of determining what class of children were entitled to participate in the residuary real and personal estate of the late William Lovett. By his will the testator devised a certain estate called the Grange Estate to trustees, in trust for Ann Buswell for life, subject to an annuity of 25*l.*, payable out of the rents to the person for the time being entitled to the estate immediately expectant on her decease, with remainder to Richard Lovett Turner, the then second son of W. L. Turner the elder, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to John Heygate Turner, the then third son of the said W. L. Turner the elder, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to each of the other younger sons of the said W. L. Turner the elder by his then late wife for life, with remainder to their first and other sons in tail, with remainder to W. L. Turner, the then eldest son of the said W. L. Turner the elder, for life, and remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to the after-born children of the said W. L. Turner the elder, in tail, with remainder to Ann Heygate, the eldest daughter of the said W. L. Turner the elder, and all his other daughters by his said then late wife, for life, in equal shares as tenants in common, with remainder to their children as tenants in common in tail, with remainders over. The testator then went on to devise three lots of land lately purchased by him, and all other his real estate, to such child or children of the said W. L. Turner the elder (other than and except the child or children who should, at the time of the first vested interest in the said three lots being acquired, be entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents of his said Grange Estate, in case the said Ann Buswell were dead) as, being a son or sons, should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters should live to attain that age or be previously married with such consent as thereafter mentioned, their, his, or her heirs and assigns for ever, and, if more than one, as tenants in common.

His residuary personal estate he bequeathed in trust for such of the children of the said W. L. Turner the elder, (other than and except the child or children who should at the time of the first vested interest in the said residuary personal estate being acquired for the time being be in the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of the said Grange Estate, under the limitations thereof thereinbefore contained,) who being a son or sons should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters should live to attain that age or be previously married with the consent in writing of their or her parents or parent, guardians or guardian, and if more than one, as tenants in common.

At the date of the will W. L. Turner the elder was a widower, and had ten children living. His second son, Richard Lovett Newman Turner, died, in 1858, an infant and unmarried. After the death of the testator W. L. Turner the elder married again, and had two children by his second wife, who is since dead. He is now a widower. Ann Buswell is still alive. Ann Heygate Turner, the eldest child of W. L. Turner the elder, attained twenty-one in 1863. One of the children of his second marriage, Alfred Samuel Lovett Turner, was born in 1861, and the other, Richard Lovett Newman Turner, in 1864.

W. H. Townsend, for the plaintiff Alfred Samuel Lovett Turner (the eldest child of the second marriage), contended that the persons entitled to participate in the real and personal estate were those children who were in esse at the time when Ann Heygate Turner, the eldest child, attained her age of twenty-one years, and who should fulfil the condition of attaining twenty-one, or marrying under that age. He cited Mann v. Thompson (2 W. R. 582; 1 Kay, 639), Gillman v. Daunt (3 K. & J. 48).

Speed, for the defendants in the same interest, cited Singleton v. Gilbert (1 Cox, 68), Whitbread v. Lord St. John (10 Ves. 152), Clarke v. Clarke (8 Sim. 59).

Hallett, for the child born after Ann Heygate Turner had attained twenty-one, contended that the rule in Whitbread v. Lord St. John did not apply to the present case: Mills v. Norris (5 Ves. 835), Shepherd v. Ingram (Amb. 448), Ellis v. Maxwell (3 Beav. 586; 12 Beav. 104), Mainwaring v. Beevor (8 Hare, 44), Armitage v. Williams (7 W. 650; 27 Beav. 346), Iredell v. Iredell (25 Beav. 485).

Fischer for the trustees.

WOOD, V.C., said that the cases cited by Mr. Hallett are all distinguished from the present case by the fact that they are exceptions from the general rule laid down in Whitbread v. Lord St. John. That rule, even if it be artificial, is well established. It would have been strange that it should not have been exploded if it be artificial. The presumption in a marriage settlement is that all the children are to be provided for. In that case the children are necessarily ascertained before the period of distribution. Here there is a period of division, namely, at twenty-one, or marriage (in the case of a daughter). After that time no accretion must be permitted. His Honour, after discussing the cases of Whitbread v. Lord St. John, Mainwaring v. Beevor, and Mills v. Norris, said that here every child is let in till one attains twenty-one; when that event has happened the period of distribution has arrived, and the gift over cannot take place. His Honour then, referring to the difference of language in the devise of the real and the bequest of the personal estates, considered that the testator must have pointed to different states of circumstances, and therefore he should hold that no child born after Ann Heygate Turner attained twenty-one was entitled to any share in the residuary real or personal estate; and that, having regard to the different languages of the two gifts, the eldest son was excluded from a share in the residuary real estate, but was not excluded from a share in the personal estate.

STANDISH v. WHITWELL.

14 W. R. 512.

Trade mark—Infringement—Charge of fraud—Costs.

TRADE MARK.—Long user of a trade mark gives such a property in it to the owner that another person cannot adopt the same device, even though it be his family crest.

COSTS.—A charge of fraud not made out will be visited with costs.

Motion to restrain defendants from using the plaintiffs' trade mark. The plaintiffs carry on business in Staffordshire under the style of the "Eagle Coal and Iron Company," and have for many years branded their iron with a figure of an eagle—the trade mark which was alleged to have been infringed. The defendants, who are manufacturers of iron in the Cleveland district, have lately adopted a similar brand for one quality of their iron. The defendants alleged that the mark of the eagle was used by another well-known firm of Brown & Frere, and that the eagle was simply the crest of the Whitwell family, and had been so for many generations. For the plaintiffs evidence was given that the brand used by Brown & Frere was a phoenix, with the letters H. B., and was different in appearance from the plaintiffs' brand, and that there was no registry at the Herald's College of the alleged crest of the eagle as being that of the Whitwell family.

Giffard, Q.C., and Speed, for the plaintiffs, argued that their title to the trade mark was clear; that a purchaser of defendants' iron with the new brand might easily be deceived into thinking it was plaintiffs' manufacture. Defendants could not have been ignorant of the eagle being our trade mark: Seixo v. Provezende (14 W. R. 357).

Rolt, Q.C., and Fry, for the defendants.—We have not infringed. There is no such resemblance between our brand and that of the plaintiffs as would mislead a person who intended to use the iron, and the difference between Staffordshire and Cleveland iron is well known. The principles of Seixo v. Provezende do not apply here. The remarks of Lords Cranworth and Kingsdown in The Leather Cloth Company case (13 W. R. 873), when applied to the present case, show that there is here no mere colourable variation. Plaintiffs have made a charge of fraud, which they have failed to make out, therefore they must pay the costs.

Giffard, Q.C., in reply on the question of costs, said that the defendants had gone on selling their iron marked with the eagle brand after notice of the infringement, and while the correspondence between the parties and their solicitors was going on, and that, by thus continuing to do what they knew to be a fraud, they had adopted the fraud.

Wood, V.C.—It has been conclusively proved that in 1844 the plaintiffs had established the name of eagle iron as being that of their iron. The use of the phoenix brand by a third firm was no evidence of the use of the eagle brand by any other persons than plaintiffs and defendants. The observation that the brand would not mislead those who had to use the iron did not apply, as only wholesale dealers bought with the brand on; in working the name became obliterated. The fact was that the defendants wished to get their iron into the London market as a rival to the Staffordshire iron. After the use of the eagle brand for many years by the plaintiffs, eagle iron had come to signify Standish's iron. He acquitted the defendants of beginning the use of the eagle brand fraudulently, but could not acquit them of impropriety in continuing to use it after having been remonstrated with. [His Honour then made some remarks on the angry tone of the correspondence.] His Honour granted the injunction with costs, except those of the plaintiffs' first affidavit. These were disallowed in consideration of the charge of fraud having been made, and not substantiated except as to part.

CROSKEY v. THE EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN STEAM SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 514.

Practice—Insufficient Answer—Vivâ voce examination—Evidence after decree.

DISCOVERY.—Where, after decree, a plaintiff has not sufficiently answered interrogatories filed by the defendant for his examination, the defendant's proper course is to except to the answer, and not to apply for an examination vivâ voce in court in the first instance.

This was an adjourned summons to consider the sufficiency of the answer of the plaintiffs to interrogatories exhibited by the defendants.

A decree had been made in this suit, dated the 29th April, 1863, directing an account of all dealings and transactions of the plaintiffs with the defendants; and during the prosecution of this decree in chambers the defendants were allowed by the chief clerk to exhibit interrogatories for the examination of the plaintiffs with regard to certain payments and receipts by them. These interrogatories were subsequently approved of by the judge; but they were never filed in the record office in pursuance of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 19. The plaintiffs put in an answer to the interrogatories, but the chief clerk decided that the answer was insufficient.

Daniel, Q.C., and Cotton, for the defendants in the cause.

Rolt, Q.C., and Swanston, for the plaintiffs, contended—1st. That the interrogatories were irregular, as they had not been filed in the record office. 2nd. That the information sought by the interrogatories was sufficiently given by the plaintiffs' books, which they had produced to the defendants. 3rd. That they ought not to be called upon to make any further answer, but ought to be examined vivâ voce before the judge in person. On the last point they relied upon Hayward v. Hayward (Kay App. 31; 2 W. R. 322).

Wood, V.C., said, that, as the interrogatories had been allowed and certified by himself, he should pass by the question of their informality. With regard to the substance of the case, the plaintiffs said that the defendants had access to the books of account from whence they could find out all that the plaintiffs themselves knew, but it appeared that the books did not correctly show the payments that had been made by the plaintiffs; and his Honour was not persuaded but that the plaintiffs could show more than appeared in the books. Then, as to the course to be taken, his Honour adhered to every word that he had said in the case of Hayward v. Hayward, and when you found an obstinate defendant who refused to answer, the only course was to bring him before the judge; but the present plaintiffs were not in that position, for when it had been decided that they must discover what payments they had made, the Court would assume that they would do their best to make such discovery; and therefore they ought not to be brought before the judge personally in the first instance. Regard also must be had to the convenience of practice, for whole days might be occupied with the vivâ voce examination of persons by the Court. The plaintiffs must therefore put in a further answer within six weeks, and must pay the costs of this summons.

Petition for divorce—Answer—Amendment—Irrelevant matter.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—Where, in answer to petition by the wife, the husband alleged, in one paragraph, that the wife had been incontinent before marriage, and in another that she had been incontinent before and had committed adultery with the same person after marriage, the Court ordered the whole of the former paragraph, and so much of the latter as related to incontinence before marriage to be struck out as irrelevant.

This was an application to have certain portions of the respondent's answer struck out. The wife petitioned for divorce, on the ground of the husband's cruelty and adultery; and the husband, by his answer, charged the wife, in the 8th paragraph, with incontinence with A. B. before her marriage, and, in the 10th, with incontinence before and adultery after her marriage with C. D.

A. E. Miller, on behalf of the petitioner, moved to have the whole of the 8th paragraph, and so much of the 10th paragraph as related to incontinence before marriage, struck out as irrelevant and superfluous matter. That course was followed in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (11 W. R. 86).

WILDE, J.O.—There is no doubt as to the propriety of the course suggested. Let the 8th, and so much of the 10th paragraph as relates to the incontinence before marriage, be struck out.

MAHARAJAH RAJENDUR KISHWUR SING v. SHEOPURSHUN MISSUR.*

14 W. R. 521.

Bengal—Plaint—Misjoinder of claims—Multifariousness.

INDIA.—A claim for rent in arrear and a claim to remove clouds on the title to demise raised by the tenant are not objectionable on the ground of multifariousness, and may therefore be included in the same plaint.

This was an appeal from a decision of the late Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, of Bengal, which reversed a decision of the Zillah Court in favour of the appellant, the plaintiff in the suit. The decision of the Sudder Court proceeded solely on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action in the plaintiff's suit. That objection had been raised in and overruled by the Court below.

The causes of action were stated in the first paragraph of the plaint. It alleged that the plaintiff sued not summarily, but in due form, for possession of certain mouzars which it described by names and boundaries, and which it alleged to be his hereditary property; and also to recover certain arrears of rent, for which a summary suit was pending, and also certain rent inserted in a kabooleut dated 5th of the month of Assin, 1258 Fusli, by the annulment of a summary award of the deputy-collector of the district Chumparun, dated 29th May, 1854, and by the cancellation of a letter affirming the Bahakee Birt tenure, dated 17th of the month of Assin, 1232. This specification of the causes of suit was accompanied with statements of the falseness of the claim to the Birt tenure, of the danger which the plaintiff apprehended to his proprietary title from the summary decision above mentioned, that its annulment is impossible without a regular suit, and he concluded the paragraph by stating that he sued, therefore, for the reversal of the summary award, the confirmation of his proprietary interest and possession, and the refutation of the allegations of the defendant respecting the Bhakee Birt.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., and Leith, appeared for the appellant.

There was no respondent's case.

LORD CHELMSFORD now delivered judgment.—The case as alleged in the plaint, if the plaint be regular, must be brought within the principles stated in Mr. Macpherson's book on Civil Procedure, p. 111. 3rd edit., where, he says, "A plaint may have an appearance of doubleness when it prays not only for possession, but that the transactions upon which the defendants are supposed to found their title may be set aside; but the latter prayer is merely subsidiary to, and in fact forms part of, the former, because possession cannot be given without first removing the existing impediments." The question here, therefore, only relates to the unity of title, and connection and dependence between the claims of the plaintiff. In this suit the plaintiff's title is one; it is his proprietary right as zemindar. We must look to the plaintiff's admitted title as zemindar and to the interference with such title by an established tenure of this kind, to learn what is meant by the term "possession." The mouzahs are part of the plaintiff's zemindary; the plaintiff is the assessed proprietor under the decennial settlement. The defendant claims that which would, if established, be a dependent tenure, the zemindar being his immediate superior in the holding. All the distinct portions of the plaintiff's claim flow from, support, and have relation to and connexion with, his proprietary title, which primâ facie entitles him to the collections. The farming lease supports it, the rent payable under that lease supports it, and the removal of the adverse title would confirm it. If this tenure be not interposed between the zemindar and the cultivators, the ordinary relation between him and them exists; but, if it be interposed, the zemindar's general proprietary title to the collections is gone, and in lieu of it he is simply entitled to some jumma from the mesne proprietors. It is obvious, then, that the assertion of such a title is a serious prejudice to a zemindar, and may materially interfere with his successful management of his zemindary. Such an intermediate tenure cuts off the possession; that is, the zemindar's title to the rents and profits immediately derived from the cultivators. In this sense the term possession is used in this plaint. Now this injury, supposing the claim to the Birt tenure to be groundless, is not the less a wrong requiring a remedy, when it is put forward by one in possession under a title to an inferior right, derived from the zemindar—as, for instance, by a farmer of a portion of the zemindary. If such a claim were preferred by a person having such an interest, it would certainly be competent to the zemindar, if the claim amounted to a repudiation or worked a forfeiture of the existing interest, to sue for the restoration of possession, and the quieting of the claim also; because the limitation of his demand to that of possession would keep alive an adverse claim, and would also multiply suits. A zemindar, or landlord, may waive a forfeiture, and may treat a tenancy or interest as continuing which his tenant repudiates, or in respect of which he has incurred a forfeiture. Consequently, the mere inclusion of a claim for rent in a suit of this character cannot make the suit multifarious, unless it could be treated as multifarious if it insisted on the repudiation or forfeiture. If the Birt tenure be valid, the plaintiff has no title to possession in the sense in which he uses that term. He might have a right to rent for a time on the footing of contract or estoppel, even from a Birt tenant, if the latter accepted a lease, but that would rest on special grounds, and would not flow from his general proprietary title. Until this claim to a Birt tenure therefore be removed, the plaintiff cannot have the "possession" which he seeks, since, in some way or other, the defendant stands between the plaintiff, as owner of the primâ facie proprietary right, and the cultivators. Had the defendant admitted the tenancy under the kaboolut, the plaintiff's title to the rent would have been established, but that admission, unless qualified, would also have removed those impediments to the plaintiff's proprietary title which he desires to have removed; but as the defendant repudiates that tenancy altogether, he, at least when the plaintiff fails to prove it, cannot urge it against the plaintiff's title—Rajah Oodit Purkash Singh v. Martindell (4 Moo. I. A. 444). This lease being removed (the plaintiff having failed to prove it, and the defendant renouncing it) what bar is there to the assertion of the proprietary right to the collections, unless the Birt tenure interpose one. On that bar the defendant does rely, and unless it be removed, the plaintiff can scarcely expect to lease or otherwise manage his zemindary with effect. It is an impediment in the way of his possession, which the suit is instituted to remove. The reasons alleged in the Sudder Ameen's Court for overruling the objection seem to be unsatisfactory; for as the title to mesne profits supposes a wrong, and the title to rent proceeds on contract, the union of such causes of action would be contrary to principle. But as these courts have the divided jurisdiction of a court of law and a court of equity substantially united in one court, a claim for rent in arrear, and a claim to remove clouds on the title to demise raised by the tenant, seem to be unobjectionable, and no authority was cited to support the objection. In truth the claim to rent under the farming lease supports the proprietary title. No inconvenience can result from the inclusion of these subjects in one suit, since the defence to the claim for rent, in fact, raised them all, and they were dealt with without confusion or difficulty.

Decree reversed.

In this case, which has been already reported, [1866] E. R. Westlake now applied to the Court to dispense with the advertisement in a second newspaper under the power given by rule 53 of the same General Order.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that the petition must be duly advertised. The order for winding-up might be drawn up seven days after the advertisement.

Agreement for lease—Specific performance—Damages.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.—Decree for specific performance without prejudice to the question of damages.

This was a suit for specific performance of an agreement for a lease. Damages were also prayed for by the bill.

The plaintiffs, under an agreement for a lease, made in the month of February, 1855, had entered into possession of a water-mill, which they worked in their business as millers. As tenants of the mill they were entitled to the flow of water in the stream on which the mill was built, and by which it was worked. The flow of water in the stream depended on the existence of a weir which was situated higher up the stream on the lessor's property.

In the month of August, 1862, the weir was destroyed by a flood, and the main body of the water of the stream escaped by another canal. After the destruction of the weir the plaintiffs, in the month of September, 1863, requested the lessors, the defendants, to permit them to erect a temporary weir pending the construction of the permanent weir; this permission the lessors, the defendants, refused.

The defendants commenced the erection of a new weir in the month of June, 1863, which was not completed till the month of August, 1864. In June, 1864, on the plaintiffs filing their bill, the defendants themselves erected a temporary weir.

Jessel, Q.C., and Fry, for the plaintiffs.—If the defendants had executed a lease according to the agreement, the lease would have contained a covenant for the repair of the weir, or at all events the plaintiffs would have been entitled at law to enter on the lessors premises, for the purpose of effecting such repair, or of erecting a temporary weir themselves; and it is because the defendants would not erect a temporary weir, nor allow the plaintiffs to do so, that damages are asked for. Damages are only sought from the date of the defendant's refusal to allow the plaintiffs to erect a temporary weir until the erection of a temporary weir by the defendants themselves: Pomfret v. Ricroft (1 M. & S. 321); McSwiney v. Haynes (1 Ir. Eq. Rep. 322). It had been decided in the Court of Exchequer that, where damages had been sought in a court of equity and refused, an action at law for damages will not be permitted; because a court of equity is now, by statutory enactment, with respect to any question of damages, a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with a court of law.—The learned counsel, however, could not find any report of the case referred to.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs' right to damages depends on the liability of the defendants to repair the weir.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—Specific performance of the agreement must be decreed. The lease to be settled in chambers in case the parties differ. The defendants undertaking not to plead the decision of this Court as a defence to any action at law brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover damages, the plaintiffs are to be at liberty to bring any such action against the defendants, the decision of this Court being expressly without prejudice to the question of damages.

MORTGAGE.—Foreclosure suit—Legal and equitable mortgage—Sale under legal mortgage after institution of suit—Costs of parties disclaiming.

This was a foreclosure suit.

had sold the property comprised in the legal mortgage. The parties interested in the property comprised in the legal mortgage had been made defendants to the suit.

VESTED, CONTINGENT AND FUTURE INTERESTS.—A clause for reversion of settled property in case all the objects of the settlement fail does not produce a reversion pro tanto on the failure of some of them.

This was a question raised by petition under a settlement.

By a settlement property was settled upon a husband and wife, and the survivor of them, for life, and on the death of the wife the property was settled equally among the children, or if there should be only one child, then upon such only child of such husband and wife, the same to be a vested interest, and paid to such children or child on their or his attaining twenty-one. And if all the children of the husband and wife should die under twenty-one, then the property was settled on the husband absolutely; and in default of their being any children or child of the husband and wife, then the property was to revert to the settlor.

Four children of the husband and wife attained twenty-one, one died under that age. The question was whether the share of the child dying under twenty-one reverted to the settlor.

Roupell for the representatives of the settlor.

ROMILLY, M.R., decided that the share of the child dying under twenty-one, did not revert to the settlor, but went to the children who attained twenty-one.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Petition—Several incumbrancers—Conduct of decree.

A railway company bought land subject to several incumbrances. An inquiry as to the priority of the incumbrances at chambers was asked for. A petition was then presented by the mortgagor of the property bought by the railway company and one of his incumbrancers, asking for the conduct of the inquiry in chambers. This was opposed by another incumbrancer, who also presented a petition, on the ground of the misconduct of the mortgagor; that the mortgagor was not to be found, and was in fact purposely keeping out of the way; and that the co-petitioner of the mortgagor, who was his solicitor, had shown bad faith towards the other incumbrancers by having concealed the existence of his claim from the knowledge of the other incumbrancers; and he asked that the conduct of the inquiry should be entrusted to himself. The two petitions now came on together.

Southgate, Q.C., and Colt, for the petition by the mortgagor and solicitor.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Pearson, for the other petition.

Hemming, for another incumbrancer who appeared on the petition, not having been served with it, complained that the company had taken no notice of his claim, but had treated only with the mortgagor.

Speed for the railway company.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The mortgagor and his incumbrancer, who first presented their petition, are entitled to the conduct of the inquiry. The absence of the mortgagor is immaterial, if an incumbrancer joins with him in his petition, even although such incumbrancer should be the solicitor of the mortgagor, the validity of his incumbrance being, as in this case, as yet undisputed. The other incumbrancers can, under an order made on this petition, dispute the validity of the security of the solicitor of the mortgagor. As to Mr. Hemming's client, unless his client chooses to come in under this order, it must be made without prejudice to his rights whatever they are. The question of what costs are to be paid by the railway company to be reserved.

Where an only child was contingently entitled under a will containing no direction as to maintenance, and the parties entitled in remainder were of another family, and infants:—Held, that no maintenance could be ordered; but a reference to chambers ordered to effect an insurance on the chance of the infant dying under twenty-one, and thus provide maintenance out of the accumulations.

This was an adjourned summons on the question whether Edith Anne Vaughan Arbuckle, an infant, entitled to 10,000*l.* if she attained twenty-one, under the will of her great grandmother Sarah Kent, could be allowed maintenance in the meantime? The will was dated in February, 1856, and the testatrix, after various gifts on which no question turned, devised and bequeathed all the residue of her real and personal estate to trustees (subject to pay thereout the yearly sums thereafter mentioned, in regard to any child or children of her daughter Sarah Neild who for the time being should not reside with her, or in trust for the issue of any such child or children) in trust to pay the income thereof to her daughter Sarah Neild, for her life, for her separate use, for the maintenance and support of herself, and for the maintenance, support, and education of such of her children as should, for the time being, reside with, or be maintained or educated by her. Then followed a clause against anticipation, and the testatrix directed that after the death of the said Sarah Neild, the said residuary estate should be held in trust for her child and children then born or to be born in her lifetime, equally if more than one, for their his or her respective lives or life; and from and after the decease of each or any child of her said daughter Sarah Neild so born or to be born in her lifetime, whether such death should happen before or after her (the testatrix's) death, or during the lifetime or after the decease of her said daughter, the shares which the said children of her said daughter so dying did take or have, or were to take or have taken, for his or her life, should be held in trust for his or her respective child or children, who respectively, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or be married, equally among them, if more than one, and the executors administrators and assigns of such son or sons, daughter or daughters, respectively: and in case any child of the said Sarah Neild should have no son or daughter who should attain a vested interest in the shares in which such child had a life interest, then upon like trusts for the other children of the said Sarah Neild, and the will proceeded: "Provided that so long during the life of my daughter Sarah Neild, as any of her children, being of the age of twenty-one, should cease to, or should not reside with, or be maintained by her, then my trustees shall, out of the income of my residuary estate, pay or apply for the benefit of such child the yearly sum of 50*l.*, to commence from the time when such child should cease to reside with or be maintained by her; and that in case any child, whether son or daughter, being under the age of twenty-one years, of my said daughter shall cease to, or shall not reside with, or be maintained by my said daughter, whether at or after my decease, then in regard to such or any such child my said trustee shall, out of the income of my residuary estate, pay or apply for the benefit of such or any such child, the yearly sum of 50*l.* during the remainder of the life of my said daughter from the time that he or she shall attain the age of twenty-one years, and, as regards a daughter, notwithstanding that she may be married; and as to any child who, being a daughter, and being entitled to the yearly benefit of the sum of 50*l.* shall be married, such yearly sum shall be for her separate use without power of anticipation. And if any child, having become entitled to 50*l.* a-year, shall afterwards die in the lifetime of my said daughter Sarah Neild, leaving lawful issue him or her surviving, then the sum of 50*l.* shall, during the life of my said daughter, continue payable and be applied for the maintenance and support of such issue, notwithstanding that the father, being the widower of any daughter of my said daughter, shall be of ability to maintain such issue. But in case any child of my said daughter shall afterwards die without leaving lawful issue, then the yearly sum of 50*l.* shall cease. Provided that in case any child or children of my said daughter die in my lifetime, and with respect to the issue of such child, my trustees, during the life of my said daughter, shall pay and apply out of the income of my residuary estate, for the maintenance or benefit of the lawful issue of each such child, the yearly sum of 50*l.*, to commence from the time of my decease, notwithstanding that the father may be of ability to maintain such issue. And in case any child of my said daughter, being a son or daughter, being under the age of twenty-one years, ceases to reside or be maintained by her, and afterwards dies under twenty-one leaving lawful issue, then my trustees shall, during the life of my said daughter, out of the income of my residuary estate, pay and apply for the maintenance or benefit of the lawful issue of each such child the yearly sum of 50*l.*, to commence from the time that the child so dying would, if living, have attained the age of twenty-one years, notwithstanding that the father is of ability to maintain such issue."

The testatrix died in March, 1857, and Sarah Neild died in 1864.

Sarah Neild had nine children, of whom Mrs. Arbuckle, the mother of the present infant, was one; and several of these nine children, including Mrs. Arbuckle, had children, and some of them were still infants and had none. Mrs. Arbuckle predeceased her mother, leaving one child, a daughter, the present applicant, seven years of age, who was therefore entitled to her mother's one-ninth share of the fund of 90,000*l.* (that is 10,000*l.*) on her attaining twenty-one, with accumulations in the meantime, and with the chance of additions by survivorship. Mrs. Arbuckle ceased to reside with her mother, and became entitled to the 50*l.* a-year, and on her death her only child was entitled to it during Sarah Neild's life. Mrs. Arbuckle being dead, leaving this only child, whose father was an officer in the Royal Artillery with limited means, it became desirable, if possible, to obtain maintenance for the infant, and an application for the purpose was made in chambers; but, the point being one of some nicety, was adjourned into court for argument.

Glasse, Q.C., and Prendergast, appeared in support of the summons.

James Kaye, for the trustees of Sarah Kent's will, and for the other parties entitled in remainder, who consented to this application. But (at the suggestion of the Court) he referred to the authorities against the application.

Temperley* (3 Russ. 263).

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I need hardly say that having regard to the circumstances, it is most desirable, if it can be accomplished, to give maintenance to this young lady, in order to enable her father to give her proper advantages. Here is a fund of 10,000*l.* to which she will become entitled if she attains twenty-one, and therefore, of course, she has no present interest and no right to the income, but on attaining twenty-one she will be entitled to the capital and also the accumulations for fourteen years.

It has been contended that there are two grounds, on either of which the Court may find its way to give maintenance; one that upon the construction of the will there is an intention to give maintenance, although there is no express direction in that particular; the other that, supposing the former not to prevail, there is a doctrine of the Court by which, if there be equal claims of survivorship amongst a class of children, the Court will (if the persons entitled in default of any one attaining twenty-one, consent) give maintenance, and that it may, under that doctrine, be possible to order maintenance for this child. Now I have looked into both these points, and all the cases, or a great many of them, on the second point, and I am under the necessity of saying that neither on one ground or the other can I find the means of giving maintenance. But it is very satisfactory to me to reflect that, having considered the matter, I think that in chambers by a policy of insurance we may find the means of getting maintenance. The will is most carefully and skilfully drawn, and has entirely attained the object of the testatrix, which was to provide for Mrs. Neild, her daughter, her children, and grandchildren, being three sets, and yet it is so done that none of the limitations are too remote. It is so drawn that there is no vested interest in any grandchild of Mrs. Neild until some one or other of them, being a son, attains twenty-one or being a daughter marries; and in case any of them should die without leaving a child who should attain twenty-one, that life interest is to go over among the others in like manner as the original shares. Then comes the clause with respect to the 50*l.* a-year. [His Honour read the clause.] It appears to me the whole matter was deliberately done by the testatrix, although it is difficult to see with what object, for if a child ceased to reside with the daughter, not having attained twenty-one, when it would à fortiori require maintenance, it was not to have it, so that it does not stand on the footing of maintenance. It is most carefully done; there is no confusion, no blundering or bungling, and if I were to attempt to give a construction, giving to children in the condition of Miss Arbuckle maintenance, I should be making the will for the testatrix.

Then comes the other question; and it appears to me clear that the principle sought to be relied on does not apply to this case; that principle is simply this—supposing a fund is given among such of a class of children as shall attain twenty-one simpliciter, and suppose there are six children all under age, none having a right to receive anything, till some attain twenty-one, the income being accumulated; the Court has gone so far as to hold that as all those children have inter se an equal chance, and as it is for their common benefit that all should have maintenance, the Court will grant the maintenance out of that which would otherwise be available for accumulation, taking the chance of which of them will live; and if that were the case here I should find no difficulty, provided the persons entitled in remainder gave their consent; but here the fund goes over to another family, and there are infants who cannot consent, and there are distinct funds, though originally portions of the same. The principle relied upon, therefore, is here incapable of application, and therefore I cannot do what is asked.

But let me suppose the income to be 300*l.* a-year, and that we want £100, I think an assurance can be effected on this sort of principle, that the office shall be bound, if this young lady dies at any time before twenty-one, upon her death to make good such a sum as shall be equal to all the equal half-yearly payments, including the premiums, with compound interest. In that way the accumulations would be made good if the fund goes over, while if she attains twenty-one the office pays nothing, and it will be only anticipating so much of the accumulation. There may be some details which I have not anticipated, but I do not feel any doubt of a scheme of this kind being capable of being carried out. There must, therefore, be a reference to chambers with that object.

Glasse, Q.C.—The parties are extremely obliged, but probably a life policy would be the best.

PERPETUITY. — Will — Construction — Rule against perpetuities — Enlargement of life estate.

This was a special case.

A testator gave and bequeathed “to William Forsbrook all my real and personal property, subject to proviso hereinafter named, to wit—It is my will that the aforesaid William Forsbrook, my brother, shall pay or cause to be paid to my daughter, Sarah Brown, a weekly sum of ten shillings during her life and after the decease of my aforesaid brother William Forsbrook and my aforesaid daughter Sarah Brown, it is my will that my aforesaid real and personal property be inherited by my nephew Charles Forsbrook and my nephew Thomas Forsbrook, the sons of my late brother Thomas Forsbrook, during their lives, and after the decease of my said nephew Charles Forsbrook, and after the decease of my said nephew Thomas Forsbrook, it is my will that the eldest son of the aforesaid Charles Forsbrook and the eldest son of the aforesaid Thomas Forsbrook inherit the aforesaid property during their lives, and so on, the eldest son of each of the two families of the name of Forsbrook to inherit the aforesaid property for ever."

All the nephews, and the eldest sons of Charles and Thomas Forsbrook, were alive at the testator's death.

The judgment of the Court was now asked as to whether the two nephews, Charles and Thomas, took estates in tail male, or estate for life only, with remainder to their eldest sons in tail male.

W. Pearson, for the plaintiff, contended that the estates tail were in the two nephews, Charles and Thomas. The ultimate remainders over being void, as infringing the rule against perpetuities, the Court would, on the cy près doctrine, follow as nearly as possible the intention of the testator. The paramount intent here was to admit all the issue. The word "eldest son" is here nomen collectivum, and a word of limitation only. If estates tail are not declared in the two nephews, and their two sons should die in their lifetime, the heir-at-law will take. This would manifestly be a violation of the testator's intention. Rather than this, Seaward v. Willock (5 East, 198) would be followed, and life estates only be given: Fearne's Cont. Rem. Jos. Smith's ed., vol. ii., p. 268; Wollen v. Andrews (2 Bing. 126); Lewis v. Puzley (16 M. & W. 733); Doe v. Garrod (2 B. & A. 87); Robinson v. Robinson (1 Burrow, 38).

STUART, V.C.—This is a case where the doctrine in Seaward v. Willock is entirely excluded, for although the testator gives a succession of life estates, the context clearly shows these estates must be enlarged into estates in tail male. The only question is whether the words which are used to enlarge these are to enlarge the estate of the first two tenants for life, or the estates only of the sons of these two tenants for life. I am clearly of opinion that, on no principle authority, looking at the words of the will, can it be said that the estates of the two first tenants for life are to be enlarged. The eldest sons of these two must take estates by purchase, as persons in existence and certain at the time of the testator's death.

Declare the two nephews to take estates for life, and their eldest sons to take estates in tail male.

Maintenance of an Infant—Allowance for a residence—Power of charging in favour of children given by a will to the testator's son, and attempted to be exercised by the donee who died before the testator—The Wills Act, s. 33.

INFANT.—Where a testator directs the payment of an annual sum of money, just sufficient for the mere maintenance of a minor entitled to the possession of the settled estates, to be applied for such maintenance, and manifests a clear intention that such minor shall reside at the principal mansion on the estates, although no further allowance for the minor's maintenance will be ordered by the Court, yet such a sum will be directed to be paid out of the rents of the settled estates as will suffice to defray the expenses of keeping up the mansion as a residence for the minor.

Josselyn v. Josselyn (9 Sim. 63), stated to be erroneously reported.

POWERS.—A power given by a will to a tenant for life to charge the settled estates in favour of his children is not "an interest not determinable on the death" of the donee within the meaning of the 33rd section of the Wills Act.

This was a petition presented by Frances Evelyn Maynard, the infant plaintiff in the second of these suits, by the Honourable Blanche Adeliza Maynard, her mother and next friend. The object of the petition was threefold: first, with reference to the proper sum to be allowed out of the rents, profits, and income of the estates of the late Right Honourable Henry, Viscount Maynard, the testator in these causes, for the maintenance of the petitioner; secondly, with reference to the maintaining and keeping up during the petitioner's minority of the family mansion house, park, and pleasure grounds, in the county of Essex, called Easton Lodge, and the coach-houses, stables, green-houses, out-houses, and premises thereunto belonging, and with reference to the proper sum to be allowed for the same out of the said rents, profits, and income; and, thirdly, with reference to the right of the infant defendant Blanche Maynard to an annuity of 400*l.* charged on the real estate of the testator by a codicil to the will of Charles Henry Maynard, deceased, the late father of the petitioner, and of her sister the said infant defendant.

The facts bearing on the first two divisions of the petition were as follows:—

On the testator's death, which happened May 19th, 1865, the petitioner, under the limitations in his will, became tenant for life in possession of his estates, but subject to the trusts in the will respecting the receipt of the rents and profits of the said estates by the trustees of the will during the minority of any person for the time being entitled to the possession or to the rents, issues, and profits of the said estates, whereby the trustees were directed out of such rents, issues, and profits, to pay and apply any annual sum or sums of money according to the age of such minor, not exceeding the clear annual sum of 400*l.*, for or towards the maintenance and education of such minor; and to accumulate the surplus of such rents and profits, and to invest the same in the purchase of other estates, to be settled to the uses declared by the will.

The testator by his will, dated August 29th, 1843, and made during the lifetime of his wife, who predeceased him, gave unto the trustees thereof all his family and other plate, household goods, furniture, and effects, linen, china, mirrors, glass, books, pictures, paintings, maps, prints, medals, coins, wines, liquors, live and dead stock, including deer, and all the musical and other instruments, and also all the other articles and things of what nature or kind soever which, at the time of his decease, should be in or about or belonging to his mansion-house called Easton Lodge, and the coach-houses, green-houses, out-houses, and premises thereunto belonging (except any money or securities for money, and any carriages, horses, or harness which might be selected by his said wife) upon certain trusts thereby declared during the life of his said wife, if she should so long continue his widow; and subject thereto, upon trust to permit the same to be held and enjoyed, so far as the rules of law and equity would permit, by the person or persons who, for the time being, should, under or by virtue of that his will, be entitled to the possession, or to the rents, issues, and profits of the said mansion-house called Easton Lodge, yet so nevertheless that the same should not, for the effect or purpose of transmission, vest absolutely in any child of any person thereby made tenant for life thereof, unless or until such child should attain the age of twenty-one years; but, nevertheless, such child should, during his or her minority, be entitled to the use and benefit thereof.

The testator by his will gave his said mansion-house called Easton Lodge, together with the park and pleasure-grounds thereunto belonging or thereunto adjoining, with their and every of their appurtenances, to the uses, and subject to the powers therein declared of and concerning his other freehold estates and hereditaments, except as to a term of 1,000 years therein limited to the trustees, and also except the several powers of leasing, and the power of sale and exchange therein contained.

The testator, by a codicil to his will, dated August 15th, 1850, after revoking certain trusts declared in the will respecting his mansion-house in Grosvenor Square, London, and the articles and things which might be therein at his decease, declared his will and mind to be that from and immediately after his decease the trustees of the will should stand possessed of the said mansion-house in Grosvenor Square, with the offices and of the several articles and things which might be therein at his decease, upon trust to permit or suffer the person who, at the time of his decease, should, under the limitations in his will, be or thereupon become entitled to his mansion-house called Easton Lodge, to select such of the said articles and things as such person should think proper to have removed to Easton Lodge. And he made a declaration as to the non-vesting of the articles and things which should be so selected in minors, and as to the enjoyment thereof by minors, similar in every respect to the declaration which he had made in his will as to the articles which should be, at his decease, in or about Easton Lodge.

By an order of the Court, made in the second of these suits, and dated July 21st, 1865, it was ordered that the trustees of the will should be at liberty, out of the rents, issues, and profits of the testator's estates, to pay the petitioner's mother, as her guardian, the annual sum of 400*l.* for her maintenance, from May 19th, 1865, and until further order.

By the decree made in these causes, and dated July 25th, 1865, it was, amongst other things, declared that the petitioner's mother should be at liberty, until further order, to reside at Easton Lodge with the petitioner and the said infant defendant. Accordingly the petitioner, with her mother and the said infant defendant, went to reside there on August 5th, 1865, and they have since continued to reside there.

Under these circumstances the petitioner submitted that she was entitled during her minority to reside in, and to have the use and occupation of, Easton Lodge, with its appurtenances, and the park and pleasure-grounds thereunto belonging or adjoining; and also to have the use and enjoyment at Easton Lodge of the family and other plate, household goods, furniture, and effects at Easton Lodge, and also the articles and things in the mansion-house in Grosvenor Square which had been selected to be removed from thence to Easton Lodge. And the petitioner further submitted that inasmuch as the testator had directed that Easton Lodge, with the park and pleasure-grounds, were not to be included in the power of leasing, and that during the minority of any person for the time being entitled thereto, such minor was to have the use and enjoyment there of the articles therein, and also of the articles to be removed thither from Grosvenor Square, he must have intended that Easton Lodge, with the park and pleasure-grounds, were, during such minority, to be kept up in a fit and proper manner as the residence of, and as an establishment for, such minor.

The petition prayed that a further and sufficient allowance might be made and paid out of the income of the testator's estates for the petitioner's maintenance during her minority, and that a proper and sufficient annual sum might be allowed and paid out of the income of the said estates for keeping up the mansion-house, park, and pleasure-grounds of Easton Lodge, and a proper establishment there, as a residence for the petitioner during her minority, regard being had to her station in life and her fortune and prospects, and as and from the 5th day of August last, when the petitioner first went to reside at Easton Lodge; and that the trustees might be ordered to pay the sums so to be allowed to the petitioner's mother, as her guardian, until further order.

The petitioner's mother filed an affidavit in support of the petition, which was to the effect that she calculated that it would require the sum of 4,000*l.* annually to keep up Easton Lodge, with its stables and other outbuildings, park and gardens, in a proper state and condition.

It appeared that the net rental of the testator's estates, after allowing for all the charges created on the same by the testator's will, the interest on a mortgage of 24,000*l.*, the allowance for the petitioner's maintenance, land-tax, insurance, and other outgoings, amounted to about 11,000*l.* The mortgage of 24,000*l.* had, by the testator's will, been directed to be paid off out of the rents of his estates.

Amphlett, Q.C., and Walford, for the petitioner, said that as to the first branch of the petition, they could hardly ask the Court to direct the payment of a larger sum than that fixed by the testator for the petitioner's maintenance. On this point Walford called the attention of the Court to the case of Josselyn v. Josselyn, as it is reported in 9 Sim. 63. He said that there was an error in that report, which was discovered by Mr. Macpherson, and made public by him in his work on the Law relating to Infants, p. 229 n. It appeared from Mr. Macpherson's correction that the additional money allowed for the infant's maintenance in that case was paid, not out of property in which the infant had only a contingent interest, but out of the rents of real estate in which the infant had a vested interest. As to the second head of the petition, however, they contended that it was perfectly clear from the testator's will that he never intended Easton Lodge to be let. If it was not to be let, some provision should be made for keeping it in a habitable and proper condition. In Thellusson v. Woodford (5 Russ. 100), a testator directed a certain house to be kept as a place of occasional residence for his sons and trustees, but made no express provision for so keeping it, and the Court ordered a sufficient sum to be applied for that purpose out of the bulk of the testator's property which was directed to be accumulated. It was of the greatest importance that the petitioner should be brought up on the family estates, and in the midst of her future neighbours and tenantry. Having regard to the net income of the settled estates, and to the character of Easton Lodge, the annual sum of 4,000*l.* would not be too great to be allowed for the proper keeping up of the house and establishment. All the persons entitled in remainder, except one, who was travelling about, and whose present address was unknown, were represented by counsel.

Rolt, Q.C., and Faber, for the trustees.

Osborne, Q.C., Schomberg, and Briggs, appeared for other parties.

WOOD, V.C., said that he had no doubt that the testator's intention was that Easton Lodge should not be let, but should be kept up as a place of residence for the person who should from time to time be entitled to the settled estates. The testator had clearly, and over and over again, manifested this intention. Easton Lodge was expressly exempted from the term of a thousand years, and from the power of leasing given by the will, the furniture and articles in it at the testator's decease were made heir-looms, and all the other articles elsewhere, which were made heir-looms, were directed to be taken thither and to be kept there. The allowance made for the petitioner's maintenance, though sufficient for that purpose irrespective of keeping up any establishment for her, was wholly inadequate to keeping up a large mansion like Easton Lodge with its park and pleasure grounds. Under these circumstances, even if the persons entitled in remainder to the testator's settled estates had objected to the petitioner's present application, he should still have made an order that some additional sum should be allowed her, though he should have felt it his duty to make a much more narrow inquiry as to the exact amount which it would be proper to allow her. As it was, however, there being no objection on the part of anyone as to the allowance or as to the amount of the sum which had been mentioned as the proper and necessary sum, and having regard to the fact that after deducting the yearly sum of 400*l.* already applied for the petitioner's maintenance and the yearly sum of 4,000*l.* now asked for out of the net rents of the estates, the only charge on the property directed to be paid off out of such rents could still be paid off in less than four years, he should make an order for the payment of the annual sum of 4,000*l.* out of the rents of the testator's estates to the petitioner's guardian, for the purpose of keeping up Easton Lodge with its park and pleasure-grounds, as a residence for the petitioner. This sum would be paid from the 5th of August last, when the petitioner first went to reside at Easton Lodge, and until further order.

See, Bonsor v. Bonsor, [1897] E. R. A.; 66 L. J. P. 35; [1897] P. 77; 76 L. T. 168; 45 W. R. 304 (P. D. & A.).

Writ of sequestration—When issued to enforce orders of the Court.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—Where the Court, on a decree for judicial separation at the suit of the wife, ordered her permanent alimony to be paid out of income receivable by trustees, and payable by them to the husband, and such trustees, though served with a copy of the order, refused to comply with it, on the ground that the terms of the instrument creating the trust did not permit them to dispose of any part of the trust money in that way.

The Court ordered a writ of sequestration to issue against all money coming into the hands of the trustees for the respondent so far as the arrears of alimony and costs.

This was an application for a general writ of sequestration against all moneys destined for the respondent in the hands, or to come into the hands of, Messrs. Ouvry & Farrar, trustees of a will, under which the defendant is entitled to 400*l.* per annum.

A decree for judicial separation had been obtained in April, 1865, by the applicant, in a suit instituted by her against the present defendant; and on the 25th of July, 1865, the Court ordered the respondent, until further order, to pay to the petitioner permanent alimony at the rate of 110*l.* per annum, payable quarterly, to commence from the date of the final decree. The respondent has not been within the jurisdiction of the Court since that order was made, but it was served on his solicitors in the suit for judicial separation, and also on Messrs. Ouvry & Farrar, the trustees above named, and through whom it was alleged the respondent draws his income. No portion, however, of this alimony had ever been paid. The defendant is the brother of the late Duke of Newcastle, under whose will it is alleged the above income of 400*l.* per annum is derived. The writ was to compel the recovery of three quarters of the alimony decreed, and the costs of that decree and of the present application.

The order for permanent alimony directed 110*l.* to be paid to the petitioner until the respondent made it appear that the 400*l.* per annum given him by the will of the Duke of Newcastle ceased to be paid. On the solicitors for the petitioner applying to the trustees for payment of the alimony, they replied that they did not consider they had power to apply any part of the annuity given by the Duke of Newcastle to the respondent in payment of such alimony.

The petitioner's affidavit set forth that she was in circumstances of the greatest indigence, and that the defendant resided permanently in Dieppe, where he lived in comfort with the lady with whom he had committed the adultery which was the ground for the suit for judicial separation. It appeared further that the present Duke of Newcastle had intimated to the petitioner, through a friend of her's, that arrangements were made which would enable the respondent to pay the petitioner 1l. a week, which she declined.

Tristram, Dr., now moved that a general writ of sequestration do issue against all moneys in the hands, or to come into the hands, of Messrs. Ouvry & Farrar, or either of them, for the personal use, support, or benefit of the respondent, by virtue of the second codicil to the will of the late Duke of Newcastle, for three quarters' arrears of alimony, and the costs of and incidental to the decree for alimony, and to this application, and to the writ of sequestration.

The Court granted a decree nisi for sequestration to issue as prayed for.

Feb. 13.—Swabey, Dr., on behalf of the trustees appeared to shew cause.—By the terms of the will the trustees hold any part of the annuity of 400l. which they do not choose to pay into Lord Thomas Clinton's (the respondent's) own hands, in trust for the persons entitled to the rents of the land on which it is secured, and if anyone but Lord Thomas Clinton can take any part of the 400l. it must be his assignees in bankruptcy.

Tristram, Dr., appeared in support of the rule.—The 400l. given to the respondent in the will of the late Duke of Newcastle, is by way of rent-charge, and it is laid down in Wilson v. Metcalfe (1 Beav. 263), that a rent-charge may be taken by sequestration. The sequestration must be general in order that the trustees may have no room to object. I presume this Court will order sequestration to issue in the same cases as the Court of Chancery, and there it issues for non-compliance with order to answer, or for non-payment of money into Court: Johnson v. Chippendale (2 Sim. 55); Franklyn v. Colhoun (12 Ves. 3).

WILDE, J.O., after hearing the arguments, made the rule absolute, and sequestration was ordered to issue accordingly.

LALLA BUNSEEDHUR v. MUSSUMAT GUNAISH KOER.*

14 W. R. 547.

Agra—Charge by guardian on the estate of his ward—Hindoo law—Purchase at an execution sale set aside—Rate of interest allowed.

INDIA.—He who sets up a charge upon a minor's estate, created in his favour by the guardian, is, by the Hindoo law, bound to show at least that, when the charge was created, there were reasonable grounds for believing that the transaction was for the benefit of the estate.

The proposition that no difference is to be made between an innocent purchaser and one tainted by the fraud which has brought about the execution sale, seems wholly untenable. The question is, in the former case, which of two innocent parties shall suffer; in the latter, whether he who has wronged the other party shall be allowed to enjoy the fruits of his wrong-doing. A court of equity may withhold its hand in the one case, and yet set aside the sale with or without terms in the other.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of the North-Western Provinces at Agra, dated the 20th of July, 1863, which affirmed a decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Allahabad, dated the 11th November, 1861, and also from another decree of the same Court, made on a partial review of the previous decree, and dated the 31st of May, 1864. The suit out of which the appeal arose was brought by Koonwur Bindersee Dutt Singh (whom, though he has since died, and was represented on the record by his widow and heiress, it will be convenient to call the respondent) to recover from the appellant a talook and other ancestral property, with mesne profits.

It appeared that Sheodutt Singh, the respondent's father, had had in his lifetime pecuniary dealings with Seetaram Singh, the appellant's father, and that he had been thereby involved in a long course of litigation with the appellant.

In 1828 Seetaram Singh, the father of the appellant, had lent, or agreed to lend 29,500rs. to Sheodutt Singh, on a mortgage of the ancestral talook now in dispute. The talook consisted of twenty-nine villages, and the mortgage was to be a usufructuary mortgage, by way of lease for ten years of the whole talook. Before this arrangement was completed, it turned out that two other persons, named Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal, claimed to be prior mortgagees of part of the talook. It was at first settled between Sheodutt Singh and his mortgagees that Seetaram should apply part of the 29,500rs. in paying off Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal; but it was ultimately arranged between those two persons and Seetaram that the three should be jointly interested in the mortgage, the share of Seetaram being taken to be 17,700rs. and that of the other two 11,800rs.

The instrument of the 27th of May, 1828, by which this so-called partnership was effected, provided that if it should be deemed advisable thereafter to dissolve the partnership, the property should be divided and held separately in the proportions above specified. They entered into possession of the mortgaged property in June, 1828, and in 1831 dissolved their so-called partnership; thereupon Bishun Dayal and Baijnauth became mortgagees in possession of twelve, and Seetaram became, or ought to have become, mortgagee in possession of the remaining seventeen, villages of the talook; but, as a matter of fact, he never was in possession of five of these villages, they having been, prior to the mortgage, transferred by Sheodutt Singh to his wives and two other persons.

Seetaram carried on his general business in partnership with one Sheosuhai, and, on the dissolution of their partnership, and a consequent division of its assets, this mortgage fell to the share of Sheosuhai. He was never, however, recognised as mortgagee by Sheodutt Singh, nor was his name recorded as mortgagee until after June, 1838, when the period of ten years, during which the possession of the mortgage was to continue, expired. Sheosuhai and the other parties then in possession of the mortgaged premises retained possession after June, 1838; they allowed the Government revenue to fall into arrear, in consequence of which the estate was attached, and let in farm, for six years, to one Ilahee Buksh, by an assignment of whose security Torab Ali acquired the whole of the interest as mortgagee (if any) of Sheosuhai, and also the mortgage rights of Baijnauth, those of Bishun Dayal having become vested in some other parties. Torab Ali instituted proceedings on the mortgage securities against Sheodutt Singh, claiming the balance alleged to be due on them; but these proceedings, though successful in the Court of First Instance, were ultimately dismissed by the Sudder Court, apparently on the ground that the mortgage-debt had been satisfied by the perception of rents during the possession under the ten years' lease.

In this state of things, and on the 17th June, 1842, Sheodutt Singh brought the first suit of which there was any mention in the case, against the appellant and his brother since deceased, as the sons and representatives of Seetaram Singh, and against all the other persons who, in the course of the transactions lastly above stated, had become interested in the mortgage securities or had been in possession of the mortgaged premises. The object of the suit was to recover possession of the property, on the double ground that the principal and interest of the mortgage-debt had been liquidated by the collections, and that the period for which the property had been mortgaged had expired; and it also claimed a large sum for the mesne profits of the four years during which it was alleged possession had been wrongfully retained. Although the plaint in this suit expressly stated that the principal and interest of the mortgage-debt had been liquidated by the collections, the representatives of Seetaram Singh did not dispute that allegation. Their defence was simply that by reason of the assignments to Sheosuhai by Seetaram, he had ceased to have either interest or liability in the matter. The course of the suit was as follows:—

On the 26th of June, 1843, the Principal Sudder Ameen decreed in favour of the plaintiff for redemption and possession of the estate after the expiration of the farm, but non-suited the claim for mesne profits and damages. On a remand from the Sudder Court, the same officer, by a decree dated the 28th of November, 1843, made the appellant and his brother, as co-heirs of Seetaram, liable jointly with Sheosuhai in the sum of 16,570rs. 7a. 9 as mesne profits for the year 1246 (A.D. 1839-40), but dismissed the claim for damages for the years 1247, 1248, and 1249 B.S. It should also be mentioned that he expressly found in his judgment that the mortgage-debt had been discharged. There was an appeal from this second decision, and the Sudder Court, by its original decree on that appeal, held that the appellant, as the then sole heir and representative of Seetaram (his brother having died), was solely liable to the plaintiff for the mesne profits and damages due to him; and that the sum awarded by the principal Sudder Ameen ought to be increased by the mesne profits of the years 1247, 1248, and 1249. Their decree seems to have proceeded on the ground that Seetaram and his estate were primarily liable to the mortgagor for the non-delivery of the possession when it ought to have been re-delivered; and were accountable for the mesne profits of the whole estate, notwithstanding the transfer to Baijnauth, Bishun Dayal, Sheosuhai, and others. The appellant applied for and obtained a review of this decree on the grounds that he was improperly charged with the mesne profits of the twelve villages held in possession by Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal; that he was improperly charged with the profits of the five villages of which, by reason of their assignment to Sheodutt's wives and others, Seetaram was never in possession, and that he was improperly charged with a certain amount under the head of "sayer;" and he again raised the question that the effect of the transfer to Sheosuhai was to determine the liability of Seetaram for the profits of any part of the estate. The majority of the Court decided against the appellant on the last point, and in his favour on the three others; and the final decree was against him for the sum of 14,865rs. 10a. being the amount of the profits claimed in respect of the twelve villages of which Seetaram was unquestionably in possession after the dissolution of the so-called partnership between him and Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal. This final decree was dated the 1st of March, 1846. The appellant satisfied this judgment by payment into the court to the amount of 26,211rs. 12a. 9; and these moneys were afterwards paid out through the Mooktar of Sheodutt Singh.

The appellant having thus satisfied this decree, instituted, in the year 1847, a suit against Sheodutt Singh. His claim was founded on the wrong done to Seetaram by reason of his not getting possession of the five villages assigned to the wives of Sheodutt Singh, and was for the profits of those villages during the ten years of the mortgage lease. The gross amount claimed was 27,129rs. 6a. 6 principal, and an equal sum for interest.

The proceedings in this suit are contained in vol 4, p. 60, of the Sudder Decisions for the North-Western Provinces (1849), from which it appears that the Principal Sudder Ameen, on the 31st of December, 1847, decreed in favour of the appellant; but he awarded him only so much of the profits as fell within the period of twelve years prior to the institution of the suit, treating the rest of the claim as barred by the Regulation of Limitation. The Sudder Court, on appeal, reversed this decree, and, by its decree, of the 26th of March, 1849, dismissed the appellant's suit altogether, the Court having apparently been of opinion that if Seetaram had any claim for damages in respect of the failure to give him possession of these villages, he should have sued during the currency of the lease; and that, at all events, his representative (the appellant) could not then maintain that action. The appellant obtained leave to appeal to her Majesty in council against this decree, and his appeal was pending in 1850, when the ikrarnamah, which will presently be referred to, was signed. In the meantime, in 1848, Sheodutt Singh had brought his suit against the appellant for the profits of the talook during the years of the farming lease, which were not covered by former suit, and had obtained a judgment for the sum of 7,480rs. 4a. 9. He had also commenced a third suit against the appellant in the name of his son, the respondent, in respect of property derived by the respondent from his mother. That suit was undecided on the 3rd of July, 1849, when Sheodutt Singh died.

It appeared that for advances to carry on the above litigation against the appellant, and otherwise, Sheodutt Singh had become largely indebted to another (and probably rival) capitalist, named Mohun Lall. At the time of Sheodutt's death his only son and heir (the respondent) was but four years old, and his step-mother, Goolab Koonwur, became his guardian. In February, 1850, a negotiation took place between that lady and the appellant, which resulted in her executing to him, on the 17th day of that month, an ikrarnamah or deed of compromise (the provisions of which are sufficiently stated in the judgment), by which she, amongst other things charged the minor's estate with the payment of a sum of 27,000rs. to the appellant, and undertook to prosecute certain claims against Mohun Lall, the appellant undertaking to advance money on certain terms for that purpose, as also for the purpose of resisting the claims which Mohun Lall was prosecuting against the estate. In February, 1851, Mohun Lall having obtained judgment against the estate for 26,986rs. 15a. 4, and taken out execution thereon, had advertised the property now in dispute for sale on the 20th of that month. To prevent this sale the appellant advanced the amount of the judgment-debt; and on the 19th of February commenced a suit against Goolab Koonwur, as the guardian of the respondent, in which he claimed as due to him from the estate 1st, the amount of that advance; 2nd, the sum of 27,000rs., which was stipulated by the ikrar to be paid to him; and, 3rd, a further sum of 1,354rs. 1a. 9, alleged to have been advanced for the purposes of the proceedings against Mohun Lall; making in all the sum of 55,341rs. 1a. 1. On the following day the guardian, as defendant, filed a confession of judgment, admitting the whole amount claimed to be due, undertaking to pay it by annual instalments of 7,000rs., reciting the ikrar and the advance of the 26,986rs. 15a. 4; hypothecating the minor's estate as a security for the whole amount admitted to be due; and providing that, in the event of any failure in the payment of the annual instalments, the appellant should be at liberty to take out execution against the hypothecated property for the whole amount of his judgment-debt with interest. It was stipulated, however, that the 27,000rs. should bear no interest, and that the rate of interest on the rest of the debt should be 6 per cent.

The instalments were not paid, and, in 1853, the appellant took out execution on the judgment confessed for the sum of 70,168rs. 7a. 11, put up the property for sale under that execution, and, on the 20th June, 1858, purchased it himself for 51,635rs. In consequence, however, of a mortgage on the talook, which was held by Mohun Lall, and gave rise to a protracted litigation, he did not obtain possession of that portion of the property purchased until the year 1860.

The respondent attained his majority in December, 1860, and commenced this suit on the 22nd of July, 1861. By his plaint he impeached as invalid and collusive the ikrar, the cognovit or judgment by confession, and the execution sale. The Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Allahabad made a decree in his favour on the 11th of November, 1861, awarding him possession of the property sued for, with 36,470rs. 11a. 6 for mesne profits and damages, but allowing the appellant to set off against this sum the sum of 28,418rs. 3a. 10, which was compounded of the before-mentioned items of 26,986rs. 15a. 4, and 1,354rs. 1a. 9.

On appeal, the Sudder Court of Agra, by its decree of the 20th of July, 1863, generally affirmed this decree, but reduced the damages awarded by an allowance of 5 per cent. for the cost of collection and management, and by the sum paid for income tax; and also reduced the deduction or set off allowed to the appellant by the item of 1,354rs. 1a. 9. And by its decree of the 31st of May, 1864, made on an application for review of judgment, the same Court modified its own decree by allowing the appellant interest on the principal sum of 26,986rs. 15a. 4, which was to be deducted by him, at the rate of 5 per cent. The present appeal was brought against these three decrees.

Forsyth, Q.C., Pontifex, and Melvill, for the appellant.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., and Leith, for the respondent.

Sir J. W. COLVILLE now delivered judgment (after stating the facts as above).—The first and principal question that arises upon the present appeal is, whether the ikrar of the 17th of February, 1850, which was executed by his guardian during his minority, is binding upon the respondent. In dealing with this question we have no difficulty about the ratio decidendi, since it is admitted that the principles which govern it have been authoritatively laid down in the case of Hunoomanpersad Pandey, (6 Moo. I. Ap. 423). It is there said, "the power of the manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, is, under the Hindoo law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in a case of need, or for the benefit of the estate. The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded." And, again, "The lender is bound to inquire into the necessity for the loan and to satisfy himself, as well as he can, with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate." It follows, from the passages above cited and from the rest of this judgment, that he who sets up a charge upon a minor's estate, created in his favour by the guardian, is bound to show, at least, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate." It follows, from the passages above cited and from the rest of this judgment, that he who sets up a charge upon a minor's estate, created in his favour by the guardian, is bound to show, at least, that when the charge was so created there were reasonable grounds for believing that the transaction was for the benefit of the estate. The learned counsel for the appellant have not ventured to contend that the stipulations of the instrument to which these principles have now to be applied, were, upon the face of them, beneficial to the respondent's estate. Their arguments have been directed to show that the whole transaction might be justified by a consideration of the circumstances in which the parties stood, and of the nature of the litigation in which Sheodutt Singh had in his lifetime been engaged. It becomes necessary, therefore, to review, as briefly as may be, the very tedious and intricate history of that litigation. [His Lordship here proceeded to review the history of that litigation, the substance of which has been set out above.]

Hence, at the date of the ikrarnamah, the position of the appellant and the respondent's guardian with reference to the antecedent litigation was this:—The appellant had been decreed to pay, and had paid, 26,211rs. 12a. 9, in respect of the final decree of 1846. By the decree of 1848 he had been found liable to pay, but had not paid, 7,480rs. 4a. 9 with (probably) interests and costs. Another suit was pending against him, but had not been decided. On the other hand he had brought a suit to enforce a claim for upwards of 50,000rs. against the estate of Sheodutt Singh. But this claim had been only partially decreed in his favour by the Zillah Court, had been wholly dismissed by the Sudder Court, and was the subject of an appeal to England. This being the position of the parties, what were the provisions of the ikrarnamah which the guardian was induced to sign? The first clause, after stating that the appellant had been unjustly made to suffer the losses which he had sustained, by reason of Sheodutt Singh's first suit, partly in order to compensate him for such losses, and partly in order to induce him to abandon the appeal in his own suit, made the estate liable to pay him 27,000rs. without interest. This clause was obviously against the minor's interest, in so far as it re-opened the questions closed by the final decree of the first of March, 1846; admitted the injustice of the claim on which it was founded, and gave compensation to the appellant for the loss which it had inflicted upon him. It is contended, however, that the success of the appeal was so probable, and the consequences of that success were so serious, that the guardian was justified in spending 27,000rs. to avert that danger from the estate. This is the point which has been most laboured at the bar, but their Lordships can find in the facts before them no reasonable grounds for such a conclusion. In the course of their ingenious argument, the learned counsel for the appellant were almost constrained to admit that the particular action was misconceived, inasmuch as it was brought to recover the mesne profits of certain villages of which ex concessis, the defendant had not been in possession. They were further obliged to admit that, under Regulation XXXIV. of 1803, the interest of the holder of a usufructuary mortgage in the property would cease on the liquidation by the usufruct of the principal and interest of his debt; and, consequently, that in any action founded on the breach of the agreement, express or implied, to give possession of the five villages, it was essential to allege and prove that, by reason of the non-delivery of such possession, something still remained due on the mortgage. Their Lordships have extreme difficulty in seeing how such a suit could have been maintained by the appellant; since, in the first suit of Sheodutt Singh against him, it had been alleged and proved as a fact that the mortgaged debt had been fully discharged; and he, instead of taking issue on that allegation, had sought to escape liability by showing that, by reason of Seetaram's assignment to Sheosuhai, he had no interest whatever in the mortgage. But, assuming that he might have maintained such a suit, they have to observe that it would have been founded on a cause of action different from that on which the suit actually brought proceeded; and that it is not to be supposed that, if the appeal had come here, this committee would have taken the unprecedented course suggested by Mr. Pontifex, of reversing a decree that had dismissed a suit improperly conceived, and of remanding the cause in order that it might be moulded into a suit of an entirely different character. To their Lordships it appears that the appeal occasioned no such danger to the minor's estate; and that there are no grounds for saying that the stipulations of the 1st clause, so favourable to the appellant, were for the benefit of the minor, or could have been reasonably supposed to be so. The 3rd clause appears to their Lordships to be of the same character. No plausible reasons have been assigned why the guardian should embark in an expensive litigation in order to recover back from Mohun Lall sums for which he would necessarily have to account in the general account then open, and unsettled between him and the estate; or why, in consideration of advances for the purposes of that litigation, she should agree to divide with the appellant moneys which, if recovered, would belong to the minor's estate. The latter objection affects also the 7th clause.

There is a conflict of evidence concerning the alleged payment of the sum of 7,480rs. 1a. 9, mentioned in the 4th clause. The oral evidence to negative the payment is undoubtedly very loose and unsatisfactory, and the gomastah of the appellant has given some evidence of the fact of payment, which he corroborated by the production of an entry in the appellant's books. On the other hand, it is remarkable that the appellant, though examined as a witness on other points, did not depose to this payment; and the circumstance that the claim in respect of which this sum had been decreed, was of precisely the same character as those which the first clause of the document had pronounced to be unjust, tends to justify the conclusion of the Courts below, that this clause was, under colour of an admission of a payment that was never made—the release of a judgment-debt to the prejudice of a minor's estate. Their Lordships do not think it is necessary to decide the question whether this payment was really made. If it was not made, the clause, no doubt, affords another strong argument against the validity of the ikrar; but if it was made, it would not in any degree cure the other defects of that instrument, which would have to be considered as if this clause were not inserted in it. The 5th clause seems to imply the abandonment of the suit pending at the date of Sheodutt Singh's death. It was therefore also to the prejudice of the estate. If the above-stated view of the particular clauses of the ikrar be correct, the only ground on which the instrument can be supported is, that the transaction, as a whole, was for the benefit of the estate, because the necessity for obtaining the pecuniary assistance of the appellant was so urgent that the guardian was justified in submitting to the extraordinary and usurious terms on which it was to be given. There is no proof of such a necessity; and it might be sufficient for the purposes of this appeal to say that, in their Lordships' judgment, the appellant has wholly failed to relieve himself of the burden which the law casts upon him of showing that he had good grounds for supposing that this transaction was for the benefit of the estate.

Their Lordships, however, are disposed to go further, and to say that the Courts below were warranted in imputing the character of fraudulent contrivance to this transaction. The negotiation out of which it sprang was one between a Purdah woman, acting as the guardian and manager of an infant's estate, and a keen man of business, at that time a debtor to the estate. She is induced to sign an instrument which transforms the debtor into a creditor, and heavily burthens her ward's property, without consideration, except the merely colourable one of the abandonment of the appeal, and the promise of future advances for the purpose of litigation, of which a portion, at least, was neither necessary nor prudent; of litigation which, if unsuccessful, would be ruinous to the estate, and, if successful, was to result in a division of spoils absolutely incompatible with her duty as guardian. It is not shown that, in coming to this agreement, she had the assistance of proper or independent advisers. On the other hand, it is not shown affirmatively by what practice (if any), upon her ignorance or her fears, she may have been induced to execute the document. She may or she may not have been fully informed as to what she was doing. But whether she was herself defrauded, or whether she acted in collusion with the appellant, the transaction was in either case a fraud upon the respondent.

It has, however, been strongly urged that this finding of the invalidity of the ikrar is not fatal to the title of the appellant, as purchaser, at the execution sale. It has been contended that his rights are identical with those which a stranger purchasing at the same sale would have had; that the execution was good, at least, to the extent of the 26,987rs., advanced to save the property from sale at the suit of Mohun Lall; and that the rights of the respondent against the appellant, taking them at their highest, are limited to the recovery of the difference between the last-mentioned sum and the price bid at the execution sale. Another argument in favour of this conclusion was, that the respondent had not really been injured by the sale of his ancestral property under this execution, because he would equally have lost it if it had been sold at the suit of Mohun Lall. As to the latter argument, it seems sufficient to observe that we have to deal with the rights of the parties in the events that have happened, not in those that might have happened; that the salvation of the property by other means from the sale at Mohun Lall's suit was not absolutely impossible; and that, in any case, an execution for 26,987rs. is less formidable than one for upwards of 70,000rs. Again, it is to be observed that, if the respondent has been wronged by the sale of his property at the suit of the appellant, the relief suggested falls very far short of an adequate remedy for that wrong. The property of which he has been deprived was ancestral; and the feeling on the subject of ancestral property is so strong in those provinces, that the policy of allowing it to be taken in execution, and sold under judicial sales, has been seriously questioned. And even if no account is to be taken of that feeling, it is notorious that landed property, when sold under an execution, rarely, if ever, realises its full value. It follows, therefore, that to restore the property to the respondent, on the terms of paying to the appellant what may be justly due to him, is far more equitable than the proposed limitation of his remedy to the surplus proceeds of the sale; and the only question is whether the sale has interposed an effectual bar to the application of the more appropriate equity.

Their Lordships concur with the learned judges of the Sudder Court in dissenting from the authority of the case stated to have been decided in 1847, by two out of three of the then judges of the Sudder Court of the North-Western Provinces. The proposition that no difference is to be made between an innocent purchaser and one tainted by the fraud which has brought about the execution sale seems to them to be wholly untenable. The question is, in the former case, which of two innocent parties shall suffer; in the latter whether he who has wronged the other party shall be allowed to enjoy the fruits of his wrong-doing. A Court exercising equitable jurisdiction may withhold its hand in the one case, and yet set aside the sale with or without terms in the other. In the present case the judgment by cognovit, the execution, and the sale, are all tainted with the fraud which entered into the original transaction, the execution of the ikrar. All are parts of the contrivance by which the respondent has been deprived of his property, and the appellant has acquired it. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that both the courts below were right in decreeing that possession of the property should be restored to the respondent. In considering on what terms this should be done, their Lordships concur with the Sudder Court in thinking that the only principal sum for which the appellant was entitled to receive credit was the 26,987rs. That he had no title to the 27,000rs. follows obviously from what has been already said. Nor has he, in their Lordships' opinion, shown any better title to the 1,354rs. That sum had been advanced for costs for the litigation in which he involved the guardian under the 3rd clause of the ikrar. Of that litigation, if it had been successful, he would have had half the fruits. It was unsuccessful. He cannot be allowed to carry on this kind of speculation at the risk and costs of an infant's estate.

The only remaining point—and it is one on which their Lordships have felt some difficulty—is the rate of interest to be allowed on the 26,987rs. The Attorney-General has insisted that it was a favour to the appellant, in the circumstances, to give him any interest at all on that sum; that the rate was in the discretion of the Court below; and that their Lordships should not interfere with that discretion. On the other side it has been argued that the rate ought to be twelve per cent., such being the current rate of interest, and that which the judgment debt of Mohun Lall would naturally have carried. The contention below on the hearing of the application for a review was that the rate should be six per cent., or the contract rate, as shown by the confession of judgment. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the third course is that which should be adopted. If interest was to be allowed at all—and they think the Court below was right in allowing it—the rate should be fixed according to some principle, not according to the arbitrary discretion of the judges. On the other hand, the appellant has no right to complain if he receives interest at the rate for which he stipulated when he made the advance. It may be true that he would not have advanced his money on terms so favourable to the estate if he had not had in view the corrupt advantages for which he had stipulated in the ikrar. But there is no reason why the Court, because it will not let him reap the benefit of those improper stipulations, should make a new contract for him in respect of this particular advance.

On the whole, then, their Lordships will humbly recommend to her Majesty that the decree of the Sudder Court be modified by the allowance of interest on the 26,987rs. at the rate of six per cent. instead of that of five per cent. per annum, but that in all other respects that decree be affirmed with costs. They do not think that so slight a modification ought to deprive the respondent of the costs of this appeal.

Decree affirmed as modified.

Re TOLHAUSEN'S PATENT.

14 W. R. 551.

Patent—Sealing—Prior user—Evidence.

PATENT.—In a case where there was but one affidavit distinctly swearing to public use and sale of an alleged invention prior to the date of the application for a patent, the Great Seal was ordered to be affixed to the patent.

This was a petition that the Great Seal might be affixed to the petitioner's patent, as of the 7th September, 1865, notwithstanding the objections on the part of the opposer, and that, if necessary, the time of provisional protection might be extended.

The original petition was presented on the 7th September, 1865, and provisional protection was granted on that day. The petitioner gave notice to proceed on the 8th November, and objections were, on the 5th December, 1865, lodged by Mr. Nottage, the opposer, to the effect that the invention was not new at the date of the application. The matter was, on the 7th December, referred to the Attorney-General, and he, on the 21st February, 1866, gave permission to the petitioner to proceed. Before, however, the patent could be sealed, further objections were lodged by Nottage, to the effect that the alleged invention had been publicly used and sold before the date of the application. The person alleged to have sold them, however, made no affidavit on the point. The provisional protection expired on the 7th March, and the present petition was presented on the 3rd March.

The alleged invention was a species of firework commonly known as "Pharaoh's Serpents."

Willcock, Q.C. for the petitioner.

McGregor, for the opposer, urged that there had been delay on the part of the petitioner, and relied on the evidence which was produced of prior public sale. He also read passages from works on chemistry to show that the substance of which the alleged invention was composed was well known to chemists long before the application, and argued that there was no novelty except in the name of "Pharaoh's Serpents."

Willcock, Q.C., in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that however absurd it might seem to affix the Great Seal to a patent for such a trivial matter as the present invention, yet, as there was only one affidavit distinctly swearing to public sale prior to the date of the application, and that was not corroborated by the person alleged to have sold the goods, he could not refuse to affix the Great Seal. If the alleged invention should turn out not to be new, the matter could be set right in another way.

DICKSON v. HOOK.

Settlement—Separate use of wife—Restraint on anticipation—Advances by trustees—Liability.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—A married woman, restrained from anticipation, cannot agree to release her trustees from liability incurred by their disregard of that restraint.

This suit, which has stood over from time to time since the year 1855, was instituted against the trustees of a settlement by a married woman, to obtain the replacement of trust funds which had been improperly dealt with by them.

By a settlement, made on the marriage of a lady, the sum of 10,000*l.* was settled upon certain trusts for her separate use, without power of anticipation. The trustees of the settlement, at the request of the lady and her husband, had from time to time advanced money from the corpus of the fund, for the husband's benefit.

Subsequently the lady, by her next friend, filed a bill, alleging mismanagement of the trust fund of the settlement, and seeking to have so much of the fund as had been improperly dealt with by the trustees replaced.

She submitted to have so much of the fund as should have been advanced to her husband with her consent allowed to the trustees.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Waller, for the plaintiff.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for the defendant Hook, contended that the plaintiff had, by her bill, precluded herself from requiring the replacement of any moneys advanced by the trustees to her husband; and the liability of a trustee would not extend to any improper dealing which might have taken place before his appointment.

Jessel, Q.C., Wickens, and Southgate, Q.C., for other defendants.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—To allow the trustees to avail themselves of the wife's submission to allow the sums advanced to her husband, would be to disregard the clause in restraint of anticipation. The trustees were bound to know whether they were acting within their powers. There must be an order for an inquiry as to the state of the trust funds, and a direction that the trustees shall replace what may be found due from them respectively.

Receiver—Copies of accounts.

RECEIVER.—Where the plaintiff and the receiver appointed in a suit appear by the same solicitor only one copy of the receiver's account will be allowed on taxation.

In this case a solicitor, who acted both for the plaintiff in the suit and for a receiver appointed by the Court, claimed to be allowed the costs of two copies of the accounts. In passing five of the receiver's accounts, the Chief Clerk had allowed a charge for making a copy of each account for the plaintiffs. On the sixth account being passed an objection to the allowance of such charge was made by certain parties interested in the estate, who had obtained leave to attend the proceedings, on the ground that the same solicitors appeared for the plaintiffs and the receiver.

A question had also been raised as to whether it was the practice of the taxing masters, where the same solicitor is concerned for both the plaintiff and defendant, to allow copies to be taken by either party of documents brought into chambers by the other side: a change of this nature having been allowed by one of the taxing masters in this case.

The Master of the Rolls had referred to the taxing masters (other than one appealed from) on the above questions, and they had reported to his Lordship in effect that, although the costs of receivers' accounts so seldom came into their office that it could not be said that there was any express practice relating thereto, still they could not discover any reason for excepting such accounts from the general rule, that a solicitor concerned for two or more parties is not allowed to charge for supplying himself with copies of documents prepared by himself, and that, therefore, a charge for a copy of the receiver's account for the plaintiff, the same solicitor being concerned for the receiver, ought not to be allowed; and that it was not the practice in taxing the costs of a suit, where the same solicitor was concerned for plaintiff and defendant, to allow copies to be taken by either party of documents brought into chambers by the other side, a rule to which no exception could be pointed out.

Jessell, Q.C., and Smart, now contended that though the rule where the same solicitor appears for plaintiff and defendant was as above stated, this practice had not been followed in the case of a receiver; and that as the plaintiff might change his solicitor, it was important that he should have a separate copy of the receiver's accounts.

Swanston, who opposed, was not called on.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The question is whether a solicitor may be paid for making copies of any documents which were not required for the service of his clients? A solicitor might, if the question were answered in the affirmative, be paid for making copies of documents in his possession, which copies he did not mean to use, and which, in fact, would in all probability never be made. Only one copy of the receiver's account would be allowed: the charge which had been allowed in taking the sixth account to be deducted in taking the next account. The costs of this application to be costs in the cause.

*Winding-up order—Creditor of company—Production of documents—*15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 18—Order.

COMPANY.—A creditor must produce documents relating to his claim against a company being wound up by the Court, or his claim will be peremptorily disallowed.

This was a question arising in a winding up of the above company, in the course of being carried out in chambers.

Bevir, on behalf of the company, asked that certain creditors who had made claims against the company in chambers might produce the documents under which they claimed.

Locock Webb, for the claimants, objected to produce the documents.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—No person can come in to prove a debt against a company which is being wound up under the order of the Court, without producing all documents which he would have to produce under the 18th section of the Chancery Amendment Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. The creditors who object to produce the documents asked for must produce the same, or they will not be allowed to proceed in establishing their respective claims.

*Will—Construction—“My shares in the Great Western Railway”—*Misdescription—Subsequently acquired personalty.

WILL.—A testatrix in her will, dated 1856, made a bequest to the plaintiff, F. S. Trinder, in the following words:—“I bequeath to F. S. Trinder my shares in the Great Western Railway.” At the time of making her will she had no shares properly so called in the Great Western or in any other railway. She had, however, purchased, in 1846, some shares in the Wilts Somerset and Weymouth Railway, which, by an Act of Parliament, had been converted, in 1851, into “Wilts and Somerset Railway Stock of the Great Western Railway Company;” and she had purchased, in 1846, a sum of stock in the Great Western Railway. Between the times of making her will and a codicil, which did not refer to the bequest to the plaintiff, she purchased some other sums of stock in the Great Western Railway, and after making the said codicil she purchased another sum of like stock.

Held, that all the stock in the Great Western Railway, including the stock which had formerly been shares in the other railway, of which the testatrix was possessed at the time of her death, passed to the plaintiff under the bequest in the will.

This was a motion for decree.

Hester Ann Hulbert, widow, deceased, in her will, dated 10th April, 1857, made the following bequest to F. S. Trinder, the plaintiff in this suit:— "I bequeath as follows to F. S. Trinder the sum of 300*l.*, secured upon the bond of the trustees of the Melksham Paving Act, and the securities for the same, also my shares in the Great Western Railway."

At the time of making her will the testatrix had no shares properly so called in the Great Western or any other railway company. She had in January, 1846, purchased five 50*l.* shares in the Wilts Somerset and Weymouth Railway Company, which, in the year 1851, were, under the provisions of "the Great Western Railway Act, 1851," whereby the undertaking of the Wilts Somerset and Weymouth Railway became vested in the Great Western Railway Company, converted into 250*l.* "Wilts and Somerset Railway Stock of the Great Western Railway Company."

She afterwards, but before the date of her will, viz., in 1855, purchased 40*l.* "preference 5*l.* per cent. stock, redeemable, of the Great Western (original) Railway Company."

These sums of stock were standing in her name in the books of the Great Western Railway Company when she made her will. After the date of her will she purchased, at divers times, several other sums of stock in the same company, and subsequently to such purchases made a codicil to her will, which codicil did not in any way mention the bequest to the plaintiff. After the date of the codicil she purchased another sum of stock in the same company. All the above-mentioned sums of stock were standing in her name in the books of the Company at the time of her death.

The question before the Court was whether any of the stock, and, if any, then what portion thereof, passed to the plaintiff under the will.

Giffard, Q.C., and Wickens, for the plaintiff, contended that he was entitled to all the Great Western Railway stock of which the testatrix died possessed. The word "shares" in the will was evidently a mere misnomer, for the testatrix must have meant something, and she had no shares whatever, properly so-called. The word "my" would not of itself make such a bequest as the present specific. They cited Goodlad v. Burnett (1 K. & J. 341); Lady Langdale v. Briggs (8 D. M. G. 391; 4 W. R. 703); and Doe d. York v. Walker (12 M. & W. 591).

Daniel, Q.C., and John Pearson, for the defendants.—The testatrix could never have intended to pass all her stock under the description of "shares." At the date of her will she was possessed of stock which had been shares, and there was no doubt that that was the stock which she intended to bequeath to the plaintiff. Otherwise not one blunder, but a continued series of blunders must be imputed to her.

Wood, V.C., said that the difficulty in this case arose from the fact that the "Wilts and Somerset Stock of the Great Western Railway Company," of which the testatrix was possessed at the time of making her will, had formerly been shares, properly so-called, in another railway company. On the whole, however, he was of opinion that the testatrix made an unintentional mistake in describing as "shares" what really were sums of stock. Nor could he, without over-refining, draw any distinction between the company's original stock, which might properly be described as stock in the company, and stock which had been converted into the company's stock, and which might, more properly, be called stock of, or belonging to, the company. He should therefore hold that the plaintiff was entitled to all the stock which, at the time of the death of the testatrix, stood in her name in the books of the Great Western Railway Company, including the Wilts and Somerset Railway Stock of the same company.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—The trustees of a settlement do not sufficiently represent the beneficiaries thereunder in a suit for the purpose of making one of those trustees liable for the misapplication of trust moneys which were the subject of another settlement of which he was also a trustee.

This suit was instituted against (among other parties) the trustees of a deed of the 24th March, 1849, and its principal object was to make those trustees liable for trust funds which had been misapplied by one of them. The plaintiff was entitled to a moiety of the trust funds; and the other moiety, which had originally belonged to one John Payne, had been made the subject of settlement by him upon his marriage. There were two trustees of that settlement, one of whom was also a trustee of the deed of March, 1849, and therefore an accounting party in this suit.

Both the trustees of John Payne's settlement were defendants to this suit, and he, too, was named as a defendant out of the jurisdiction. None of the other beneficiaries under his settlement had been made parties. This was an appeal by the accounting trustees from a decree of Vice-Chancellor Wood, and they insisted (inter alia) that some, at least, of the beneficiaries (within the jurisdiction) under John Payne's settlement ought to be before the Court.

Willcock, Q.C., and Prendergast, for the plaintiff, referred to the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 42, rule 9.

Crouch, for that trustee of John Payne's settlement who was not an accounting party.

TURNER, L.J., said that the beneficiaries under John Payne's settlement were, by virtue of the settlement, represented by two trustees; but now, one of those trustees being a party accountable in this suit, they were, in fact, represented by only one trustee. He thought this was a case in which the Court ought to exercise the discretion given to it by section 42, rule 9, and to require one of the beneficiaries to be made a party to the suit.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., concurred.

It was then arranged that the appeal should stand over in order to amend the bill by making John Payne's wife, one of the beneficiaries under his settlement, a party to the suit.

Practice—Vacating enrolment of decree—Mistake.

PRACTICE.—Where a decree, carried into the registrar's office on behalf of the plaintiff, had been, by mistake, delivered out to the defendant's solicitors, and enrolled by them, the enrolment was ordered to be vacated.

This was a motion on the part of the plaintiff to vacate an enrolment of the decree which had been made by the defendant.

The decree was pronounced by the Master of the Rolls, on the 16th of January last, and it simply dismissed the plaintiff's bill with costs. Minutes of the decree were settled by the registrar on the 6th March, and it was passed on the 9th March, and sent for entry on the 10th March. It was taken for entry by a clerk of the defendant's solicitors at the request of a clerk of the plaintiff's solicitor, and on behalf of the plaintiff. On the 13th March it was taken away by the defendant's solicitors, and enrolled on the 16th March. On the 14th March the plaintiff's solicitor made inquiries at the registrar's office for the decree, and was told that it was mislaid, and again on the 16th, when he was told that it could not be found. On the 17th March he inquired again, and then discovered that the decree had been taken away and enrolled by the defendant's solicitors.

Jessel, Q.C., and Everitt, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendant's solicitors had acted improperly in taking away the decree, of which the plaintiff had the carriage. The decree would not have been given out from the registrar's to the defendant's solicitor's clerk unless under the supposition that he represented the plaintiff, on whose behalf he had, in fact, originally taken it there. The plaintiff ought not in this way to be deprived of his right of appeal. They referred to Hill v. South Staffordshire Railway Company (12 W. R. 699; 2 D. J. S. 230).

Beavan (Selwyn, Q.C.), with him), for the defendant.—The plaintiff has been guilty of negligence in not entering a caveat against enrolment. The decree was made as long ago as the 16th January, and was really the defendant's decree, though the plaintiff had the carriage of it. In the absence of mala fides, the Court would not deprive a party of the advantage he had obtained by means of the practice of the Court. The defendant might have taken an office copy of the decree and enrolled it at any moment. He cited Williams v. Page (5 W. R. 854; 1 De G. & J. 561); Wildman v. Lade (4 De G. & J. 401).

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., said that, without any imputation upon the defendant or his solicitors, it was clear that a mistake had been made in the registrar's office.

TURNER, L.J., said that it was the duty of the entering clerk to deliver out the decree to the party from whom he received it. There was no ground for imputing mala fides here, but the decree was wrongly delivered. The motion must therefore be allowed, but there would be no costs.

WATERS v. THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

Account—Landowner and steward—Fiduciary relationship.

FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—Where A., a landowner, entered into a contract with a land drainage company for an advance of money and the execution of certain drainage works, the money to be charged on the inheritance of the lands, and by an indenture of the same date made between A., the company, and B. (the steward and land agent of A.), it was covenanted that B. should execute the works as the contractor of the company and that A. should pay the expenses of the same, advancing money from time to time for the purpose,

Held, that there was nothing in the relationship between the parties to prevent the steward from entering into a remunerative contract with his employer, provided that no advantage was taken of his fiduciary position; and that the covenant by the landowner to pay expenses was not evidence of a contract that the steward was to act only as his agent, such as to destroy his position as contractor for the company.

Therefore, in an account of the dealings between the parties the steward was held entitled to be credited with the balance between the sum for which he had covenanted to do the works and their actual cost.

This was a suit instituted by Robert S. Waters, the late steward and land agent of the Earl of Shaftesbury, praying that a general account might be taken of his dealings with the defendant whilst in his employment, and praying a special declaration of his being entitled to remuneration as a contractor with the General Land Drainage and Improvement Company, in respect of certain drainage works done by the company on the defendant's estates.

By an indenture dated the 11th May, 1857, made between the General Land Drainage and Improvement Company of the one part, and the defendant of the other part, the company agreed, with the sanction of the Inclosure Commissioners, to execute certain drainage works for the defendant for the sum of 15,600*l.* This amount was to be advanced by the company and charged upon the inheritance of the lands in the said indenture mentioned, by way of an annual rent-charge, for thirty years, at the rate of six per cent. per annum. By another indenture of the same date, made between the defendant, the company, and the plaintiff (after reciting the first indenture, and that application had been made to the Inclosure Commissioners to sanction the said provisional contract, and that the Earl was desirous that the company should employ the plaintiff as their surveyor and agent for the execution of the said works, and that the company were willing to employ him, and that the plaintiff was willing to act as such surveyor and agent), it was covenanted by the several parties thereto, each one with the others, respectively, that—and observes these articles on his part, be the agent and surveyor of the company, for the purposes of the improvements.

“1. The said Robert Short Waters shall, so long as he duly performs

" 2. If the Inclosure Commissioners sanction the provisional contract either wholly or partially, and either with or without modification, the said R. S. Waters, his executors or administrators, will, before the first day of March, 1860, execute the proposed improvements, but with such modifications (if any) as the Inclosure Commissioners shall require and sanction, and will execute the same as aforesaid in a scientific, skilful, and substantial manner, and with good and efficient workmanship, labour, and materials, and according to the specifications, plans, and sections referred to in the provisional contract, and to the satisfaction of the commissioners of the company.

" 3. The said R. S. Waters, his executors or administrators, will execute, as aforesaid, the improvements specified in the second schedule to the said recited indenture for the sum of 13,270*l.* 3*s.*, and will execute, as aforesaid, the improvements specified in the third schedule to the said indenture for the sum of 1,516*l.* 12*s.*, and the company will pay to him or them those sums forthwith after the execution, as aforesaid, of the improvements.

" 4. The said earl, his executors, administrators, or assigns, will pay to the said R. S. Waters, his executors or administrators, all the expenses which he or they shall incur in or about the execution, as aforesaid, of the improvements, or otherwise, under these presents, and,

" 6. On the improvements being executed, as aforesaid, the accounts between the company and the said earl, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and between the company and the said R. S. Waters, his executors, administrators or assigns, respectively, shall be stated and settled and credit shall, in the accounts between the company and the said R. S. Waters, his executors or administrators, be given to the company for the payment by them to the said R. S. Waters, his executors or administrators, at the time of the completion of the sums of 13,270*l.* 3*s.*, and 1,516*l.* 12*s.*," subject to certain deductions, should the modifications before referred to be adopted.

By two indentures of the 30th June, 1862, a similar contract was entered into between the parties, in respect of some further works to be done on the defendant's estates, whereby the company agreed to execute other drainage works for the sum of 11,277*l.*, to be advanced and secured and the works to be executed by the same parties and in the same manner as agreed in the former contract.

The plaintiff's case upon the contracts was, that when he left the service of the defendant in 1863, he had executed the whole of the works under the contract of the 11th May, 1857, and that the company had paid to the defendant the sum of 14,786*l.* 15*s.* under that contract; and that he had executed the works under the second contract, for which the defendant had received from the company the sum of 6,221*l.* 18*s.* These sums, together amounting to 21,008*l.* 13*s.*, had been received by the defendant, but he had advanced only 17,181*l.* 1*s.* to the plaintiff, the actual cost of the drainage works executed. The plaintiff now claimed to be entitled to the balance between those two sums, 3,827*l.* 12*s.*, as payable to him by virtue of his office of contractor. A considerable portion however of this sum the plaintiff stated to be still due for labour, and he admitted that the sums of 77*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* and 225*l.* 14*s.* had been rightly disallowed. The plaintiff, it appeared, received a fixed salary of 430*l.* per annum from the defendant, and had, when superintending other drainage works for the defendant, in fulfilment of a contract with the Inclosure Commissioners under the Public Money Drainage Act, received remuneration at the rate of five shillings per acre. To this remuneration the Earl and the Inclosure Commissioners had given their sanction.

In the general and private accounts between the plaintiff and defendant it appeared that the total claim of the plaintiff was 1,800*l.*, in addition to the 3,800*l.* claimed on the drainage contracts. On the other hand, the defendant repudiated one head of account, called the "Private and Domestic Account," upon which the balance in plaintiff's favour was asserted to be 4,499l. 7s. 7d., the effect of such repudiation being to make a balance in the defendant's favour.

The defendant contended that the salary above mentioned entitled him to the whole of the plaintiff's time and labour; that he was the true contractor for the works and the plaintiff was his agent; that the arrangement, if for the plaintiff's benefit, was void in consequence of the confidential relation in which he stood to the defendant; and that to hold it good would be a fraud on the remainderman, as charging the inheritance with an unnecessarily large sum for the improvements.

Malins, Q.C., and C. H. Roupell, for the plaintiff.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., Bacon, Q.C., Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Snape, for the defendant.

STUART, V.C.—There is no question about the right of the plaintiff to a general account, and there is no question as to the relation in which the plaintiff stood to Lord Shaftesbury, except as to the extent of the right of his Lordship to the services of the plaintiff. The whole argument in behalf of the defendant had rested, first, on the fiduciary relation which has subsisted between the plaintiff and the defendant; secondly, upon the clauses in the deed which provide that Lord Shaftesbury is to pay all the plaintiff's "expenses" in regard to the contract for executing the drainage works; thirdly, on the fact that all the money for the purpose of executing the works required during their execution was supplied by the defendant; and, finally, it was argued (although I could not exactly comprehend the grounds of the argument) that if the demands of the plaintiff in regard to the sums for which he sought credit were complied with, some fraud would be committed upon the "remainderman." If that argument is worth anything it would be a fraud upon the defendant too.

Now, under those four heads I think all the argument addressed at such length, and with such eloquence on behalf of the defendant, has rested. On the first point, the main stress of the defendant's argument was that the fiduciary character in which the plaintiff stood to the defendant entitled the latter to the whole of the plaintiff's time and services of every kind, and in every work and operation in which the defendant might be engaged in regard to his estate. The fallacy of that view appears at once on looking to the unquestioned facts. But first let us see how this point is put forward in the pleadings. The argumentative passage in the answer is remarkable, and I propose to read it. It is this, "I submit to the judgment of the Court whether the plaintiff, being in a fiduciary position towards me as such agent, receiver, and manager as aforesaid, and at a fixed salary, was or not, or is or not, prohibited by the rules of this honourable Court as legally incapable of making any profit to himself in any matter coming within the scope of such appointment." Now, what are the "rules of this Court" as to persons in a fiduciary situation? In the case of a land agent it is no part of the doctrine of this court that a contract may not be made between a land agent and his employer for the benefit of the agent. In the case of Lord Selsey v. Rhoades (2 Sim. & St. 41), which went to the House of Lords, the doctrine of the Court was very clearly laid down. That was the case of a land agent of Lord Selsey in the management of settled estates taking a lease for his own benefit under circumstances which, upon the representation of the plaintiff, entitled him to file a bill in this court to set the lease aside. The marginal note of the case states clearly enough the circumstances: "A bill to set aside the lease of a farm granted to the steward by the employer, dismissed with costs, although the lease was for a term longer than was usual on the estates, and was granted at the solicitation of the steward on an agreement made before the subsisting lease had expired, and at a rent lower than had been offered to the steward on behalf of the occupying tenant." Now those are strong circumstances in favour of setting aside a lease, and the question in that case was whether the fiduciary character in which the land agent stood to his employer did not vitiate a contract of that kind. Sir John Leach there states, in the terms recognised by the House of Lords, the doctrine of the Court upon the subject. He says, "These doctrines may be considered as comprised in the general maxim that a steward dealing with his employer shall derive no benefit from his situation as steward. The employer may, if he pleases, treat with his steward preferably to any other person, and this preference is a bounty. But the steward cannot take advantage of his preference unless he fully imparts to his employer all the circumstances of existing competition."

It is therefore clear that, according to the doctrine of this Court, a steward and land agent may contract with an employer to execute any work for the employer, and on estimates prepared by himself; provided there be such an interposition and enough done to show that no advantage was taken of the employer from the confidence which he naturally reposed in his agent. I know nothing to have prevented Lord Shaftesbury, if he wished, from executing any work of improvement on his estate with his own money, although he had estimates prepared and the assistance of his steward to execute those works. It would be indeed necessary to show that the steward took no advantage of his position in preparing the estimates, and that there was no fraud.

This is a case in which, looking at the nature of the instrument, there was every possible precaution to prevent any fraud upon any of the parties, either the remainderman or Lord Shaftesbury himself as tenant for life. The works were executed under two instruments, which the defendant's counsel has very properly said must be considered as one. The first instrument was a contract to which the plaintiff was no party. It was a contract between the defendant and the Lands Improvement Company, by which, by certain covenants between them, the company undertake to execute the work for a certain sum. Now it is perfectly true that the estimates were prepared by Lord Shaftesbury's land agent, and it is perfectly true that they were not blindly adopted by the company; for there is the intervention in these transactions, not only of the adviser and agent of the Improvement Company, but, what is of still great importance, of those commissioners appointed by Government, with Parliamentary powers and Parliamentary duties, who are to settle what is proper to be charged upon the land. The first suggestion is that the company shall execute the work; then the contract proceeds upon the fact of its being convenient that Lord Shaftesbury's land agent should act as surveyor and agent of the company; the next suggestion, that Lord Shaftesbury's land agent shall be the person to contract to do the work, is acted on also. That is clearly provided for by the second deed; and all the arguments on the part of the defendant have been to get out of the actual effect and operation and construction of that deed. According to the covenant of that deed, the plaintiff was bound to execute the work, and the company was bound to pay him. That is beyond a doubt. But then it is said that is not the whole of the deed. There is a clause in the deed by which Lord Shaftesbury had covenanted to pay all the expenses of the contractor. I asked during the argument, and I got no answer to the question, "If a contractor, upon the simple relation of contractor and employer, contracts to do works for a certain sum, and binds himself by deed to execute those works, does he become less entitled to any profit from the works because the employer agrees to indemnify him against loss?" It is impossible to contend that a contract of that kind would not be perfectly valid. But then it is said, in fact, it is a mere nominal obligation as contractor, for that, in fact, Lord Shaftesbury supplied all the money to do the works. Had the employer, by arrangement with the contractor, and without any specific contract upon that subject, supplied from time to time all the money necessary to execute the work, it is perfectly plain that that would not invalidate the contract nor destroy the relation of employer and contractor. And the question is here in fact this: Whether, where the plaintiff bound himself by the solemn obligation of the deed to this land company to execute the works for a certain price, Lord Shaftesbury is not to pay the price because it is part of the contract that he should indemnify the contractor against the expenses, and because he supplied him with the money for the execution of the works.

But then it is said that Lord Shaftesbury, through his agent, executed the work, and that any profits arising from the contracts ought to accrue to the benefit of the remaindermen, and consequently to Lord Shaftesbury himself in his lifetime. The absurdity of that is apparent from this: that if the Act of Parliament is positive in anything, it is that the adjudication of the commissioners shall be final as to what is to be done to the inheritance, and the adjudication being final, the survey is made. There is no charge of fraud against the commissioners, no charge that they have been defrauded, no charge of fraud against anybody, but all having been done under a careful inspection, the works are completed, the question is whether the contract is not to have its legitimate operation? It seems to me that it must.

The evidence shows that, so far from all the burthen of the contracts producing an obligation or a contract incurred by the land agent with a view to execute the works for the benefit of the inheritance, there were other works executed under a Government contract. Works to the amount of 4,700*l.* were executed after these works were completed. As to these the plaintiff had only acted as a sort of master of the works. He superintended, and he had performed certain extra duties for which he required extra remuneration. He made a charge and demand for those extra labours. How is that dealt with? The commissioners declined to sanction it till the landowner was communicated with. This was done, and the landowner had expressed his satisfaction with the charge, and it was paid. Now, how does that accord with the notion that every moment of the time and all the labour and skill of the plaintiff was at the command of Lord Shaftesbury for everything connected with the estate. Why the attempt to get rid of the effect of this is to say that this was mere bounty of Lord Shaftesbury—a mere gift. Gift and bounty are voluntary things. If a man makes a charge, and he is paid that sum, “gift or bounty” are the last terms to use. It is perfectly plain upon the whole transaction that what was charged for, in reference to this contract and the execution of the works and the deeds by the plaintiff, was of an extraordinary kind, requiring extraordinary skill, exposing the plaintiff to risk in case the landowner should become incapable of performing his obligation, and deprive him of the expenses and supplies for which he had nothing to rely on but the covenant of the landlord.

That is my view of the case, and that confidential relation that exists is not such as to entitle the landowner, on a case of this kind, to say that the plaintiff is not entitled to credit for the sum claimed in taking this account.

Decree, therefore, first, a general account of all dealings between the plaintiff and the defendant; and declare that in taking the said account, so far as regards the works done and executed under the contracts respectively in the pleadings mentioned, the plaintiff is to be credited with 14,709*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* and 5,996*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, paid by the said Land Drainage and Improvement Company to the defendant as in the pleadings mentioned; and is to be debited with all sums of money paid and all materials received or taken by, or supplied to him by, or at the expense of the defendant, and also with the interest charged against and paid by the defendant in respect of monies raised and advanced by him, or on his credit, in the execution of the works.

LAWTON v. FORD.

Unsatisfied terms—Interest unpaid—Statute of Limitations—Family arrangement.

LIMITATIONS (STATUTES OF).—Where, in a re-settlement of a family estate in 1829, and in a subsequent family arrangement of 1851, two previously created terms for 1,000 and 500 years were treated and acknowledged as subsisting, but between the two dates no interest had been paid upon them:—Held, that the Statute of Limitations did not operate, and the sums secured by them were ordered to be raised.

In September, 1801, the manor of Lawton and other hereditaments, comprised in a term of 1,000 years, were conveyed to Thomas Parker and his executors for the residue of the said term to secure the payment of 4,000*l.* and interest. At the same date the same manor and the hereditaments comprised in a term of 500 years were conveyed to one Henshall and his executors, for the residue of the said term, to secure a further sum of 4,000*l.* By an indenture dated the 17th March, 1829, after reciting inter alia that the said two sums of 4,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* had not been paid, and that the same were subsisting charges on the estates, the Lawton estates were resettled, and in March, 1831, C. B. Lawton became entitled to an estate for life under the settlement, and to a beneficial interest in one of the sums secured. He died in 1860, and was succeeded by John Lawton as tenant for life, with remainder to his son William Percy Lawton as tenant in tail, who is at present in possession. In January, 1851, a family arrangement was entered into to which C. B. Lawton was a party, and which contained recitals acknowledging that interest had not been paid on the mortgage charges for many years, and a statement by C. B. Lawton, the then tenant for life, that he acknowledged them as subsisting charges.

In March and April, 1851, the residue of the terms for securing the two sums of 4,000*l.* were assigned to the defendant Ford and another, in trust for parties beneficially interested. Interest was then paid by C. B. Lawton from 1st January to 31st December, 1851. No interest had subsequently been paid, owing to questions arising as to the rights of the parties beneficially interested. The plaintiff now asked that the two sums of 4,000*l.* might be raised and paid, and the rights of the parties declared.

Kenyon, Q.C., and J. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.

Malins, Q.C., W. M. James, Q.C., Greene, Q.C., Craig, Q.C., T. C. Renshaw, O. Morgan, Cracknell, Lewin, Dickenson, Herbert Smith, and W. Barber, for defendants.

Bacon, Q.C., and Watson, for the infant tenant in tail, contended that, as no interest had been paid from 1829 to 1851, the Statute of Limitations had barred the claim. The family arrangement in 1851 could not revive the terms or the right to have these sums of money raised.

STUART, V.C.—This argument has only been maintained by counsel shutting their eyes to the fact that this is a case of subsisting unsatisfied terms. The recitals in the deed of 1829, taken with those of the deed of 1851, are conclusive on the subject. This was a deed by which a re-settlement was made by the then owner of the inheritance, who by it limited his estate to an estate for life. The deed of compromise of 1851, to which the settlor of the deed of 1829 was a party, recognises these terms, and the validity of that family arrangement consists in the validity of these terms. No doubt there are great anomalies in the now settled law as to limitations of terms in family settlements, but Lord Eldon, in Codrington v. Lord Foley (6 Ves. 364), has so expounded the law with reference to decisions of Lord Macclesfield, Lord Hardwicke, and Lord Thurlow, that I am surprised to have heard the argument which has been delivered. It is only necessary to refer to the treatise of Sir Charles Chambers on leases and terms for years to show that the law in respect to terms of years created in family settlements is perfectly settled. The statute can, on no possible construction, have any effect, and the case of the infant is untenable. In Hayter v. Rod (1 P. Wms.) nothing is to be presumed in favour of the inheritance. These terms have been dealt with as subsisting charges throughout, and the sums secured by them must now be raised.

Will—Construction—Gift over—“Unmarried and without issue.”

WILL.—A testator gave a legacy to his remaining children in the event of his eldest son, the tenant for life, who was a bachelor at the date of the will, dying “unmarried and without issue.” The eldest son died a widower, and had never had a child:—Held, that the gift over took effect. “And” will not be read “or,” except in a case of necessity.

Petition for payment of fund out of Court.

The testator, by his will, gave a certain legacy of 20,000*l.* to his son Charles, who, at the time of the will, was a bachelor, for life, and after his death to any widow he might leave, for life, with remainder to his children as he should appoint, with remainder to his children equally, with a proviso that in case Charles should die unmarried and without issue, the legacy should go over to Samuel, Susannah, and Maria (who were the testator's remaining children), or such of them as should be living at the testator's death. Charles died a widower, but he had never had a child. Samuel, Susannah, and Maria survived the testator.

W. M. James, Q.C., and Prendergast, for the petitioners, contended that the gift over took effect. Here dying “unmarried” must mean dying wifeless, otherwise the words “and without issue” are meaningless, unless “and” is read “or,” which ought not to be done in this case: Seccombe v. Edwards (8 W. R. 595; 28 Beav. 440), Mitchell v. Colls (8 W. R. 208; Johns. 674), Sturgess v. Pearson (4 Madd. 412).

George Miller, for respondents in the same interest, cited Day v. Day (2 W. R. 700; Kay. 703).

Amphlett, Q.C., and Langworthy, for the two executors, and the husband of Susannah, who survived her, adopted a similar contention, citing Grey v. Pearson (5 W. R. 454; 6 H. L. Cas. 61), Brownsword v. Edwards (2 Ves. Sen. 249), Maberley v. Strobe (3 Ves. 450), Fairfield v. Morgan (2 B. & P. N. R. 38), Wagstaff v. Crosby (2 Coll. 746), Cormach v. Copous (17 Beav. 397).

Archibald Smith, for the husband of the residuary legatee, contended that the legacy of 20,000*l.* fell into the residue, and that Sturgess v. Pearson did not apply to the present case. He cited Heywood v. Heywood (9 W. R. 62; 29 Beav. 9) contending that "unmarried" must mean without ever having been married.

Rolt, Q.C., Cotton, and Hemming, for respondents interested in the residue, adopted the last construction of the word "unmarried," alleging that the words "and without issue" became mere surplusage. This is a mere contingent gift. The gift imports an indefinite failure of issue, and is therefore void: Feakes v. Standley (24 Beav. 485). Harrison v. Foreman (5 Ves. 207) does not apply.

Giffard, Q.C., Speed, Barber, and Bardswell, for other respondents interested in the residue: Willis v. Pluskett (4 Beav. 208).

Druce, for the trustee who had paid the fund into court.

W. M. James, Q.C., in reply.—Where you have a gift, any words to defeat it must be construed strictly, whether the gift be contingent or not.

Wood, V.C., said that the construction was clear, both as to authority and intention. There was no question of remoteness. The question is, was Charles, at his death, unmarried and without issue. There were two alternative constructions. Grey v. Pearson is undoubtedly a different case. There has been a disinclination on the part of the judges to change the proper grammatical signification of words in order to prevent other words from being reduced to silence; but although "unmarried" primarily signifies "without having been married," the clear intention of the testator, was to mean, not having a person to provide for as he had done before by the previous gifts. His Honour then referred to the case of Doe v. Rawding (2 B. & Ald. 441), and said that the Court would not change "and" into "or" without necessity, but that if you construe a flexible word like "unmarried" to signify a widower, you give effect to the sentence. The case of Wagstaff v. Crosby proceeded on a sound doctrine. He must declare that the gifts over took effect.

Re THE BURIAL GROUND OF ST. PANCRAS, MIDDLESEX; THE MIDLAND RAILWAY (EXTENSION TO LONDON) ACT, 1863; AND THE MIDLAND RAILWAY (ST. PANCRAS BRANCH) ACT. 1864.

Purchase by a railway company—Payment into court—Petition for investment and receipt of dividends—Lands Clauses Act, section 79.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—The mere fact of the receipt of rents and profits by the trustees of a burial ground, who were appointed for the management thereof solely as a burial ground, and for the receipt and application of the burial fees, at the time when a portion of the burial ground is taken by a railway company (the ground being at that time closed for ever as a burial ground, and the rents and profits then being received springing from the use of the ground for other purposes), is not such a possession as brings the application of the trustees for the investment of the purchase-money, paid into court by the company, and for the payment of the dividends to them, within the 79th section of the Lands Clauses Act.

Upon such an application being preferred, a simple direction for investment and accumulation was made; and the petition was directed to stand over for the appearance of such other parties, and the institution of such other proceedings as might be necessary for a final determination of the way in which the Court should deal with the fund.

This was a petition presented by the clerks to the trustees appointed and now acting under and by virtue of the Acts, 56 Geo. 3. c. xxxix., and 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. xxiv.; of which the former was passed for the purpose of building a new parish church and a parochial chapel in the parish of St. Pancras, Middlesex, and for other purposes relating thereto, and the latter for (amongst other things) altering and enlarging the powers of the former. The present trustees, called in the petition "the church trustees," are more than sixty in number, and by the Acts the church trustees were to sue and be sued in the name or names of their clerk or clerks for the time being.

The subject of the petition was a sum of money which had been paid into court by the Midland Railway Company, as the price of certain portions of what was called in the petition "the additional burial-ground of St. Pancras," taken by the company under their compulsory powers. The church trustees claimed to be the trustees of this additional burial-ground; and the petition prayed that the said sum of money should be invested, and the dividends paid to the petitioners or other the clerk or clerks for the time being to the church trustees.

The history of the additional burial-ground, as stated in the petition, was as follows:—

By 32 Geo. 3, c. lxvi., certain persons were appointed to be a board of trustees for the purposes of the Act, and were empowered to purchase land for the formation of an additional burial-ground for the use of the parish of St. Pancras.

By section 8 of this Act it was enacted that the land so purchased should become and be absolutely vested in the vicar and churchwardens of the said parish and their successors, for the purpose of a burial-ground for the use of the said parish for ever.

By section 10 of the same Act it was enacted that the said trustees should cause the additional burial-ground to be enclosed, and also cause a small dwelling to be erected thereon for the residence of such person or persons as the trustees might think proper to appoint for the care and protection of the said ground; and that it should be lawful for the trustees to make and build such vaults or other conveniences for the interment of the dead as they should think proper; and that, when the additional burial-ground should have been fenced in and consecrated, the same should be made use of for the interment of the dead, subject, nevertheless, to such orders and regulations respecting the management thereof as should from time to time be made by the trustees, so that such orders and regulations should not interfere with or lessen the settled fees then payable to the vicar.

By section 11 of the same Act the trustees were empowered to borrow money for the purposes of the Act, and the money so borrowed and the interest thereof were thereby charged upon, and made payable out of, the fees which should be received by the churchwardens of the parish on account of burials, and likewise charged upon, and made payable out of, the poor rates as therein mentioned.

The trustees of the said last-mentioned Act, in execution thereof, purchased an additional burial-ground adjoining the old ground. The additional burial-ground was consecrated and used for the purposes of burial. The trustees also erected a small house on the ground so purchased, as provided by the Act.

By the before-mentioned Act, 56 Geo. 3. c. xxxix., the church trustees were appointed, and powers were given to them to erect a new parish church, and also a parochial chapel, to be called "Camden Chapel," and to purchase land as sites for such new church and chapel; and it was enacted that, after the intended new church should be completed and consecrated, the then parish church should be called "the parish chapel of the parish of St. Pancras;" and that the church trustees should be empowered to raise money for the purposes of the Act, and to levy rates on the occupiers of land in the parish, and to fix the rates and fees for burial in the vaults of the new church and chapel, and to let the pews in the said new church and chapel, and to apply the pew rents for the purposes of the Act.

By the before-mentioned Act 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. xxiv., the Act 32 Geo. 3, c. lxi., was repealed, except that the said additional burial-ground was to remain vested in the vicar and churchwardens of the parish and their successors for ever for the use of the said parish. By section 3 of this Act the church trustees and their successors were appointed trustees for carrying the Act into execution; and by section 2 it was enacted that all documents and sums of money remaining in the hands of the trustees of the repealed Act, or of any other persons for the purposes of the said repealed Act, should be paid and delivered up to the church trustees, and that the church trustees should pay and discharge all sums of money due from the trustees of the repealed Act, and indemnify the trustees of the repealed Act on account of the same. By the same Act the powers of the church trustees to borrow money and make rates for the purposes of the Act, 56 Geo. 3, c. xxxix., were extended; and divers powers and authorities, by the church building Acts of 58 & 59 Geo. 3, therein mentioned, given to the churchwardens and vestries of parishes, and powers of making rates, borrowing money, and fixing and receiving pew rents, were, so far as related to the parish of St. Pancras, vested in the church trustees. By section 44 of the same Act it was enacted that it should be lawful for the church trustees to fix the rates and fees to be paid for interment in the burial grounds of the parish, and to vary the same, &c., and that all such rates and fees should be paid to the churchwardens of the parish for the time being, who should, once or oftener in every year, upon such day or days, and at such time or times as the church trustees should direct, render to the church trustees an account of all such sum or sums of money as they should from time to time receive, and they were thereby required to pay unto the church trustees or their treasurer from time to time, the moneys so received by them whenever the same should amount to or exceed 200*l.*, and the balance thereof at the time of rendering such account; and powers were given to the church trustees of apprehending and distraining on the goods of any defaulting churchwarden. By section 53 of the same Act it was enacted that the rates and fees for burials in the burial-grounds of the parish, subject to any express charges which might be made on such rates or fees under the authority of the Act, should be applied, first, in payment of the salaries, wages, or allowances of the sextons and other persons who should be employed in or about the burial-grounds (the payments in respect of each ground being made, so far as might be, out of its own receipts); secondly, in payment of the expenses of keeping the burial-grounds in good order and condition and properly drained, and the fences thereof in good and substantial repair; and thirdly, the surplus was to go and be applied in the manner and for the purposes therein directed concerning the application of the pew rents, the ultimate application thereof being in aid of the poors rate of the parish.

The petition, after stating that the new parish church and chapel were duly erected, proceeded to state that the church trustees, in pursuance of the Acts, had received the burial fees arising from the burial-ground, and had kept and continued to keep in good order the burial-ground and the house erected thereon, and had always had the control thereof, and had paid the expenses of maintaining the house and ground out of the burial fees, and had so charged the same in their annual accounts rendered to the parishioners, as provided by 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. xxiv., and had applied the residue of the moneys received in respect of the burial fees in the manner and for the purposes directed by the Acts.

The burial-ground was closed for purposes of burial about eleven years ago by Order in Council; and under the provisions of the Burials Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, a new cemetery was provided for the parish at Finchley. The church trustees, however, under the said Burial Act, continued to receive the fees for burials at Finchley, and applied the same in the same manner and for the same purposes as the burial fees previously received by them were applied. The church trustees moreover, as well before as after the discontinuance of burials in the burial-ground, retained the burial-ground under their control, and remained in possession thereof. Recently the church-trustees let the sheep pasturage of the burial-ground, and received rent for the same; and they also recently repaired the wall of the ground at a considerable expense.

In 1863 the Midland Railway Company obtained power to purchase and take, and accordingly did purchase and take, for the purposes of their undertaking, a portion of the additional burial-ground, including the house erected thereon. Before however absolutely taking the house, they agreed to rent the same from the church trustees at a rent of 30*l.* per annum; and they were in possession of the house, and paid the rent to the church trustees from Lady Day, 1863.

By the Midland Railway (St. Pancras Branch) Act, 1864, the said company were further empowered to take, for the purposes of their Act, and they accordingly took, an easement under part of the burial ground; and it was provided that the compensation to be paid by the company in respect of the burial ground should be paid into the Court of Chancery, to the account of ex parte the burial ground of St. Pancras.

The price to be paid by the company for the land, house, and easement taken by them, as fixed by proper valuations, amounted to 2,350*l.* The company paid this amount into Court, to the account of the Accountant-General, "to the credit of ex parte the Midland Railway Company, ex parte the burial ground of St. Pancras, and the church trustees, vicar, and churchwardens, and vestry of the parish of St. Pancras, and the incumbent of the new parish of Old St. Pancras."

By "the incumbent of the new parish of Old St. Pancras" in the title of the account was meant the incumbent of the church in 56 Geo. 3, c. xxxix., designated "the parish chapel of St. Pancras."

The petitioners, on behalf of the church trustees, submitted that the latter were the parties in possession and receipt of the rents and profits of the lands in respect whereof the said moneys had been paid into court, as being entitled thereto at the time of such lands being purchased or taken, and that they were lawfully entitled to such lands within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The petition prayed for the investment of the moneys in court, and the payment of the dividends to the petitioners, or other the clerk or clerks for the time being to the church trustees.

The petition was opposed by the vicar, the vicar and churchwardens, and the vestry of the parish, and by the incumbent of the parish chapel of the parish.

Osborne, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the petitioners.—The church trustees have what is required by section 79 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Certainly their title to the dividends is quite clear; though, perhaps, if any question arose as to the principal sum a scheme for its application might be necessary. The taking of the land by the company does not secularize the money paid as its price. What title then can the vestry possibly show? The land was dedicated to ecclesiastical purposes for ever, and not until all those purposes have been satisfied can the poor's rate come in. The church trustees have always received whatever profits have arisen from the land; while there were burials they received the fees; when there was sheep pasturage they received the payment for it; and they received the rent of the house when let to the company. No one can show a better title to the land than the church trustees.

E. Charles, for the vicar of St. Pancras.

Fooks and Fooks, jun., for the incumbent of the parish chapel of St. Pancras, asked that in case the prayer of the petition should be granted the Court would accompany the direction to pay the dividends to the church trustees with an order to them to put and keep the burial ground in good condition. It was now in a disgraceful state.

Giffard, Q.C., and Pemberton, for the vestry of St. Pancras, contended that mere possession was nothing, unless something else could be shown. The fee was vested in the vicar and churchwardens; the church trustees had nothing except certain managing powers so long as the ground was used for the purposes of burial.

Sargant, for the company, was not heard.

Wood, V.C., suggested that the proper course would be to order the investment of the money and the accumulation of the dividends until a definite decision could be come to on the proper way to deal with the fund.

Vaughan Hawkins.—The church trustees should not be interrupted in the pendency of the rents and profits. Besides, if accumulation should be directed, how can we stop it?

Wood, V.C., said that, though the 79th section of the Lands Clauses Act should, on the ground of public policy, be acted upon very strictly; yet he thought that the case contemplated by that section was not a case like the present, where it was clear that further proceedings, by bill or information, would be necessary before the Court could feel justified in parting with the money which had been paid in. The land on which this question arose was vested in the vicar and churchwardens in trust for the use of the parish as a burial-ground. Being used as a burial ground, the church trustees were from time to time to have the fixing of the fees; and the churchwardens, taking such fees as receivers for them, were to hand them over when they amounted or exceeded a certain sum. The petitioners therefore received all the profits that could be made out of the ground while it was a burial-ground; but when it ceased to be used for burials, their right to any profits out of it also ceased. There was nothing in the Acts authorising them to take any profit which might arise out of using the ground as a sheep pasturage, or from letting the house, which was intended as a residence for the sexton. The Court could not look upon the mere circumstance that they had, as a matter of fact, received such profit, as being a possession of the rents and profits which would entitle them to the benefits of the 79th section of the Lands Clauses Act. When the ground was closed for the purposes of burial the petitioners were arrested from deriving any profit from the only source from which they had shown themselves entitled to derive any, and they received compensation for being so arrested by the receipt of the fees at Finchley. Under these circumstances only a simple order for investment and accumulation could be made, and the petition would be directed to stand over until the last petition day in Easter Term. This would allow of any of the parties applying to the Charity Commissioners, or taking such other steps as they might be advised, towards bringing the matter into a proper shape for determination. The order would be made without prejudice to the rights of any of the parties.

Wood, V.C., March 14, 1866.

RISHTON v. GRISSEL.

14 W. R. 578.

Pleading—Answer—Exception—Correspondence.

PRACTICE.—Where the bill alleges that the defendant, in the course of a correspondence between himself and others, made certain representations respecting the subject-matter of the suit, and one of the interrogatories requires him to set forth a list of the correspondence, an answer which merely states that the correspondence contained no such representation, is insufficient.

This was a suit for an account of profits. The plaintiff had been clerk to the defendant, his salary being a percentage of the profits. Defendant had sold his business to a company, and one of the interrogatories asked whether the defendant did not, in the course of the negotiation, represent that his profits averaged from 7,000*l.* to 20,000*l.* a year, or what representation he did make on the subject, and whether verbally or in writing, and to whom, and it required him to set forth a list of all correspondence relating to the said negotiation. The defendant did not, in the answer, specify the persons to whom he made the representations, further than by stating that they were the persons to whom he sold his business, without giving the names; and the answer contained no list of correspondence, but merely a general statement that there were no letters making any mention of the profits. The plaintiff excepted to this part of the answer, and the exceptions had been allowed; and on the second answer coming in the plaintiff excepted again, and the defendants submitted, and made the usual tender of twenty shillings costs.

The third answer being considered unsatisfactory the plaintiff set down the exceptions again.

Hemming, for the plaintiff, argued that the third answer was also insufficient.

Pearson, for the defendant.—The objection that the names of the persons had not been given was not taken on the former argument on the exceptions. The defendant having submitted to the second set of exceptions, ought not to have been brought into Court again.

Hemming, in reply.—There was, at any rate, a suppression, if there was no mis-statement in the answer. We did not wish to bring defendant into court, but we had no choice: Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company v. Workop Board of Health (2 K. & J. 25; 4. W. R. 5).

Wood, V.C., said that everything had been answered by the third answer, except as to the negotiations. The strict rule was that the words of an interrogatory must be answered either by admission or traverse. Here there was neither. There might have been correspondence not actually mentioning the profits, but having considerable bearing on the question. The right mode would have been to admit certain letters referring to them, but to say that such and such letters did not relate to profits: the plaintiff has a right to know all the letters that the defendant has got. The defendant must put in a further answer, giving a list of all correspondence, and stating where he claims protection.

As to the other point, it was doubtful whether the plaintiff could withdraw after the exceptions to the second answer. The exceptions must be allowed with costs.

FERRIER v. ATTWOOL.

14 W. R. 582: affirmed, [1866] E. R. A. 2856; 14 W. R. 597; 14 L. T. 278;

Exceptions to answer—Right to account and production.

DISCOVERY.—Where a strong prima facie case is shown by the bill, defendant cannot be excused from giving discovery on the ground that such discovery only tends to establish his own case.

Exceptions to answer and summons to produce.

This was a partnership suit. The defendant by his answer raised the issue of partnership or no partnership, alleging that the plaintiff was merely his clerk in his business of a cooper, at Liverpool, and that certain payments made by him to plaintiff were made as loans, and not as part of the partnership profits. The plaintiff and defendant had formerly been partners in the business of coopers. The plaintiff's claim to be a partner rested principally on the construction of an agreement set out in the bill.

The first exception was in respect of defendant's answer to an allegation of what passed at a meeting between plaintiff and him and a third party named Reynolds some years since, at which it was alleged that Reynolds agreed to become surety for the firm on the joint assurance of plaintiff and defendant. The answer stated defendant's "belief" as to the circumstances of the interview, and denied that defendant gave the assurance, and denied to the best of defendant's belief that plaintiff gave the assurance, but did not in so many words deny that they gave a "joint assurance."

The second exception was that defendant had not sufficiently answered an interrogatory, asking whether re-coopering and repairing was a branch of the business.

The third exception was to the answer to an interrogatory whether the cash-book of the business was not in the possession of the defendant. The answer referred the plaintiff to the books and papers in the schedule to the answer.

The fourth exception was that the defendant had not, in answer to an interrogatory, set out an account of all moneys received in the business. The answer had submitted that he was not bound to do so.

The 5th, 6th, and 7th exceptions were that defendant had not sufficiently answered whether the amount of certain moneys payable by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board had been ascertained, and what was the amount received, and that he had not scheduled an account of such moneys.

The affidavit of documents claimed privilege for certain documents, on the ground that they tended exclusively to support the defendant's claim, and not that of the plaintiff.

Rolt, Q.C., and J. L. Bird, for the plaintiff, contended that the answer admitted a partnership, and that therefore they were entitled to the discovery asked, which was most material. It was important for them to have the partnership assets in court. The books and papers scheduled relate to the matters in question. The denial as to documents was only as "to the best of the defendant's belief." There is no mention in the schedule of the cash-book we ask for. They cited Delarue v. Dickinson (3 K. & J. 388).

Willcocks, Q.C., and Benjamin Hardy, for the defendant.—The question is whether the discovery now asked is material to the plaintiff's case. The question whether plaintiff is entitled to an account must be decided not now, but at the hearing. As to the money received from the Mersey Docks Company, we have only omitted to state the amount. That will simply be an item of account, if any is decreed. As to the schedule of documents, we have set out a list of them, and plaintiff can judge for himself if they are material. As to the "joint assurance" to Reynolds, if defendant denies that either he or plaintiff gave the assurance, that is equivalent to denying the joint assurance. It is absurd to ask us to swear positively as to what plaintiff said at the interview. On the point of non-discovery they cited: Adams v. Fisher (3 My. & Cr. 527); Turney v. Bayley (12 W. R. 633). The matters inquired after by the first and second exceptions are very trivial. The cash-book inquired after must be one of those enumerated in the schedule: Mansell v. Feeney (9 W. R. 610, 2 J. & H. 320); Swabey v. Sutton (12 W. R. 124, 1 H. & M. 514); Lett v. Parry (1 H. & M. 517); Perry v. Turpin (2 W. R. 387; Kay. App. 49). The summons to produce was taken out before the exceptions were filed. This assumed the sufficiency of the answer.

Bird, in reply, on the first exception, urged that defendant's denial as to his belief was not enough, as he was present at the interview.

WOOD, V.C., said that the general rule that you must answer fully if you answer at all was illustrated by the present case. Here it was admitted that plaintiff and defendant were partners in another business. The defendant had alleged that plaintiff was only his servant, and had therefore refused discovery. In that state of affairs the whole question of receipts became a most important one, especially as there was strong prima facie evidence of a partnership. The documents inquired after might be most material. [His Honour referred then to the case of Harris v. Harris (4 Hare, 179).] His Honour disallowed the first exception, but allowed those from the second to the seventh, both inclusive, reserving the eighth and ninth, relating to documents, for consideration in chambers. As to the first, he considered that defendant's "belief" was sufficient answer to an interview which had happened long ago, and the assurance alleged to have been then and there given. The costs of five exceptions would be allowed, but there would be none of the eighth and ninth.

MUDUN MOHUN DOSS v. GOKUL DOSS.*

Agra—Wrongful attachment—Right of action—General damages—Proof of, when not necessary.

TORT.—The proposition that a man whose possession was unlawfully invaded by a wrongful attachment ought to have given effect to that invasion, because it was made under colour of legal process, by removing the lock of his own storehouse, is untenable; and though the plaintiff might have received permission to use his own property, he was neither bound to accept the permission so accorded to him, nor, if he had accepted it, would he have lost his right of action, and he was entitled, at the very least, to a judgment for nominal damages.

The principle ordinarily applicable to actions of tort is that the plaintiff is never precluded from recovering ordinary damages by reason of his failing to prove the special damage he has laid, unless the special damage is the gist of the action.

Le Breton v. Ennis (4 Moo. P. C. 323) (as to the assessment of damages), followed.

* Present—Knight Bruce, L.J., Turner, L.J., Sir J. W. Colvile, Sir E. V. Williams, and Sir Laurence Peel.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Sudder Court of Agra, which confirmed a decree of the Civil Court of Mirzapore, dismissing the appellant's suit with costs.

The suit was brought to recover the damages alleged to have been sustained by the nominal plaintiff's employer, Dwarka Doss, in consequence of an attachment made at the instance of the respondent as the holder of a decree.

Dwarka Doss and the respondent had conflicting claims upon an indigo factory, lying between the villages of Putteetah and Sirswabur, which with three others, belonged to two persons, named Chunder Churun and Esserhund Neoghy.

At the beginning of the year 1856 the Neoghys were indebted to Mussumat Ooman Soondree, the wife of Tara Pershun Bagjee, in the sum of 17,761rs., partly for moneys advanced by her, and partly for moneys advanced by Dwarka Doss on her husband's guarantee, for the purpose of carrying on the factories; and those advances were secured by certain instruments of mortgage, dated respectively the 20th of January, 1852; the 18th of April, 1853; and the 1st of January, 1856. These securities embraced the block of all the factories and their crops for the year 1856—57.

On the 1st of January, 1856, Mussumat Ooman Soondree, by an instrument called a deed of re-mortgage, assigned all her interest in the factories under the before-mentioned securities to Dwarka Doss, in order to secure the sum of 9,761rs., being the balance then due in respect of his former advances together with the future advances to be made by him for carrying on the factories. And it was thereby provided that he should take the factories under his control and management during the year 1263 Fusli, or 1856-57; thereby giving him the first charge or lien on the crop.

It did not very clearly appear whether, under this stipulation, he took possession of the factories; or, if he did so, how long he continued in possession. But on the 7th of July, 1859, he obtained a decree in the Civil Court of Benares against Mussumat Ooman Soondree and the Neoghys for the sum of 23,672rs. as then due to him upon his mortgage; and on the 15th of the same month he and the Neoghys filed in court a petition embodying the terms of a compromise into which they had entered. The effect of this was that Dwarka Doss was to suspend the execution which he had taken out under the decree for 23,672rs.; and was to advance further sums for manufacturing indigo from the stumps then on the ground; and was to have the disposal of all the indigo manufactured. The works were to be superintended by one Balgobind Doss Seith, whom the Neoghys had nominated as their agent for that purpose. The rights of Dwarka Doss under the execution for any balance that might remain to him after the sale of indigo were expressly reserved to him both against the factories and against all the defendants to his suits. This arrangement was carried out by placing a servant or agent of Dwarka Doss in charge of the factories.

On the day on which this instrument of compromise was filed in the Benares Court (the 15th of July, 1859), the respondent obtained a decree in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Mirzapore against the Neoghys for the sum of 764rs., alleged to be due to him upon a mortgage of the Puttetah factory, dated in Phagoon Budee, 1st Sumbut 1911 (A.D. 1855) Dwarka Doss intervened in this suit as an objector, insisting that the factory had been attached for money due to him, and that the claim was fraudulent. But the Principal Sudder Ameen held that the objection could not be tried in that suit, and was no bar to the making of the usual decree in a suit based upon a simple mortgage-bond. He accordingly passed the ordinary decree against the defendants (the Neoghys), and the mortgaged property for the sum found due.

The respondent took out execution on this decree for 878rs. 10a. On the 17th September he obtained an order for the attachment of the Putteetah factory with the appurtenances, and of eight maunds of indigo, part of a larger quantity of fifty maunds, alleged to be at the factory. On the 23rd of September the Ameen, accompanied by two servants of the respondent, who went to point out the property, proceeded to attach the factory and other property detailed in this application. He made an actual entry upon the lands and took an inventory of the property attached. He could not, however, complete the attachment of the eight maunds of indigo by actual seizure. These were part of a much larger quantity kept in a storehouse, which was under lock and key; and the servants of Dwarka Doss refused to give him access to the storehouse, or to remove this lock. In these circumstances he put his own lock also upon the door, and retired, leaving two peons in charge of the property attached.

The appellant, having heard of the application for the attachment, had, on the 22nd of September, applied to stay it. But, as the Dusserah holidays, during which the courts are closed for some weeks, began on the 24th, this application was ordered to stand over until after the vacation; and the same cause prevented any further application touching the actual attachment.

In October the Ameen, armed with a magistrate's order, and accompanied with a blacksmith, went to the storehouse for the purpose of breaking Dwarka Doss's lock, but appears to have desisted on the threat of the people in charge of the factory to quit the premises if the lock was broken, and to leave him responsible for all the indigo there. On the 5th of November, these circumstances having been brought to the notice of the Principal Sudder Ameen, he passed an order to the effect that if the defendants to the respondent's suit, or their agents, should fail to appear in court within a week, and substantiate their objection to the opening of their lock, it should be broken, and the eight maunds of indigo be forcibly attached. On the same day he required the respondent, as the decree-holder, to answer the appellant's objection of the 22nd of September within four days. On the 25th November the Ameen, having in the meantime received no order to suspend the attachment of the indigo, proceeded, under the order of the 5th of November, to remove the lock, attached eight maunds of indigo pointed out to him by a servant of the respondent, and made two inventories, one of the eight maunds of indigo attached, the other of the other property found in the storehouse which was not attached. Owing, however to some difficulty about weighing the indigo, all this property remained in the storehouse, apparently under the lock of the Ameen, or in charge of his peons, until the 8th of December, when the eight maunds were finally weighed and removed to a separate place, and the other contents of the storehouse were left at the disposal of Dwarka Doss's people. On the 12th of December the Ameen submitted to the Court a further report of his proceedings, and stated that he had, according to the respondent's request, attached no property belonging to the factory except the eight maunds of indigo. The objection filed by the appellant on the 22nd of September appears to have been thenceforward confined to these; and it was finally disposed of by an order of the 3rd of January, 1860, which, on the ground of the preferential claim of Dwarka Doss, directed the release of the eight maunds of indigo from attachment.

Some difficulty in carrying out this order was occasioned by the refusal of Dwarka Doss's agents to receive back this indigo except on terms with which the Ameen would not comply, but ultimately the eight maunds, and whatever else had been under attachment, were, by order of the Court, left at the disposal of those who were in possession and charge of the factory, and the peons were withdrawn from the premises on the 28th of February, 1860.

On the 25th of February, 1860, the suit, in which the present appeal arose, was commenced by the appellant against the respondent, by filing his plaint in the Civil Court at Mirzapore, in order to recover damages for the loss occasioned by the defendant's (the respondent's) wrongful attachment as above mentioned. The plaint after setting forth the principal facts aforesaid, relating to the rights of the appellant's principal, Dwarka Doss, as mortgagee, and relating to the attachment made at the instance of the respondent, charged personal enmity against the defendant, and collusion between him and the two Neoghyas in obtaining his decree of the 15th July, 1859, and that he had induced the Ameen to attach, amongst other things, the storehouse in which seventy maunds of indigo cakes had been placed on shelves to dry. The claim was stated in the plaint as follows:—"To recover on account of loss of seventy maunds of indigo cakes at 200rs. per maund, 14,000rs.; on account of indigo plants which were grown on 257 beegahs of land, and which would have yielded four seers of indigo per beegah, 5,545rs., after deducting the subsequent expense of manufacture; and on account of stumps of indigo plants of the second year, grown on 105 beegahs, which would have yielded two seers of indigo per beegah, 1,250rs., after deducting the said expenses. Total claim, 20,795rs., being the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff's employer in consequence of an attachment made at the instance of the decree holder, the cause of action arising on September 23rd, 1859, the date of the first attachment."

The written statement of the defendant denied (amongst other things) that there was any loss sustained by reason of the attachment, and alleged that if any loss was sustained, it was caused by the plaintiff's own act, and not through the defendant; it then proceeded to deny specifically the allegations in the plaint. The case came on for trial before the principal Sudder Ameen, and by a decree, dated 11th July, 1860, the appellant's suit was dismissed with costs. The appellant appealed from this decree to the late Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of the North-Western Provinces, when a decree was made on the 7th October, 1861, dismissing the plaintiff's appeal with costs. From this last mentioned decree the present appeal was brought.

Leith, for the appellant, contended that the decree complained of ought to be reversed, because the attachment and seizure were illegal, and had been on that ground ordered to be withdrawn by a court of competent authority; and, therefore, in the present suit, complaining of that wrong, there ought to have been a judgment entered for the plaintiff (the appellant), independently of any proof of the amount of damages thereby sustained. He cited Bayliss v. Fisher (7 Bing. 153).

Forsyth, Q.C., and Melville, for the respondent.

Sir J. W. COLVILLE now delivered judgment: (having first carefully stated the facts as above, his Lordship continued):—Upon this statement of admitted facts it appears clear to their Lordships that Dwarka Doss had, by reason of the attachment of the 23rd of September and subsequent proceedings, sustained an injury, for which he was entitled to claim substantial damages. The attachment was wrongful and irregular. The right of the respondent, under his decree, was to sell the factory pledged to him, subject to the rights of Dwarka Doss under his prior mortgage. He had no right to invade or disturb the possession of the prior mortgagee by placing peons upon the property, in order to attach the factory as a step towards the judicial sale. Under the procedure, as it existed before 1859, this could not have been done; the attachment must have been constructive. But under the new Code of Procedure, which had come into force on the 1st of July, 1859, the proper course was to issue and publish a written notice under the 235th and 239th sections of Act VIII. of 1859. For the actual seizure of the eight maunds of indigo, to which the execution was ultimately reduced, there was even less justification. The manufactured indigo was not included in the respondent's mortgage. And that it was not part of the general property in the possession of the Neoghyas, that Dwarka Doss had or claimed a lien upon it, the respondent had had ample notice in his own suit, wherein Dwarka Doss had intervened as objector, and by the proceedings of the 12th of May, 1859, touching a distress for rent which has been put in evidence in the cause. And the manner in which this wrongful attachment was carried out, the placing by the Ameen of his lock upon the door, subjected Dwarka Doss to the additional wrong of having the contents of the godown, to which ultra the eight maunds of indigo the respondent made no claim, taken out of his control and dominion from the 23rd of September until the 8th of December. It is idle to say that his people ought in the first instance to have given the Ameen access to the godown, and delivered the eight maunds of indigo, or that they ought to have acted according to the directions of the Ameen, concerning the use of the two locks, supposing those directions to have been given to the peons. The case cited by Mr. Leith from Bingham's Reports (Bayliss v. Fisher, 7 Bingh. 153) shows that in this country a plaintiff in an action for a trespass of very similar character, may, without proving special damage, recover substantial damages. Nor can it be said that in this case there is no evidence of the malicious character which the plaint imputes to the trespass.

The plaint in this case was filed on the 25th of February, 1860. The damages claimed were all in the nature of special damages, and consisted of three items, viz., 14,000rs., "on account of loss of seventy maunds of indigo at 200rs. per maund;" 5,545rs. on account of indigo which it was alleged Dwarka Doss was prevented from manufacturing from indigo plants; and 2,250rs. on account of indigo which, it was alleged, he was prevented from manufacturing from indigo stumps.

Both the Courts below have found, and their Lordships can see in the evidence no sufficient grounds for disputing the justice of that finding, that the plaintiff has failed to establish any claim to damages in respect of indigo which, but for the wrongful attachment, might have been manufactured from either plants or stumps. The evidence shows pretty clearly that there had been no indigo plant to be manufactured, and leaves it more than doubtful whether all the stumps had not been converted into indigo before the 23rd of September; and whether, if any had then remained to be used in the manufacture of indigo, the attachment would have prevented them from being so used. The two last items of damage may therefore be dismissed from consideration.

The claim, however, to recover damages for loss on account of the manufactured indigo was disposed of by the Courts below in a different way. The Principal Sudder Ameen held that, though the plaintiff did probably, as stated by the European indigo factors, sustain some trifling loss owing to the storehouse having remained locked up, this was due "to the refusal of his agent to unlock the door on the Ameen's application, and that this resistance of a legal process on their part, joined with a disposition to break the peace, caused the loss to the plaintiff." And the Sudder Court considered that no good proof had been furnished that the plaintiff's agents were ever prevented from having free access to the godown for the purpose of turning and drying the indigo cakes; but that, on the other hand, the plaintiff, instead of entering his objections in a legitimate way to the attachment of the property, did, through his agents, contumaciously obstruct the Ameen employed to distrain. The learned judges seem to rest the first of their conclusions partly on the ground that the plaintiff ought not to have kept his lock on the godown; partly on the evidence given by the Ameen of his instructions to the peons to open his lock, whenever the plaintiff's people opened theirs.

Their Lordships think that neither Court has assigned grounds which warrant the conclusion at which both have arrived. They have already expressed their opinion that the attachment was wrongful. The proposition that a man whose possession was wrongfully invaded ought to have given effect to that invasion, because it was made under colour of legal process, by removing the lock of his own storehouse, appears to them to be untenable. The argument that the plaintiff ought to have entered his objection in a legitimate way is met by the facts that he had already entered an objection to the execution, and that, by reason of the closing of the court during the Dusserah vacation, he could neither follow up that objection, nor make any further objection to the acts of the Ameen until the holidays were over. Again, the case of Bayliss v. Fisher (7 Bing. 153), already referred to, shows that even if the instructions said to have been given by the Ameen to the peons were really given (as to which there is a conflict of evidence), the plaintiff was neither bound to accept the permission to use his own property so accorded to him; nor, if he had accepted it, would he have lost his right of action. It appears, therefore, to their Lordships that the plaintiff's suit has been improperly dismissed with costs; and that he was, at the very least, entitled to a judgment for nominal damages. If it be important in India to check any tendency to resist the execution of legal process, it is hardly less important to maintain the principle that they who misuse legal process are responsible for the consequences of that misuse.

It has been argued for the respondent that the suit was properly dismissed, inasmuch as the appellant was, by the form of his plaint, limited to the three heads of special damage therein laid; and having failed to prove any such special damage, was precluded from recovering general damages for the trespass. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion that there was evidence in the cause on which the Courts below might have awarded some damages on account of the loss sustained in respect of the manufactured indigo. Nor are they prepared to allow that if this had not been the case the plaintiff could have recovered nothing. The plaint might have been more accurately drawn, but substantially it seeks damages generally, as consequent on the wrongful attachment of the factory. The principle ordinarily applied to actions of tort is that the plaintiff is never precluded from recovering ordinary damages by reason of his failing to prove the special damage he has laid, unless the special damage is the gist of the action. Thus, in an action of slander for words actionable per se, when the plaintiff lays special damages, and fails to prove it, he is nevertheless entitled to such damages as the jury think right to give him. It would be otherwise if the words were not actionable per se. In the present case the gist of the action is not the special damage, but the unlawful attachment; and the plaintiff would not have been precluded from recovering ordinary damages for that actionable wrong, even if he had wholly failed to prove the special damage laid. Taking this view of the case their Lordships feel that it is not desirable to remit the cause for the assessment of damages in India, since no case has been made for taking fresh evidence, and the judge below would have only those materials for a judgment which are now before their Lordships. They have, therefore, determined to take the course which was taken by this committee in the case of Le Breton v. Ennis (4 Moo. P. C. 323), and to assess the damages themselves.

It must be confessed that the appellant has not given the best evidence that he could have given on this point. He might have proved for what the indigo had been sold, and for what it might have been sold if it had not been damaged, and had been sold at the proper time. Weighing, however, all the circumstances of the case, their Lordships feel justified in assessing the damages at 500rs.

Their Lordships have felt some difficulty about the costs in the courts below, and those of this appeal. The costs of an action in India, particularly the stamp duties payable on the proceedings, depend a good deal on the value of the thing claimed. It is accordingly the practice of the Courts in India, when a plaintiff has recovered less than he has claimed, to apportion the costs in the proportion which the amount recovered bears to that which was claimed. In the present case there are strong indications of a bad feeling between the parties, which, if it prompted the original attachment, has probably, on the other hand, induced the appellant to swell his demand beyond all reasonable bounds. The evidence affords no grounds for a claim for damages amounting to the appealable sum of 10,000rs.; and the amount actually recovered falls far short of that sum. Yet, unless the claim had been thus unduly magnified, the appellant could not have appealed to her Majesty. In these circumstances their Lordships think they must direct the costs below to be apportioned according to the ordinary course of the courts below, and that they ought not to give to either party the costs of this appeal. In making the apportionment, the appellant will, of course, receive credit for any costs which he may have paid under the decrees reversed.

The order, therefore, which their Lordships will humbly recommend her Majesty to make is, that the decrees, both of the Sudder Court and of the Civil Court of Mirzapore, be reversed; that the appellant be declared entitled to recover damages to the amount of 500rs.; that the cause be sent back to the Sudder Court, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff for that sum, and to deal with the costs in both the courts below according to the practice of those courts in like cases; and that each party do bear his own costs of this appeal.

Decrees reversed without costs, with directions as to the costs below.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 159—"Rash and hazardous speculation."

BANKRUPTCY, G.—A country banker accepted to a large amount bills, drawn upon him by a person who failed to remit other good bills according to his agreement, without any security whatever. He afterwards became bankrupt.

Held, that his insolvency was attributable to rash and hazardous speculation, and that his order of discharge was properly made conditional on the setting aside part of his subsequent earnings for the benefit of his creditors.

This was an appeal from the District Court of Bankruptcy at Exeter. The Commissioner was of opinion that the bankrupt's insolvency was attributable to rash and hazardous speculations, and had therefore given him an order of discharge upon condition that his future earnings, beyond the sum of 100*l.* per annum, should be divided between his creditors and himself. From this order the bankrupt appealed.

The bankrupt was a country banker, and it appeared that he had entered into an arrangement with a Mr. Passmore, a trader, to accept bills drawn by him, for which Passmore was to remit other bills. The bankrupt accepted Passmore's bills, and he remitted other bills in pursuance of the arrangement, and this went on for some time.

At length a considerable amount of Passmore's bills was dishonoured, and after this happened Braginton still continued to accept bills drawn by Passmore upon him, and did so to the amount of upwards of 30,000*l.*, without any security.

Daniel, Q.C., and Sargood, for the bankrupt.

De Gex, Q.C., for the assignees and some of the creditors.

Daniel, Q.C., in reply.

LORD CRANWORTH, C., said that the Court had to act upon words which were necessarily of a very vague nature, viz., to determine whether the bankrupt's insolvency was attributable to rash and hazardous speculations. These words were difficult to define, and they could only be dealt with in the vague way in which the Legislature had thrown them before us. Each case must be decided upon its own particular circumstances. Here it was clear that Braginton was not in insolvent circumstances when he entered into the speculations complained of, but the question was whether what he did was likely to lead to insolvency. So long as he confined himself to accepting such an amount of bills as he had means of his own to meet, he could hardly be blamed, even though his conduct might have been imprudent. But after the bills remitted by Passmore began to fail, they having been dishonoured to the extent of 5,000*l.*, it must be said to have been most rash and hazardous for a country banker to go on accepting bills drawn upon him by a man who had already failed to fulfil his engagements. Whatever might be the difficulty, as an abstract question of casuistry, in defining the meaning of the words "rash and hazardous speculation," there was in most cases very little practical difficulty in coming to a conclusion. The bankrupt in the present case accepted bills to the amount of 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* without any security whatever; and it was quite clear that he had brought himself within the terms of section 159 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. He had never seen a case which had been more ably and impartially and impassionately investigated by the commissioner; the only fault that could possibly be found would be that he had dealt too leniently with the bankrupt. His order was not however complained of on that ground. The petition must be dismissed with costs.

Re THE LONDON INDIARUBBER COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 594.

Joint-stock company—Winding up—Companies Act, 1862—Advertisement—Time running in the vacation.

COMPANY.—The seven days required by the 2nd of the General Orders made upon the Companies Act, 1862, may be counted in the vacation.

In this case, which has been already reported ([1866] E. R. A. 651), the winding up petition was, in pursuance of the Lord Chancellor's order of the 24th March, advertised, the advertisement being worded in a special manner to meet the peculiar circumstances of the case, particularly the fact that the petition had been heard before the advertisements were published.

After the expiration of seven days from the publication of the advertisements, application was made to the registrar to draw up the order for winding up the company under the supervision of the Court. He objected to do so on three grounds—(1) because the form of advertisement had not been approved by the Court; (2) because the Court had not fixed the date of the order; (3) because he considered that the seven days could not be counted during the vacation, but only when the Court was sitting.

Westlake, for the company, the petitioners, now mentioned the matter.

LORD CRANWORTH, C., overruled all the objections, and directed the order to be drawn up as of this day's date.

FERRIER v. ATWOOL.

14 W. R. 597; 14 L. T. 278; 12 Jur. N.S. 365: affirming, [1866] E. R. A. 2847; 14 W. R. 582.

Practice—Production of documents, Alleged partnership.

DISCOVERY.—Where the bill alleged a partnership between the plaintiff and defendant, the existence of which was entirely denied by the answer, the defendant was ordered to produce books and accounts, which, by his affidavit, he stated related exclusively to his own business, that being the business in which the partnership was alleged to exist.

This was an appeal motion from an order made by Vice-Chancellor Wood, for production by the defendant of certain documents, including the accounts of the business carried on by him, comprised in the second schedule to his answer. The question in the suit was whether or no a partnership in the said business existed between the plaintiff and the defendant. The plaintiff alleged the existence of a partnership; the defendant denied it altogether. The defendant, by his answer, did not swear that the documents did not in any way relate to the matters in question in the suit, but that the documents were exclusively his own, and related to his own business exclusively. It appeared that a partnership had existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, prior to the year 1859, and had then come to end, according to the defendant's contention; the plaintiff insisting that it had continued after that date.

*B. Hardy (Willcock, Q.C., with him, for the appellant, the defendant.—*This case comes within the exception laid down by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, in his judgment in Combe v. Corporation of London (1 Y. & C. Ch. 650, 651). Consistently with the defendant's statement the documents cannot contain anything strengthening the plaintiff's case, or weakening the defendant's. Harris v. Harris (4 Ha. 179), referred to by Vice-Chancellor Wood, differs materially from the present case. The defendant's oath ought to be conclusive, unless the plaintiff shows a probability that something material will be disclosed by these documents. This he has not done.

Rolt, Q.C., and Bird, for the plaintiff, were not called on.

*KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—*Ascribing to the defendant every desire to tell the truth; ascribing to his answer sincerity; yet the very nature of the dispute renders it impossible to bind the plaintiff by the defendant's view of the nature of the documents in question. It is reasonably possible that these documents may tend to assist the plaintiff's case in a way which the defendant does not suspect. I think the present case comes within the authority of Combe v. Corporation of London, and that the order of the Vice-Chancellor is right.

*TURNER, L.J.—*From the nature of the case I think it is possible that the mode in which the accounts were kept after 1859 may be material to the decision of the matters in question in this suit. This is not a case where the defendant's statement is enough. This motion must be refused, but the costs must be dealt with by the Vice-Chancellor, and the present order will be without prejudice to any application to the Vice-Chancellor for liberty to seal up such parts (if any) of the documents as do not relate to the matters in question in this suit.

Re KAYE.

Practice—Infants—Guardian—Discretion of judge—Married woman as guardian.

INFANT.—In the appointment of guardians of infants the Court is unwilling to interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the judge of the Court below.

But where a Vice-Chancellor had appointed a married woman sole guardian, this afforded a sufficient ground for varying his order.

This was an appeal motion from an order made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart in chambers, appointing Mrs. Boothroyd, a married woman, sole guardian of four infants, the children of Henry Kaye deceased. Mrs. Boothroyd was a sister of the father, and the appellant was a Mrs. Hurst, the maternal grandmother of the infants.

The father died on the 31st January, 1865. He had been, till within a few years before his death, a journeyman workman, but came into possession of a considerable sum of money. He left his wife, Susey Kaye, surviving him. By his will he gave his wife a life interest in his property, and after her death he bequeathed it among his children equally at twenty-one; but there was no gift over in case none of these children should live to attain that age. The will contained no appointment of guardian of the children.

In November, 1865, the mother Susey Kaye died. She made a will whereby she affected to appoint her mother, Mrs. Hurst, and a Mr. Brownbridge, guardians of her children.

On the 21st December, 1865, a summons was taken out in Vice-Chancellor Stuart's chambers by Mr. and Mrs. Boothroyd and Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson (Mrs. Atkinson being another sister of Henry Kaye), for their joint appointment as guardians of the infants, and for maintenance.

This was opposed by Mrs. Hurst, but the Vice-Chancellor made an order in chambers appointing Mrs. Boothroyd sole guardian, and allowing 80*l.* a year, the full income of the infants' prospective property, for their maintenance. The order contained no direction for the education of the infants.

There was contradictory evidence as to the fitness of the Boothroyds and the Atkinsons, and of Mrs. Hurst and of Mr. Brownbridge, whom Mrs. Hurst desired to have associated with herself in the guardianship. It appeared, however, that, during the lifetime of the father, the children were frequently left under the care of Mrs. Hurst during the temporary absence of their father and mother; and also that the mother had expressed a very decided dislike to the notion of her children coming into the care of the Atkinsons or the Boothroyds.

Bagshawe, for the appellant, contended that the appointment of a married woman as sole guardian was without precedent. He referred to Re Austin (13 W. R. 332, 761), where a mother was appointed guardian; but, she having married again, her second husband was associated with her in the guardianship. He urged the appointment of Mrs. Hurst as guardian, and that Mr. Brownbridge should be associated with her.

Buchanan, contra.—There is nothing in the evidence to show Mrs. Boothroyd's unfitness. Primâ facie the guardian should be a person ex parte paternâ, especially where, as here, the property came from that side. At any rate the appointment is a matter of discretion, and the Court would be very unwilling to interfere with that of the Vice-Chancellor.

Bagshawe, in reply.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.— If the matter had been originally before us, I should have thought that Mrs. Hurst and Mr. Brownbridge were the most fit and proper persons to be appointed guardians. The exercise of the Vice-Chancellor's discretion ought not, however, to be interfered with, except for a substantial reason. In this case the objection to appointing a married woman alone has not, I think, been surmounted. On the whole, the best thing for the infants seems to be to appoint as their guardians their grandmother and Mr. Brownbridge, they giving proper undertakings.

TURNER, L.J.—Probably the Vice-Chancellor had not the assistance of counsel when the matter was before him; but on the evidence, and the facts as they stand, I collect that his opinion was against the appointment of Mrs. Atkinson. This is a consideration of some importance in its bearing on the case, because it is evident that Mrs. Atkinson and Mrs. Boothroyd have been acting together in this matter, and anything bearing upon the expediency of appointing the one must bear also upon the expediency of appointing the other. It seems clear that the father put confidence in Mrs. Hurst, as the children were constantly left in her care during his lifetime; he seems to have preferred her to his own sisters. Then we have the mother's will; and although there was no legal power in her to appoint a guardian, yet the Court, especially in a case where, as in the present, there was an indication of the father's wish, would have regard to the expressed wishes of the mother. The best course will be to appoint Mrs. Hurst and Mr. Brownbridge guardians; but some directions ought to be given about the education of the children. There must be an undertaking to send the eldest daughter to a respectable school; and the other children must be sent to school when they are of a proper age. The paternal aunts must have reasonable access to the children at all reasonable times, and upon reasonable notice. The costs, both here and before the Vice-Chancellor, will be paid out of the capital of the property.

WILTSHIRE v. MARSHALL.

14 W. R. 602; 14 L. T. 396.

Contract—Undue influence—Habitual and excessive drunkenness—Duress.

CONTRACT, A.—A contract unreasonable in itself, entered into by an habitual drunkard when in a state of excitement from excessive drinking almost amounting to madness, with a person who at the time had him in complete subjection, will be set aside. It is not necessary in such a case to prove actual madness.

This was a suit to set aside a contract for the purchase of the lease of a house, 25, Beach Terrace, Littlehampton, and the furniture therein, on the ground that the contract had been obtained from the plaintiff by undue influence on the part of the defendant, when the plaintiff was in a condition of mind in which he was incapable of managing his own affairs. The bill also prayed, in the alternative, that if the contract should be held to be binding, it should be declared to comprise the coach-house and stable attached to the house, and that the defendant might be decreed to execute a conveyance accordingly. The plaintiff, who was a man given to long and violent fits of drunkenness, during which he was incapable of managing any business of weight, went down to Littlehampton and engaged a lodging at the defendant's house. While there he indulged in one of these drunken outbreaks, during the continuance of which the defendant, as was alleged, held him down for some hours, and induced him to sign the contract now sought to be set aside, which was for the purchase of the lease of the defendant's house in which he had secured the lodging. The contract was drawn up by the defendant.

Shortly afterwards the defendant told the plaintiff that he was going to London, and thereupon, apparently without any reason, the plaintiff went with him. On arriving in town they both went to the plaintiff's bankers, and the plaintiff drew 12,000*l.*, the amount of the purchase-money for the defendant's house under the alleged contract, and shortly afterwards paid it to the defendant. According to the defendant's statement the plaintiff had offered the defendant the 12,000*l.* for his "place." The plaintiff alleged that if his offer was worth anything at all, it was meant to include the stables attached to the defendant's house, and which were then held under the same lease. In confirmation of this view evidence was given that the plaintiff had called on the defendant's solicitors with reference to the purchase, and while waiting at their office had written to his own solicitors a note referring to the alleged contract, in which occurred the words "in error the stables not included in the bargain." Evidence was given showing that the defendant, when under the influence of excessive drinking, was little short of a madman, though at other times a man of education and of some refinement. The defendant brought in evidence to show that the plaintiff at the time of the transaction in question was not too incapable for the shopkeepers in Littlehampton to receive orders from him. The defendant, on receiving the purchase-money from the plaintiff, applied it in payment of a mortgage debt secured on the house in question, and part of the prayer of the bill was that the plaintiff might be allowed to follow the money into the hands of the mortgagees, and to stand in their place. There was also a question as to the value of the house with and without the stables, the plaintiff, who drove a pony-chaise, especially insisting on the improbability of his wishing to buy a house without stables.

Rolt, Q.C., and Caldecott, for the plaintiff.—This was no contract, and, if so, no subsequent acts could make it one, and therefore they are unimportant.

If there was a contract the stables are included. The plaintiff was in such a state that the onus lies on the other side to show that he was capable of entering into a contract. The evidence shows a continuous state of disordered mind and drunkenness, not simply an occasional freak. The defendant knew he was dealing with a madman. The plaintiff made no inquiry as to the extent of the interest the defendant had in the property, not even whether it was freehold or leasehold.

Giffard, Q.C., and A. G. Marten, for the defendant.—As regards value, which is an important ingredient, the contract is not unreasonable. There is no such thing as equitable insanity as distinguished from that at law, and at law a man cannot aver his own insanity, which must be first found by inquisition. The issue is this, was the plaintiff capable of contracting; and, if not, was the defendant aware that the plaintiff was incapable? There has been no commission of lunacy respecting the plaintiff, and he is only incapable when under the influence of drink. His memory is now singularly accurate as to the state of mind which he was in at the time of the contract. He was not incapable of transacting business with his banker. This was a proper case for a Court of law: Cooke v. Clayworth (18 Ves. 16); Price v. Berrington (3 M. & G. 486); Neill v. Morley (9 Ves. 478); Molton v. Camrouz (4 Ex. Rep. 17); Elliott v. Ince (5 W. R. 482, 465; 7 De M. G. 475); Beavan v. M'Donnell (9 Ex. Rep. 309); Osmond v. Fitzroy (3 P. Wms. 129).

Rolt, Q.C., in reply.—The issue is not as stated by defendant, viz., was there or was there not such insanity as would justify the finding of a verdict of insanity? but if one party seeks an advantage from the condition of the other by drawing him into a contract which on the face of it is unreasonable, the Court will relieve him, even though there be no legal incapacity: Neill v. Morley (ubi supra), Cooke v. Clayworth (ubi supra). The question is, has the defendant accepted the plaintiff's offer, knowing his state. The plaintiff is admitted to be a habitual drunkard. During the period in question he held one continuous drunken bout. The contract is in itself so absurd that no man could think the person who made it was in his right senses. No one was present at the time of the contract except the plaintiff and defendant. We have made out legal incapacity, or, at any rate, such incapacity as will induce the Court to declare the contract void.

March 6.—WODO, V.C., in giving judgment, said that this was a most singular case. The defendant had contended that it must be shown that the plaintiff had been drawn into drunkenness for the particular purpose; and that he ought to be left to his rights at law. Neill v. Morley and Beaven v. M'Donnell were beside the present case. The case of Cooke v. Clayworth showed the just limits to which the Court might insist on upholding the contract. The alleged contract was not one which the Court could allow to stand.

His Honour agreed with the defendant that value was an important ingredient in the question of the reasonableness of the bargain, and he should have thought that if the stables had been included, the bargain would not have been unreasonable. There could be no question as to the plaintiff's habitual drunkenness, but he was not a man of unsound mind, though his mind was one which was easily worked upon. His Honour then reviewed the circumstances of plaintiff's arrival at Littlehampton, and of the night in question, and was of opinion that defendant's own statement showed his influence over the plaintiff. The use of the word "place" in the alleged offer would naturally include the stables, in fact everything that was there. There had been no stipulations as to title, and therefore the defendant had no right to receive the money, or to pay it to his mortgagees. This was not a contract, which, if executed, ought to be upheld.

His Honour then went into detail through the evidence, which showed the way in which the defendant, at the time of the alleged contract, had the plaintiff completely under his management, away from the advice of his solicitor; and said that, although the plaintiff was perfectly sane on ordinary matters, it was the nature of the act which made the present contract incomplete; that it was obtained by undue influence; and that the plaintiff had a clear right to stand in the place of the mortgagees. He then pronounced a decree in accordance with this view. Defendant to pay costs up to the hearing.

WOOD, V.C., March 13, 1866.

Re SAVILLE'S TRUSTS.

14 W. R. 603.

Power to appoint among "relatives"—Time of ascertaining the class.

WILL.—A testator gave a legacy to his "relatives" in such shares, &c., as his wife should appoint. She appointed part to children of testator's illegitimate brother.

Held, that "relatives" are legitimate relatives, where there is nothing on the face of the will itself to lead to a different conclusion.

Held, also, that the class of relatives, who were to take the share which was badly appointed, was to be ascertained at the death of the donee of the power, and not of the testator.

The testator in this matter by his will bequeathed a sum of 1,380*l.*, in the events which happened, to his "relatives," and those of his wife, "in such parts, shares, and proportions" as she should appoint, nevertheless in the proportions following, that was to say, two-thirds thereof amongst his own relatives, and the remaining one-third amongst those of his wife.

The wife appointed certain sums to the children of testator's elder brother, whom testator had always treated as, and considered to be, legitimate, but who, it was afterwards discovered, had been born before the marriage of his father and mother.

Cutler, for the petitioners, in support of the appointment, argued that the testator, who had always thought that his brother was legitimate, must have included the brother's children in the term "relatives." There was no decision on the meaning of the word "relatives." The decisions on the words "relations," &c., only showed that "children" prima facie signified legitimate children. "Relations" need not be next of kin: Grant v. Lynam (4 Russ. 292); Wilkinson v. Adam (1 V. & B. 422); Dilley v. Matthews (13 W. R. 676); Beachcroft v. Beachcroft (1 Madd. 431); Re Herbert's Trusts (8 W. R. 660; 1 J. & H. 121).

Wood, V.C., after referring to Dover v. Alexander (2 Hare, 275), said that he found nothing on the face of the will to show who were meant by "relatives." The law knew but of one set of relatives. Therefore the word could not possibly include the illegitimate children.

The appointment having thus been held to be bad, the next question was who were the relatives to take the badly appointed share.

Rolt, Q.C., Bristowe, and Hamilton Humphreys, for respondents, argued that the time for ascertaining the class of "relatives" was the death of the donee of the power, which was the period of distribution: Finch v. Hollingsworth (3 W. R. 589; 21 Beav. 112); Pope v. Whitcombe (3 Mer. 689) (the report of which has been corrected in Sugd. Powers, 660, 8th ed.); Brown v. Higgs (4 Ves. 708; 2 Sugd. Powers, 268, 6th ed., 661, 8th ed.).

J. T. Humphreys for the trustees of the will.

Wood, V.C., held that the wife had a power of apportioning, but not of exclusive appointment, and that therefore the class was to be ascertained at the death of the donee of the power.

His Honour allowed the costs of a petition which had been prepared by one of the respondents to the present petition for the purpose of ascertaining the title to the 1,380*l.*, but which, on hearing that the present petition was to be presented, they had abandoned.

CARTLEDGE v. RADBOURN.

14 W. R. 603; 14 L. T. 187.

Markswoman—Fraudulently obtained execution of deeds—Heir-at-Law.

FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION.—The plaintiff, a markswoman, was heiress-at-law to a person who died seised of or entitled to real estate. One of the defendants set up a will of the deceased, which will was, as regarded the personalty of the deceased, pronounced a forgery, but which, as regarded the realty, was never impeached at law. The plaintiff was afterwards persuaded to execute deeds conveying away all her interest in the deceased's realty for an inadequate consideration. She subsequently filed her bill, praying that the deeds might be set aside on the grounds that they were obtained by fraud, that they were never explained or read over to her, and that she was, at the time she executed them, in ignorance of her title to any portion of the deceased's estate.

Held, that the Court could order the deeds to be set aside, this case not being at all analogous to the cases of heirs coming to the Court under circumstances of this kind, and asking that mere terms of years, or dry legal estates, should be set aside in order to allow the heirs to proceed at law.

This was a motion for decree.

The bill was filed by Hannah Cartledge, a widow, for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that the execution of certain indentures by her had been obtained by fraud and misrepresentation; and an order either that the said indentures might be delivered up to be cancelled, or that a re-conveyance of the property comprised in them should be made to the plaintiff, or as she should appoint, free from incumbrances created by the defendants or any of them.

The defendants were Sarah Radbourn, George Butler, Joseph Aldridge, Frances Mary Lowe, Alice Lowe, Eleanor Lowe, and William Williams.

The plaintiff's case was shortly as follows:—She was the heiress-at-law of one John Jackson, of Stapleford, Notts, deceased, who died January 26th, 1854, a bachelor, intestate, and possessed of considerable real and personal property. The plaintiff was an illiterate person, being unable either to read or write. Her relationship to Jackson was remote, and for a long time after his death she was ignorant of the facts that he had died intestate and that she was his heiress-at-law.

The defendant Sarah Radbourn had been Jackson's housekeeper for many years before his death. Immediately after his death she took possession of the available portion of his personalty and of the deeds relating to his realty. These latter she handed over to the defendant Williams, who had been Jackson's solicitor. She then set up an instrument which she pretended was Jackson's will, and which purported to leave her all Jackson's property, and to make her his sole executrix.

The validity of this instrument was contested by Jackson's sole next of kin, one Searson, in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of York; and on 12th February, 1857, it was pronounced a forgery by the Chancellor of the diocese. The defendant Radbourn and others were thereupon indicted for a conspiracy to forge Jackson's will, and tried at the York assizes, on March 16th, 1857. The defendant Radbourn and two of the other accused persons were found guilty of the misdemeanour, and sentenced to an imprisonment of two years which they underwent.

The defendant Williams acted as the defendant Radbourn's attorney and solicitor in the suit respecting the will, and on the trial of the indictment and otherwise. Soon after Jackson's death he had taken a house for her near his own residence, and after her imprisonment he took her to live in his own house, where she continued to live.

Previously, however, to this time the execution by the plaintiff of one of the deeds now sought to be set aside had been procured by the defendant Williams, under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff was sent for by the defendant Williams, whom up to that time she did not know, in July, 1856, and questioned by him as to her relationship to Jackson. About three weeks afterwards he again sent for her and gave her 5*l.*, and procured from her all the family papers and memoranda in her possession. On September 12th, 1856, he again sent for her, and gave her another small sum of money, and persuaded her to affix her mark to a document which was never explained or read over to her.

The execution of the other two indentures, which were the subject of the suit was obtained after the liberation of the defendant Radbourn, and under the following circumstances:—

On the 19th September, 1859, the defendant Butler, who was then claiming to be Jackson's heir-at-law, called on the plaintiff and requested her to go with him to the office of a solicitor named Briggs, she accordingly went with him and there found the defendants Radbourn and Williams, Mr. Briggs, and another solicitor named Wood. The defendant Williams was the defendant Radbourn's solicitor, Briggs was Butler's solicitor, and Wood attended at the defendant Williams's request. The plaintiff had no professional adviser, and was in fact wholly unprotected. The deeds were then produced by the defendant Williams, who informed the plaintiff that she must sign them, and that they were all right. The plaintiff, being entirely ignorant of the nature and effect of her acts, as well as of her rights, put her mark to the deeds according to the orders and directions of the defendant Williams. The deeds were not read over or explained to her. The defendants Radbourn and Butler also executed the deeds, and Wood attested the execution. This was the first time that the plaintiff met or had any communication with the defendant Radbourn in reference to Jackson's affairs. After the deeds had been executed the defendant Williams took possession of them. The plaintiff first became aware of the purport of the deeds she had executed some short time after June 29th, 1864, on which day an order was made by Vice-Chancellor Wood in a creditor's suit instituted against Searson, who had taken out letters of administration to Jackson's estate, and to which the plaintiff, as found to be Jackson's heiress-at-law, had been made a party by a supplemental order. By the order of June 29th, 1864, the defendant Williams was directed to deliver to the plaintiff's solicitor the deeds and muniments of title then in his possession relating to Jackson's real estate. The defendant Williams at first refused to give up the three indentures executed by the plaintiff, but ultimately he gave them up.

The indenture of the 12th September, 1856, was expressed to be made by the plaintiff of the one part and the defendant Radbourn of the other part. It recited the alleged will of Jackson, the contest concerning its validity then going on, that the alleged will was very inartificially prepared and worded, and that doubts existed whether the defendant Radbourn took beneficially or as trustee for the heir-at-law; that the plaintiff was the heiress-at-law, and that whatever might be the result of the proceedings adopted or to be adopted as to the genuineness or otherwise of the will, she, the plaintiff, was satisfied, and believed that Jackson and his sister had adopted the defendant Radbourn as their own, and prevailed on her to live with them on the understanding that they should leave her all they had, and, therefore, the plaintiff had, in consideration of the premises, and to avoid expense and litigation, and in consideration of the sum of 800*l.*, to be paid or secured by mortgage of a competent part of the real estate, agreed to convey all her interest to the defendant Radbourn. The operative part of the deed was a covenant by the plaintiff to convey and assure, according to the agreement therein recited, and a covenant by the defendant Radbourn to pay the plaintiff 800*l.*, or execute a mortgage for that amount with interest at 5*l.* per cent., such mortgage to contain a covenant on the plaintiff's part not to call in the principal within fourteen years if the interest should continue to be paid.

The first indenture of the 19th September, 1859, was expressed to be made between the plaintiff of the first part, the defendant Butler of the second part, the defendant Radbourn of the third part, and the defendant Aldridge of the fourth part. It recited, among other things, the trial and sentence of the defendant Radbourn, and purported to be a complete conveyance of all the plaintiff's interest in the estate of Jackson, except in a certain portion, which was purported to be conveyed to Aldridge in trust to execute a proper mortgage to the plaintiff for the sum and in the manner mentioned in the agreement.

The other deed of the 19th September, 1859, was expressed to be made between the defendant Radbourn of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, the defendant Butler of the third part, and James Lowe, as dower trustee for the defendant Butler, of the fourth part. It purported to be a conveyance of a portion of the real estate of Jackson to or for the benefit of the defendant Butler.

The defendant Butler had become insolvent, and James Lowe had died, leaving the defendants, the three Lowes, his heiresses-at-law. James Lowe was a mere nominee of the defendant Williams, and never executed the last-mentioned deed.

The value of the whole of Jackson's real estate was stated to be about 17,000*l.*; and the value of the portion thereof purported to be conveyed to the defendant Butler by the second deed of the 19th September, 1859, was about 4,000*l.* The intended mortgage to the plaintiff was never executed.

The defendant Williams stated in his answer that he believed Briggs acted as the plaintiff's solicitor in the matter of the execution of the deeds and otherwise generally. He further stated that he believed, but that he could not positively say, that the deeds were read over to the plaintiff before her execution of them. He offered evidence showing that he had acted bonâ fide in the matter throughout.

Willcock, Q.C., and W. Morris, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

Osborne, Q.C., and Bunting, for the defendants Radbourn and Williams.—There has been no proceeding at law for the purpose of proving Jackson's will not to be valid quâ the real estate. The plaintiff has been found to be Jackson's heiress-at-law in a creditor's suit only, and that is not proper evidence as against the defendant Radbourn that she is such heiress. If the will is valid (and it is not shown to be invalid), and the plaintiff does not fill the position of Jackson's heiress-at-law, the Court cannot say that this arrangement is tainted with fraud, and should be set aside. There is too great an uncertainty in the title of the plaintiff to allow the Court so to say. They cited Gordon v. Gordon (3 Swans. 400); Wright v. Wilkin (4 De G. & J. 141); Jones v. Gregory (12 W. R. 193; 2 D. J. S. 83).

H. J. Hunter, for the defendants the Lowes, asked for costs.

G. Murray, for the defendant Butler's assignee, disclaimed.

Wood, V.C., said that the plaintiff's claim was made undoubtedly on the ground that, being an heiress-at-law entitled to real estate, she was induced to sign deeds disposing of the real estate without proper advice, and while she was ignorant of her rights and of what she was doing. Mr. Osborne had said that it was not proved that the document which purported to be Jackson's will was invalid as to the realty; and that if it was valid non constat that the plaintiff had not had a good bargain. Again he said that the plaintiff had not been properly shown to be Jackson's heiress-at-law. The answer to both these objections was that the bill alleged that the defendants treated her as the heiress. The recitals in the deeds sought to be set aside proved of themselves that this allegation in the bill was true. Nor was this the whole case of the plaintiff. She might well say, "You have embrangled me with deeds of which I know nothing. I am a markswoman, and you have by misrepresentation procured my execution of deeds which were never read over or explained to me. I wish to be put in the position in which I should have been if I had not executed those deeds." This was not at all like the case of an heir coming to ask the Court to set aside terms of years or a mere dry legal estate in order that he might go to law; but the quite different case of an illiterate person fraudulently and by misrepresentation induced to execute deeds, the nature of which was never explained to her. [His Honour went through the evidence and came to the conclusion that the fraud had been made out. He commented on the fact that if the defendant Williams really thought Briggs was the plaintiff's solicitor, it was his duty to have communicated with Briggs on the subject of the deeds as affecting the plaintiff's interests, just as he did communicate with Briggs on the defendant Butler's interests. His Honour also expressed his regret that Wood, who was called in to attest the execution, did not inquire whether the plaintiff, whom he saw to be a markswoman, had had the deeds read over and explained to her.]

The following were the minutes of the decree.—Declare that as against the plaintiff the indenture of the 12th September, 1856, and the two indentures of the 19th September, 1859, are fraudulent. Declare that the parties who took legal estates thereunder are trustees of such estates for the plaintiff, and direct re-conveyances, the plaintiff, at the expense of the defendants, to execute any such instruments as the judge in chambers shall direct for releasing the mortgage or charge in her favour, and the covenants therein contained. The plaintiff to pay the costs of the defendants the Lowes, and to have them and her own costs, including the costs of re-conveyances, &c., from the defendants Radbourn and Williams.

CAMPBELL v. JOYCE.

Practice—Taking amendments off the file after plea left unanswered for three weeks—Laches.

Where defendants, who are entitled to an order of course for dismissal of the bill against them, do not apply for the order, and the plaintiff amends his bill, retaining them as defendants, the defendants' laches will not disentitle them to have the bill dismissed, though it will disentitle them to their costs.

This was a simple question of practice.

Two of the defendants in this suit had been adjudicated bankrupts since the institution of the suit, and had put in a plea of bankruptcy to the bill. The plaintiff had not set down the plea for argument within three weeks from its being filed, but had obtained leave to amend after the expiration of the three weeks. The amended bill introduced new averments respecting these defendants, who were still retained as defendants.

Giffard, Q.C., and Druce, for the bankrupt defendants, now moved to have the orders for leave to amend discharged, and the amendments taken off the file. Under C. O. xiv. r. 17, these defendants were entitled to an order of course for the dismissal of the bill against them after the expiration of the three weeks; and, therefore, it was clearly irregular to give leave to introduce these amendments. If the plea had been argued, the Court would not have given leave to amend.

E. K. Karlake, for the plaintiff, resisted the motion. He contended that these defendants, by not having applied for the order of course for dismissal of the bill, had waived their right to do so, and had thus allowed the plaintiff to suppose that they would meet him on the amended bill. The plaintiff had made out a case against the said defendants, which would be good against them notwithstanding their bankruptcy. He would be put to the expense of filing a fresh bill if this order were granted. These defendants had, by their delay, disentitled themselves to the order now asked for.

Wood, V.C., said that the proceedings had been irregular, and that he must discharge the order to amend, and dismiss the amended bill as against the bankrupts, with costs of the old bill up to the time of the amendments, as if the defendant's plea had been allowed on argument as a plea to the whole bill. These defendants must, notwithstanding their laches, be in the same position as they would otherwise have been, except that they must, on account of their laches, be refused the costs of this motion.

SMITH v. THE REESE RIVER SILVER MINING COMPANY.

14 W. R. 606; L. R. 2 Eq. 264; 14 L. T. 283; 12 Jur. N.S. 616.

Motion to restrain action for a call on shares—Misrepresentation.

COMPANY.—Where a person has been induced to take shares in a company on the faith of representations contained in their prospectus, which afterwards turned out to be false, he will be entitled to an interim injunction to restrain proceedings at law to enforce a call.

This was a motion to restrain proceedings at law to enforce a call of 1l. a share on the shares held by the plaintiff in the defendants' undertaking, on the ground that he had been induced to purchase the shares by the misrepresentations contained in the original prospectus of the company. This prospectus set forth that the company had contracted to purchase a certain very valuable mineral property of fifty acres, that the vendor had made a large fortune from working adjoining mines, and that he was willing to receive the whole of the purchase-money in paid-up shares of the company.

The directors alleged that they had issued this statement believing it to be true, but it did not appear that they had, previously to issuing it, taken any steps to ascertain its truth; and, after the plaintiff had had the shares in question allotted to him on his application, and had paid the necessary deposit, it turned out that the representations as to the contract having been entered into, and as to the value of the property, were untrue.

Rolt, Q.C., and Eddis, for the plaintiff, cited Rawlins v. Wickham (7 W. R. 145; 3 De G. & J. 319).

Roxburgh and Buchanan, for the defendants, contended that there had been no misrepresentation, as the statements in the prospectus were made honestly in the belief that they were true.—[Wood, V.C.—It has been decided that a representation, made without knowledge of its truth, is not made honestly.] The contract between plaintiff and the defendants was to be construed by the articles of association, of which the plaintiff had notice, and which show that the company was not merely formed for the purpose of buying the particular property mentioned in the prospectus, but for the general purpose of purchasing and working mines: Re Hop and Malt, &c., Company; Ex parte Briggs (1 L. R. Eq. 483; 10 Sol. Jour. 359). If this order is granted, the directors will not be able to enforce any calls, and it will stop all their operations. The amount of the call ought to be brought into court.

Rolt, Q.C., contended that under the circumstances the company had no right to ask for the money to be brought into court.

Wood, V.C., said that the representations as to the contracts, as to the value, and as to the vendor's profits, contained in the prospectus, were distinct and positive, and that they had been shown to be false. It was only after the promoters had got their shareholders that they thought it their duty to examine into the truth of the representations. The plaintiff was bound by the articles of association, but they would only have told him of the alleged contract, and that the directors had power to rescind it. He was entitled to rely on the truth of the representations made in the prospectus. His Honour granted the injunction, and refused to order the money into court.

E. R. A. 1657.

23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. s. 10—Admission of attorneys—Certificate of examiners.

SOLICITOR.—A stewardship of manor is an office within s. 10 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127.

R. E. Turner moved for an order to the examiners appointed to examine persons desirous to be admitted attorneys to grant a certificate to the applicant, Walter Peppercorn.

The facts of the case were as follows:—Mr. Peppercorn was, in the year 1861, articulated as clerk to a firm of attorneys. Shortly after he was so articulated, his father, a gentleman occupying the office of steward of the manor of Headington, died. Upon the death of the father the son succeeded him as steward of the manor. The manor belonged to one of Mr. Peppercorn's family, and the office of steward had always been held by some one of the family. Mr. Peppercorn appointed a deputy to act for him as steward, and was only absent from his master's office three times for the purpose of his office as steward. The fees of the manor court were divided between Mr. Peppercorn and the deputy.

23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 10, requires that no person bound by articles of clerkship to any attorney shall hold any office other than that of clerk to such attorney, during the term of service mentioned in such articles, and before admission he must prove he has not done so by affidavit.

The examiners, upon the above circumstances, refused to grant their certificate, although they found Mr. Peppercorn fit and capable to act as an attorney.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not see how we can make this order. Mr. Peppercorn has clearly held an office within the meaning of the words of the statute. The statute gives us no discretionary power. We sympathise with Mr. Peppercorn. His is a hard case, and one probably never contemplated by the Legislature.

BLACKBURN, LUSH, and SHEP, JJ., concurred.

Order refused.

HIGGS v. MAYNARD.

14 W. R. 610; H. & R. 581; 14 L. T. 332; 12 Jur. N.S. 705.

Negligence—Inference of negligence from the accident itself.

NEGLIGENCE. A.—The defendant's window was broken by a ladder falling against it from the inside of the building, but it was not shown how the ladder came to fall. The plaintiff was lawfully under the window, and a piece of the falling glass stuck in his eye. The defendant was a coffee roaster, but it was not shown in what way the room, of which the window was broken, was used:—Held, that the plaintiff was rightly non-suited in an action against the defendant for negligence, inasmuch as the ladder was not shown to be connected with the defendant's business, or with the management of his household, and therefore there was no affirmative evidence of negligence by him or his servants.

Declaration—for that the defendant so carelessly &c., managed a ladder, in the course of removing the same near to certain premises in which the plaintiff was then employed, that the said ladder was driven through a certain glass window, parcel of certain other premises, whereby the glass thereof was broken and was driven into the eye of the plaintiff, whereby, &c.

2nd count—for that the defendant projected certain broken glass against the plaintiff, whereby the same was driven into the eye of the plaintiff, &c.

Plea—not guilty, and issue thereon.

The facts proved at the trial before Byles, J., at Westminster, were as follows:—

The plaintiff was in the employment of a firm whose premises were separated from those of the defendant by a passage, and on the day of the accident he was, in the course of his duty, at work in this passage. On hearing the noise of one of the defendant's windows being smashed above his head he looked up, when a fragment of falling glass stuck in and deprived him of the sight of one of his eyes. The defendant used his premises for roasting coffee, but it was not proved for what purpose the room of which the window was broken, and which was at the top of the building, was used. The floor below it was used as a warehouse, and the communication between the two floors was by means of a trap-door, and this trap-door was directly below the window that was broken. The window itself was a swinging window, moving on a pivot, and the pane of glass was broken by a ladder falling against it from the inside, but there was no evidence to show what caused the fall of the ladder. On these facts the plaintiff was non-suited.

Keane, Q.C., now applied for a rule to set aside the non-suit and enter the verdict for the plaintiff. The ladder was inside the house, and, therefore, presumably under the defendant's care; prima facie it belonged to him, and it is for him to show how the accident happened; and if he cannot exonerate himself by doing so he must be held liable. In Byrne v. Boadle (12 W. R. 279; 2 H. & C. 722), the fact of the barrel of flour falling into the street from a window over the defendant's shop, was held to throw on him the onus of proving that the accident was not caused by his negligence. And so the falling of a bag of sugar from a crane in the docks was held to afford reasonable evidence of negligence in the absence of any explanation by the defendants: Scott v. The London Dock Company (13 W. R. 99, 34 L. J. Ex. 17; in error 13 W. R. 410, 34 L. J. Ex. 220).

ERLE, C.J.—This rule must be refused. It is clear that the party complaining of a wrong must give affirmative evidence of it. An accident in the ordinary course of a man's business may raise a presumption of negligence; but you do not connect the ladder with the defendant's trade, by showing that it was used in it, nor do you connect it with the management of his household.

KEATING, J.—The case of Scott v. The London Dock Company is very distinguishable, because it was there shown that the bag of sugar, by some means or other, escaped from the chains used in raising goods to the defendant's warehouse, and fell; so that there was prima facie evidence of negligence.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J., concurred.

BYLES, J.—At the trial I thought it was not shown that the defendant or his servants had anything to do with the ladder.

Rule refused.

COOPER AND ANOTHER v. LANDS.

14 W. R. 610; 14 L. T. 287.

Ejectment—What title plaintiff must prove—Attornment.

EJECTMENT. E.—Defendant, an uncertificated bankrupt, purchased premises which he had occupied, and which he continued to occupy for the purposes of his business. These premises were conveyed to A., in trust for the defendant, by a deed which recited that the legal estate was outstanding in a third person. Subsequently A., on the order of the Court of Chancery, conveyed the premises to the plaintiffs, the assignees appointed under the defendant's bankruptcy. After this the plaintiffs' attorney took possession of defendant's goods, and threatened to turn him out of the premises unless he signed an attornment to the plaintiffs, which he accordingly did:—Held, that plaintiffs had sufficient title to enable them to maintain the action.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover possession of one-third part of a house, No. 181, High-street, Camden Town, consisting of the ground floor.

In 1855 the defendant was carrying on the business of a boot and shoe maker in the above premises under the name of White, and whilst so doing had an action brought against him by one Rooksby. In that action Rooksby got judgment, and the defendant was arrested; he was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 3rd April, 1855, and the plaintiffs were appointed creditors' assignees. The defendant never obtained a certificate.

In 1851 the defendant had obtained a lease of the premises in question for a term of nine years at a ground rent of 30*l.*, and at the expiration of that term, being anxious to purchase the premises, and desiring to secure them for his own benefit, he being an uncertificated bankrupt, he induced an acquaintance, Mr. Barnes, to take the conveyance as his trustee. This conveyance showed the legal estate to be outstanding in a third person. A declaration of trust was subsequently prepared, and the purchase was completed in June, 1860.

The defendant continued to occupy the premises from 1860 until January, 1864, when the circumstances under which the defendant held the premises became known to the plaintiffs, and proceedings were taken in the court of chancery in order to compel Barnes to convey his interest in the said premises to the plaintiffs as creditor's assignees. These proceedings resulted in a conveyance being prepared and executed without the defendant's knowledge, dated in July, 1865, whereby Barnes conveyed all his freehold interest in the said premises to the plaintiffs.

On the 20th September two men were sent down by the plaintiffs' attorney to the defendant's premises in order to take possession of his shop and stock-in-trade, and while they were in possession the plaintiffs' attorney arrived and threatened to remove all the defendant's goods from the house unless he signed an attornment to the plaintiffs. Thereupon the defendant signed a document of which the following is a copy:—

"To Mr. Charles E. Lewis, of 24, Old Jewry, London, Solicitor for the Assignees of Thomas Lands, a Bankrupt.

"I hereby attorn tenant to you of the house, shop, and premises, No. 181, late 86, High-street, Camden Town, in the county of Middlesex, and agree to become weekly tenant of such premises, to be held of you, and at the rent of ten pounds per week, commencing from Saturday, the 23rd day of September, 1865, and payable every Saturday following, subject to one week's notice to quit.—Yours obediently,

"THOMAS WHITE."

"22 Sept. 1865.

Rent was subsequently demanded of him, and on his refusing to pay possession was taken of his goods, and this action was brought to recover possession of the shop.

The case was tried before Byles, J., at the Middlesex Sittings, on the 7th February, 1866, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs.

Folkard now moved, on behalf of the defendant, for a rule nisi for a new trial, and contended (1) that the plaintiffs had no legal estate, since under the deed of June, 1860, the legal estate was outstanding in a 3rd person; (2) that the plaintiffs proved no legal tenancy under the attornment, inasmuch as the defendant did not receive possession from the persons to whom he attorned: Cornish v. Searell (8 B. & C. 471); (3) that the attornment was not sufficient in law to support a tenancy: Evans v. Mathias (7 E. & B. 590); and (4) that, since there was evidence of fraud in the mode in which the attornment had been procured, that question should have been left to the jury.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule in this case. I think that the fact of the defendants having attorned to the plaintiffs shows sufficient title to enable them to recover under the circumstances of this case. There would unquestionably have been a good title in the plaintiffs if the deed of June, 1860, had not recited a legal estate in a person who could not be found. The defendant, by the document of September 20th, admits to the plaintiff that he will go out at a week's notice, and this will give a good title to the plaintiffs.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the fact of the attornment could not estop the parties to it from explaining the circumstances under which it was brought about. In the present case Barnes held the property in trust for the defendant, and Barnes was compelled by the Court of Chancery to convey to the plaintiffs to whom the defendant attorned, and I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs had sufficient title to enable them to maintain this action.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of an attornment usually is to prevent the party from disputing the title of the person to whom he attorns. I think, therefore, that the defendant cannot dispute the plaintiffs' title, and that the verdict was right.

AXFORD v. PRIOR.

14 W. R. 611.

Negligence—Unfenced hole—Innkeeper—Guest.

NEGLIGENCE. B.—The plaintiff went to a public-house by appointment to meet a friend, and, as his friend had not arrived, walked into the parlour, and there fell through a hole in the floor, which was being repaired. As far as appeared, his only object in coming to the house was to meet his friend. In an action against the landlord for negligence in not fencing the hole, and in which the plaintiff alleged that he was in the house as a guest, the jury found for the plaintiff.

The Court refused a rule to enter a nonsuit, which was asked for on the ground that there was no evidence, either of negligence on the part of the defendant, or of the plaintiff being in the house as a guest.

Declaration.—That before and at the time of committing the grievance hereinafter mentioned the defendant was possessed of a public inn, and the plaintiff was lawfully in the said inn as a guest, and the floor of a certain part of the said inn, over which the guests of the said inn lawfully passed, had been removed, and a large hole made therein by the defendant; yet the defendant wrongfully left the said hole unfenced and uncovered, and in such a dangerous state that the plaintiff, who was lawfully in the said inn as such guest as aforesaid, and lawfully passing over the said floor, by and through the negligence, &c., of the defendant in that behalf, fell through the said hole and was permanently injured, &c.

Pleas.—1. Not guilty.

2. That the plaintiff was not lawfully in the said house as a guest as alleged.

3. That the guests of the said house did not lawfully pass over the floor of the said part of the said inn, nor was the plaintiff lawfully passing there as alleged.

Issue on these pleas.

At the trial before Byles, J., at Westminster, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with 30*l.* damages.

The facts were as follows:—The defendant was the proprietor of the City of Norwich Inn, Norfolk Street, Park Lane. The defendant, who was a stranger to the house, came there in the middle of the day to meet a friend by appointment, and, as his friend had not arrived, waited there for him; but he did not order any refreshments, and it did not appear that he had any other motive for staying in the house than that of waiting for his friend. Part of the floor of the parlour of the house had been taken up, leaving a hole about four feet square, and the carpenter was still at work upon it. The plaintiff walked from the bar into the parlour, the door of which was open, and fell down the hole, which he swore he did not see. There was no one else in the parlour but the carpenter who was at work there. It did not appear that the plaintiff spoke to anyone in the house, though there was some contradictory evidence as to whether he had been warned not to go into the parlour.

Hawkins, Q.C. (Murphy with him), moved for a rule to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, nor any evidence that the plaintiff was in the house as a guest, or for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The COURT¹ refused the rule, saying that there was no ground for a nonsuit, and that, as the judge who tried the case was not dissatisfied with the verdict, they would not be justified in interfering with it.

Rule refused.

Practice—Appeal restored—Order V. of the Orders in Council of June 13th, 1853.

COLONY. C.—Circumstances under which the time limited for prosecuting an appeal before her Majesty in Council by the fifth order of the Orders in Council of June, 1853, was extended, and a certificate dismissing the appeal set aside.

This was a petition praying that a certificate dismissing this appeal might be set aside, and the appeal restored.

The material facts, as stated in the appellant's petition, were as follows:—The appellant was registered as the owner of a certain ship called the Indiaman, but was in reality, as he alleged, only owner of thirty-two shares in the said ship, the residue belonging to one George Robinson. The respondent brought an action against the appellant, as owner of the said ship, in the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, to recover damages for an alleged unlawful sale of a cargo. In this action a verdict was found for the respondents (the plaintiffs below) for the sum of 2,646l. 6s. The defendant subsequently obtained a rule calling on the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a nonsuit entered, but on the 16th of January, 1865, the Court discharged the rule, and the petitioner received leave to appeal to this Board. Security for costs, &c., was given by the defendant in the usual way, and the record transmitted to the registrar of the Committee.

In November, 1864, George Robinson became sole owner of the said ship. In July, 1865, the petitioner, being in pecuniary difficulties, entered into a composition deed with his creditors, and by reason of his embarrassments he alleged that he was unable to prosecute this appeal within six months after the arrival of the record in England, and that the appeal had consequently been dismissed under Rule 5 of the Orders in Council of June 13th, 1853. By this order it is provided:—"That a certain time be fixed within which it shall be the duty of the appellant or his agent to make such application for the printing of the transcript, and that such time be within the space of six calendar months from the arrival of the transcript and the registration thereof in all matters brought by appeal from her Majesty's colonies and plantations east of the Cape of Good Hope, or from the territories of the East India Company, and within the space of three months in all matters brought by appeal from any other part of her Majesty's dominions abroad, and that in default of the appellant or his agent taking effectual steps for the prosecution of the appeal within such time or times respectively, the appeal shall stand dismissed without further order, and that a report of the same be made to the Judicial Bankrupt—Right to keep up policy in which assignees have disclaimed interest—Title to fund.

BANKRUPTCY. INSURANCE.—A bankrupt, after his bankruptcy, kept up the premiums of certain policies of insurance which he had mortgaged previous to his bankruptcy, and the premiums on which he had covenanted to keep up, and in which the assignees had disclaimed any interest, fulfilling also the condition on which he had obtained his discharge:—Held, that his representatives were entitled to the residue of the moneys payable under the policies after payment of the mortgage debt due on them.

This was a petition for payment out of court of a sum of money, which had been paid into court by a mortgagee of certain policies of insurance, after deducting his principal interest and costs.

The mortgagor of the policies, subsequently to the mortgage, became bankrupt, and the assignees refused to pay the premiums and keep up the policies, and disclaimed all interest in them. The bankrupt mortgagor obtained his order of discharge, undertaking to pay a certain yearly sum towards the liquidation of his debts; this sum had been regularly paid. He also kept up the policies of insurance by paying the premiums.

On the death of the mortgagor the mortgagee received the amount due on the policies, and, after deducting the amount due on his mortgage, paid the balance into court. The representatives of the deceased mortgagor presented a petition, asking that the fund might be paid out to them. The assignees under the bankruptcy opposed the application, and claimed the fund for the creditors under the bankruptcy.

Gardiner, in support of the application.

C. Barber for the creditors' assignees.—The bankrupt, by the 154th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, is not bound to pay the premiums on a policy.

AYLWARD v. SHRIMPTON.

14 W. R. 628.

Summons to vary chief clerk's certificate—Mortgaged property in custody of mortgagor—Sale—No right to set-off against mortgage debts.

MORTGAGE.—A mortgagor of certain property had continued to retain control of the same, which was seized by the landlord for arrears of rent due from the mortgagor. An inquiry had been directed in the suit as to what part of the mortgaged property had been sold by the mortgagee, and a direction that the property sold by him should be set-off against his mortgage debt.

The chief clerk had found that the part of the property in question had not been sold by the mortgagee. His finding was upheld by the Court.

This was a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate with respect to certain matters in the suit, on the ground that the finding was not according to the evidence.

The defendant had a bill of sale of certain property which the sheriff had taken in execution, and had by such bill of sale assigned to the defendant on his discharging the amount due under the execution. The plaintiff had also mortgaged to the defendant all the property in and about a certain farm, including the crops, &c., for 200*l.*, and also executed an agreement to assign to the defendant his (the plaintiff's) lease of the farm.

The defendant entered into possession of the farm, but not of the farmhouse, the plaintiff continuing to occupy the house. The plaintiff had obtained leave in this suit to redeem the mortgage for 200*l.*, and an inquiry was directed as to what part of the property, comprised in the mortgage, had been sold by the defendant, and the proceeds of such part as had been sold by him were to be reckoned in discharge of the mortgage debt. The chief clerk by his certificate found that no portion of the property comprised in the mortgage except a horse had been sold by the defendant, and that there was a balance due to him for principal and interest. The plaintiff contended that some furniture included in the mortgage, which had been sold under a distraint for rent, by the landlords of the farm, should also be set off against the defendant's claim under the mortgage, on the ground that the furniture was in his possession at the time of the sale, through his agent, whom he had told to take possession thereof.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Speed, resisted the application on behalf of the defendant.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The plaintiff had possession of the house, and therefore of the furniture in the house, and the landlord selling it under a distraint, it cannot be said to have been sold in reduction of the mortgage debt. The summons is dismissed with costs.

Lien—Solicitor—Purchase with client's money—Deposit of client's deeds.

MORTGAGE. SOLICITOR.—C., the confidential solicitor of Messrs. H., purchased an estate for himself, and borrowed 3,000*l.* on the deposit of their title deeds, which he applied in part payment of the purchase-money. He afterwards repaid the 3,000l. to the parties from whom it was borrowed, out of mortgage moneys belonging to Messrs. H., which he received for them. Messrs. H. knew nothing of the purchase by C., or the borrowing or repayment of the 3,000l., and C. paid the interest on the mortgage money for seven years till his death, on the representation that he had invested it on real security. On bill filed against his representatives by Messrs. H., Held, that there was a lien for the 3,000l. on the estate purchased by C.

This bill was filed to enforce a lien on the Winhill estate at Great Driffield, Yorkshire, purchased by the solicitor of the plaintiffs, on his own account, and partly paid for with money borrowed on the security of their title deeds, without their knowledge. The plaintiffs, James Hopper and Thomas Hopper, were the executors and trustees of the will of George Hopper, dated 28th April, 1837, in which year he died. The testator was possessed of a mortgage term for 1,000 years, in premises of Witham and Ottringham, in Yorkshire, to secure 1,700l. and interest; and the plaintiffs, on 4th March and 1st December, 1853, advanced to the mortgagors (Robert Wright and Mary his wife), further sums of 800l. and 600l. (in all 3,100l.), on a mortgage in fee of the same premises. Edmund Dade Conyers was confidentially employed by them as their solicitor, and he received notice in October, 1855, from the mortgagors' solicitor, that the mortgage would be paid off on 6th April, 1856. Meantime he had himself contracted with Richard Jennings to purchase from him, for 4,200l., an estate at Winhill, Great Driffield, Yorkshire, the terms of the contract being to complete on 6th April, 1856. In April, 1856, Conyers received notice from the mortgagors' solicitors that they should not have the money ready, and as he had been depending upon it to meet the instalment of his purchase-money, he stated to them that the delay would be very inconvenient, and he should be obliged to borrow the money. He then went to his bankers, Messrs. Bower & Co., at Driffield, and borrowed from them 3,000l. at bankers' interest, on a deposit of plaintiffs' title deeds of the mortgaged property, but there was no evidence to show what statement (if any) he made to the bankers. On 10th May the mortgage money was paid to Conyers, and he, with it, repaid the debt to the bankers, got back the deeds, and prepared a reconveyance from the plaintiffs, which he produced to them, and got them to execute, stating that he had received the mortgage money and reinvested it on real security. He made no other communication to them, and they swore that they were perfectly ignorant of the fact of his purchase of the Winhill estate, and of his borrowing the money from his bankers on the deposit of their deeds, and repaying them with the mortgage money.

In May, 1860, Conyers mortgaged the Winhill estate to Emma Piercy for 3,000l., which mortgage was still subsisting. From that time until the death of Conyers, on 8th October, 1863, he continued to pay the interest to the plaintiffs regularly, as if the mortgage-money had been laid out on mortgage as he had represented, and the true nature of the transaction was not discovered till his death. As he died in embarrassed circumstances a creditors' suit was instituted in Vice-Chancellor Stuart's court, and the usual decree made; whereupon this bill was filed against his widow and executrix, for the purpose of recovering the 3,000l. paid to the bankers out of the Winhill estate, by a declaration that there was a charge on it for 3,000l., and by sale, &c., in the usual way. The bill also asked for a receiver.

Glasse, Q.C., and Newton Stuart, appeared for the plaintiffs, and referred to Lewin on Trusts, 4th edit., 585; Taylor v. Plumer (3 M. & S. 562-73), Pennell v. Deffell (1 W. R. 499; 4 D. M. G. 372), Denton v. Davies (18 Ves. 499), Small v. Attwood (2 Y. & J. 512; s. c. 6 Cl. & Fin. 232).

Fry, for the defendant, contended that there had been a loan of the 3,000l., and therefore that it was a single contract debt. Conyers was employed generally as confidential solicitor, and had a general power to do as he saw fit with the monies in his hands, and therefore, there being no specific trust attached to this money, it was only a simple contract debt: Lench v. Lench (10 Ves. 511), Frith v. Cartland (18 W. R. 498; 2 H. & M. 417).

Without hearing a reply,

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I think the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree. I will consider the case as if Conyers were now alive; but, in fact, the question is between the plaintiffs and his general creditors, who can stand in no better situation than he could have done. The facts are not in controversy. Mrs. Conyers is only doing her duty in endeavouring to lead the Court to the conclusion that there is no lien, and putting forward the case most adverse to the plaintiffs; and she contends that the money was borrowed from the plaintiffs; but it appears to me that was not so; and, therefore, whether they are entitled to such a lien or not, they cannot fail on the ground of loan, for they knew nothing of the transaction whatever. If, when the money was repaid by the mortgagors, Conyers had applied it in purchasing the Winhill estate for himself, and it had been shown that that very money went towards the purchase, I have no doubt that the plaintiffs would have a lien as against Conyers. But that was not exactly so, for Conyers had informed one of the Hoppers, as appears by their evidence, that the mortgage money was about to be repaid, and that he would reinvest it in a mortgage of real estate. That is exactly in accordance with the res gestæ, and Conyers wished his clients so to understand it, and that is uncontradicted; and I see no reason to distrust it. Conyers was to receive the money as agent, and make a proper investment in real estate. Having contracted to purchase the estate he was naturally anxious to get the money to pay for it, but he never asked the plaintiffs' leave, but simply communicated to the mortgagors' solicitors that he should be obliged to borrow the money, not saying on whose account; and he did so; and what is most material, on the deposit of the title deeds of that very property mortgaged. It does not appear that any communication as to the ownership of the property was made to the bankers, but he received the money from them, which he could only have a right to do as the plaintiffs' money, and he applied that very money in part-payment for the Winhill estate. The plaintiffs' title deeds were wrongly made security to the bankers for 3,000*l.*, and part of the mortgage money, when received, was applied to repay that very money so borrowed; so that only question really is whether the intermediate transaction, the borrowing and repayment, makes any difference as to the plaintiffs' right to a lien. I think it does not, by reason that the money was borrowed on the security of the deeds of the clients; for if it had been borrowed only on his security it would have been a debt due from him to the bankers, in which case the plaintiffs could not have succeeded. As it is they are entitled to a declaration that there is a lien on the Winhill estate for 3,000*l.* There must be a receiver.

SHERIFF v. BUTLER.

14 W. R. 629; 14 L. T. 510; 12 Jur. N.S. 329.

Joint-stock company—Winding-up—Liability of trustee to pay calls personally.

COMPANY. M.—Certain old shares in a subsisting bank being in the name of one of two trustees, he received a circular asking him whether he would take new shares in respect of such old shares. The cestui que trust (a married woman, tenant for life without power of anticipation), urged him to take them, and herself sent to the bank the form filled up by him.

In the suit a call as to the old shares was directed to be paid out of the estate, but as to a call on the new shares:—Held, that he could not be indemnified.

The bill was filed by one of two trustees of a marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Cumpston against his co-trustee and the cestuez que trustent, asking the direction of the Court in respect of a call on certain new shares, allotted in respect of old shares, in the Leeds Banking Company, now in course of winding-up.

The trusts of the settlement were to Mrs. Cumpston for life without power of anticipation, remainder to such uses as she should appoint; and, in default, that her husband should have 500*l.* a-year. Part of the property settled consisted of fifty-five old shares in the Leeds Bank, and these were transferred into the name of the defendant Butler (one of the trustees) alone.

In June, 1864, a circular was sent to him requesting to know whether he would take new shares, to eleven of which he was entitled in respect of the fifty-five old ones already held by him, and with it was sent the printed form of application to be filled up and returned. He took no notice of this, but Mrs. Cumpston earnestly requested him to accept the proposal, and he having filled up the form gave it to her, and she sent it to the bank. Butler then applied to the plaintiffs to concur in selling out part of the trust fund to meet a call which had been made; but he filed this bill, and an inquiry was directed as to the circumstances under which the new shares were purchased, &c.

Under orders in chambers 6,050*l.* out of the trust funds had been applied in paying calls on the old shares, and the only question was with respect to a call of 1,540*l.* now made in respect of the new shares.

Darby, for the plaintiff, submitted the question.

Glaspe, Q.C., and Dunning, for the defendant Butler, said this case was an extremely hard case, and contended that inasmuch as an order had already been made for payment out of the trust fund of a call on the old shares, and inasmuch as the eleven new shares were allotted in respect of the old shares, they must be considered as an accretion on the old shares, and the same principle must be applied. The legal liability as between him and the bank could not be contested; but if the affair had turned out profitable, and he had not taken the new shares, he would have been liable for a breach of trust. Nothing could be decided now on the question of the non-liability of Mrs. Cumpston: Clive v. Carew (7 W. R. 433; 1 J. & H. 199), followed by this Court in Pemberton v. McGill (8 W. R. 290).

Baily, Q.C., and Bovill, for Mrs. Cumpston, were not called upon.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It is impossible to decide that Mr. Butler is entitled to be indemnified in respect of this call. I have no hesitation in saying that if there had not been the restraint on anticipation, Mrs. Cumpston's life interest must have been liable; but as there is such restraint, it is not. Neither can I direct payment out of the corpus; for that does not belong to her; if it did, it would be available. Therefore it is impossible, either out of income or corpus, to indemnify Mr. Butler. It is very unfortunate for him under the circumstances.

Costs by arrangement out of the estate.

Apportionment—11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 15.

APPORTIONMENT.—A tenant for life in an estate pur autre vie, and who subsequently purchased the remainder in fee, granted parol demises to yearly tenants, one of whom was entitled to an estate of inheritance in the lands on the death of the tenant for life.

On the tenant for life dying between the two half-yearly periods for payment of rent:—Held, that his executors were entitled to an apportionment.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 27th and 28th July, 1811, certain hereditaments in the county of Monmouth, held on a lease for lives under the Duke of Beaufort, were released to trustees upon trust to permit W. W. Trumper to receive the rents and profits for his life, remainder on certain trusts for the benefit of his wife and children, with remainder to the defendant Thomas Trumper and his heirs on attaining the age of twenty-four years. All the cestui que vie having died, W. W. Trumper, on 11th May, 1818, renewed the lease for three further lives, for the benefit of those entitled under the indentures of July, 1811, and in 1819 purchased the land.

By a deed of the same year W. W. Trumper conveyed the land (subject to the estates still subsisting) to the use of one James Davies, his heirs and assigns, in trust for the said W. W. Trumper, his heirs and assigns, to be conveyed and disposed of as he or they should direct. The lands consisted of two farms, known as the "Lower Grounds," and "The Greige" respectively (let to two tenants, Jones and Watkins), and of a third farm called "The Lawns," let to the defendant Thomas Trumper by a parol demise and as yearly tenant, with rent payable on the 2nd February and the 2nd August.

On the death of W. W. Trumper, on 23rd December, 1859, and between the two half-yearly periods of payment the defendant Thomas Trumper became entitled to an estate of inheritance in the three farms. He received the rents for the two farms let to Jones and Watkins, but claimed not to be liable to an apportionment in respect of them, or in respect of the farm held by himself.

Malins, Q.C., and Blackman, for the plaintiff, argued that the case clearly came within the 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 15.

Greene, Q.C., and J. Pearson.—W. W. Trumper was a tenant for life in an estate pur autre vie only, and this Act did not provide for such a case. He could not claim under the subsequent Act of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22, as the leases were parol only: In re Markby (4 Myl. & C. 485). Here W. W. Trumper, although a tenant for life under the deeds of 1811 and 1818, had purchased the lands, and the interest of the lessees could not be said to determine with his life: Ex parte Smyth (1 Swanst. 337). The words of the Act were, "Where any tenant for life shall happen to die before or on the day on which any rent was reserved or made payable upon any devise or lease of lands, tenements or hereditaments which determined at the death of such tenant for life, the executors or administrators of such tenant for life may, in an action on the case, recover," &c.

STUART, V.C., said that he thought the case clearly came within the Act, and declared the plaintiff, as executor, entitled to an apportionment of the rent which accrued from the 2nd August, 1859, to the testator's death in December of the same year, in respect of all the lands comprised in the lease renewed in 1818.

AINSWORTH v. BENTLEY.

14 W. R. 630.

Agreement not to publish a magazine of a certain kind—Restraint on trade—Injunction.

CONTRACT E. INJUNCTION.—An agreement by a publisher not to publish in future a magazine of a particular description, is analogous to an agreement by a tradesman not to deal in a particular article, and, like this latter agreement, is not void as a too general restraint on trade.

On an interlocutory application for an injunction to restrain the breach of such an agreement by the publication of a certain named magazine, or any other magazine coming within the description contained in the agreement, the publication of the named magazine only will be restrained.

On an interlocutory application for an injunction to restrain the publication of a magazine, the Court will not take so harsh a step as to suspend the publication altogether until the hearing of the cause.

The argument that a person, by offering to accept a certain sum of money as the price of his abstaining from taking proceedings, has shewn that the harm he anticipates is not irremediable, and that therefore he ought not to apply for an injunction, does not go far with the Court.

This was a motion for injunction to restrain the publication of a magazine in breach of an agreement that had been entered into between the parties to the suit.

The plaintiff was the well-known writer, William Harrison Ainsworth, and the defendants were Richard Bentley, the publisher, and his sons, George and Frederick Bentley. Notice of the motion, however, had been served upon the defendant Richard Bentley alone, as it had been ascertained that the younger defendants had no share whatever in the publishing business of their father, but acted in his service as salaried clerks only.

The agreement in question was dated November 2nd, 1854, and was made on the occasion of the purchase by the plaintiff from the defendant Richard Bentley of an established magazine called Bentley's Miscellany. The agreement was entered into between all the defendants, who were therein described as "of New Burlington Street, publishers," and the plaintiff, and the material parts thereof were as follows:—

"It is agreed between and by the parties hereto, that the said Richard Bentley, or his sons George Bentley and Frederick Bentley, shall not publish, carry on, or conduct any periodical of a like nature to Bentley's Miscellany, such restriction not to include scientific or professional periodicals, nor a quarterly review, from the date of these presents. And the said Richard Bentley, or his sons, shall publish the said magazine for the said William Harrison Ainsworth for the sum of 100*l.* per annum, to be paid quarterly, so long as it shall be agreed between the parties that the same shall be published by the said Richard Bentley or his sons; either party giving to the other three months' notice in writing to discontinue this arrangement for the publication of the magazine."

The arrangement for the publication of the magazine by the defendant Richard Bentley had some time since been discontinued, after three months' notice in writing, as provided for in the agreement.

The bill stated that in December, 1865, the defendants contemplated the purchase of an established magazine, called Temple Bar. This magazine was thus described in the bill:—"The Temple Bar Magazine is neither a scientific nor professional periodical, nor a quarterly review, but is a periodical similar in all respects to the said magazine called Bentley's Miscellany, excepting only that in the former illustrations are introduced, but no illustrations are given in the latter; but the articles in each are similar in their leading characteristics, and the arrangement of the articles in the two magazines is similar, and the proportion of poetical articles and prose articles, though they vary in each from time to time, has been on the whole nearly the same; as also has been the proportion of articles of fiction and essays, and articles of an historical, biographical, or critical character."

The plaintiff, on hearing of the intention of the defendants to purchase and publish Temple Bar reminded them of the agreement, and warned them that their intention, if carried into effect, would be an infringement of it. The defendant Richard Bentley thereupon offered the plaintiff 100*l.* if he would withdraw his opposition to the intended purchase and publication. The plaintiff at first demanded 160*l.*, but ultimately agreed to take the 100*l.* so offered him, on condition that his waiver of the clause in the agreement should be limited to Temple Bar, and that the name of Bentley should not be used or connected with the name of that magazine. A release was drawn up, but as the terms thereof amounted to an unconditional and complete waiver of the agreement, the plaintiff refused to execute it, and the negotiation between the parties came to an end. The defendant Richard Bentley completed the purchase of Temple Bar, and published the February number thereof with his name printed on the cover.

Under these circumstances the bill was filed, and it prayed that the defendants, their servants, workmen, and agents, might be restrained by the injunction of the Court from carrying on, conducting, and publishing the said Temple Bar Magazine, and from carrying on, conducting, or publishing any periodical of a like nature to Bentley's Miscellany, and not being a scientific or professional periodical, or a quarterly review.

The evidence of literary men and publishers was given on the part of the plaintiff, shewing their impression of the very great similarity between Temple Bar and Bentley's Miscellany, as the latter was at the date of the purchase. Similar evidence was tendered by the defendants to show that the two magazines, though compounded of the same materials, yet being compounded of them in different proportions, and also being of different prices, (the price of Bentley's Miscellany being half-a-crown, and that of Temple Bar being one shilling,) would, in the view of persons habitually and professionally conversant with such matters, be considered to be not at all of a similar kind.

W. M. James, Q.C., and Bedwell, for the plaintiff.

Rolt, Q.C., Giffard, Q.C., and A. Rumsey, for the defendants, contended that the real meaning of the agreement was that the defendant Richard Bentley should not publish any magazine called, like the miscellany, after his own name, such as "Bentley's Magazine," or "Bentley's Monthly," or some name of that sort; this explained the introduction of the sons into the agreement; they had no share in the business, but their name was Bentley, and it was feared that their names might be used. The defendant Richard Bentley had not originated a new magazine only colourably differing from Bentley's Miscellany, but had purchased an established periodical. The plaintiff had himself estimated the damage likely to be done to him at 160*l.*: it was not, therefore, irremediable, and the Court would not grant an interlocutory injunction restraining the publication of Temple Bar. Should it do so, the harm to the defendants might be irremediable; for, if a periodical of this sort failed to appear for a month, its circulation would probably fall off altogether.

The agreement was a restraint on trade, which would not be allowed. Magazine publishing was a trade of itself, and if a man carried on two trades, that was no reason why one of them should be restrained. Besides, it was a restraint unreasonable as to time, for it was not limited to the continuance of Bentley's Miscellany, and a contract of this sort, not being divisible, would not be cut down. The agreement not to publish a magazine like Bentley's Miscellany was closely connected with the undertaking to be the publishers of Bentley's Miscellany, and both agreements fell together.

The agreement was void for uncertainty. And if not, the words "of a like nature" might have many interpretations, and they ought to be construed in the strictest possible manner between professional men like the parties to this suit. The difference of price alone showed that one could not interfere with the other, as they appealed to entirely different classes of readers.

The following cases were quoted during the arguments of counsel:—Morris v. Colman (18 Ves. 437), Barfield v. Nicholson (2 Sim. & St. 1), Horner v. Graves (7 Bing. 735), Green v. Price (13 M. & W. 695), Mallan v. May (11 M. & W. 653), Avery v. Langford (2 W. R. 615; Kay, 663), Archer v. Marsh (6 Ad & E. 959).

WOOD, V.C., said that he thought the proper thing to be done on the present application would be to prohibit the defendant Richard Bentley from publishing Temple Bar with his name thereon until the hearing of the cause. As to the merits of the case, to his mind they were very manifest. The defendant Richard Bentley never could have thought that his undertaking not to publish a magazine of a like nature to the miscellany would cease as soon as he might cease to be the publisher of the Miscellany for the plaintiff. The two clauses in the agreement as to the restraint and the publication were totally distinct; and the whole correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendant Richard Bentley shewed that they were considered by them both to be so. The manifest interest and scope of the agreement that the defendant Richard Bentley and his sons should not publish a magazine of a like nature to Bentley's Miscellany, was not merely that they should publish no magazine called, as the Miscellany was, by their name of Bentley, but that they should in no way whatever interfere with the plaintiff's interest.

The chief defences that had been raised were—first, that the agreement was illegal, as being too general a restraint of trade; and, secondly, that the agreement was so vague and uncertain that the Court could not restrain an infringement of it. As to the first defence, it had never been decided that a person could not be compelled to observe and keep an undertaking not to sell or deal in a particular article of trade. On the contrary, it had often been held that the proprietor of an article might dispose of it to another, and legally bind himself never again to deal in that article, or in any article professing to be similar to or identical with it. This was the case here. Mr. Bentley had disposed of his Miscellany to the plaintiff, and had undertaken to publish nothing of the kind afterwards. By being bound to abide by that agreement he would be no worse a publisher than he was before; he would only be precluded from publishing anything of a particular kind.

The case of Barfield v. Nicholson (loc. cit.) was very strong in the plaintiff's favour, and it pointed out what should be the form of the injunction to be given. In that case the bill was filed to restrain the defendants from printing and publishing a work entitled "The Practical Builder," or any other work prejudicial to the sale of "The Architectural Dictionary," a work belonging to the plaintiff. The Vice-Chancellor granted an interlocutory injunction in the words of the prayer of the bill; which might have been quite right at the hearing; but Lord Eldon, on appeal, cut down the injunction to the publication of the particular work mentioned in the bill.

As to the second defence that the agreement was uncertain, no person reading the agreement and wishing to understand it could fail of doing so. The description of the magazine to be prohibited should be read with the exception. It would then be plain that the similarity contemplated by the parties could not be confined to identical proportions of the same ingredients, that, e.g., a larger dose of fiction in the one than in the other would do away entirely with the similarity between them. As to the difference in price between Temple Bar and Bentley's Miscellany, when it was recollected that the plaintiff's fear was that Mr. Bentley should throw his experience and energy into some rival publication, the difference in price would be an argument in the plaintiff's favour rather than against him, as the public would have all the benefit of Mr. Bentley's experience and energy for a shilling instead of half-a-crown.

As regarded the argument that the plaintiff had offered to take 160*l.* as the price of his rights, and, therefore, had shown that he did not consider the probable harm that would be done to him as irremediable, and consequently had no right to ask for an injunction, that argument would not go far with the Court. A person might be willing to forego his rights and so avoid litigation; but after the litigation, which he had shown himself anxious to avoid, had begun, the circumstances were altered, and he surely should be allowed to insist on his rights to the utmost.

There would be great hardship in stopping the ensuing number of Temple Bar, and that would not be done, the name of "Bentley," however, must not be used on that number. The following would be the minutes of the order:— "That the defendant Richard Bentley, his servants, &c., be restrained from carrying on, &c., the said Temple Bar Magazine, but the order to be without prejudice to the publication of the said magazine until the hearing of the cause, so as the name of Bentley does not appear either in the title-page or in any other part of the said publication, or in any advertisement of the said publication, and this order to be without prejudice to the right (if any) of the plaintiff to damages or profits in respect of any publication of the work.

[IN THE COMMON PLEAS.]

April 24, 1866.

WILSON, appellant, v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH FOR THE BOROUGH OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL, respondents.

14 W. R. 638.

Justices—Conviction—26 & 27 Vict. c. 32, ss. 7, 8—Schedule, Kingston-upon-Hull—Pit-note—Coals otherwise dealt with—Meaning of—Ejusdem generis.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—The appellant bought coals at a pit, and conveyed them in his own keel to Hull, where they were transferred into a steam vessel also belonging to the appellant for the purpose of being used by him:—Held, that this amounted to "a dealing" with the coal so as to render the appellant compellable to shew a pit note under section 7, and to pay a tax under section 8 of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32, schedule Kingston-upon-Hull.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the Court by the stipendiary magistrate of Kingston-upon-Hull, under the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

It was a information preferred under section 7 of the Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32, schedule Kingston-upon-Hull, charging the appellant with unlawfully delivering or otherwise dealing with a cargo of coals, by removing them from the sloop Dart into the steam-ship Oder, without having delivered a pit note, denoting the quantity and quality of the coal to the inspector of coals of the Local Board of Health of Kingston. The appellant was convicted.

The appellant, who was a shipowner at Hull, purchased fifty-nine tons of coals, which were shipped on board the appellant's own keel, the Dart, and were brought by the Dart into the Humber Docks, at Hull, and from thence to the Railway Dock, where the coals were put into the bunkers of the Oder, a steam-ship belonging to the appellant.

The original pit-note, denoting the quality and quantity of the coals, was not delivered to the inspector, as required by the 7th section of the said Act. The local board contended that the facts above disclosed showed that the coals in question came within the words "sold and delivered or otherwise dealt with."

Reference was made to 50 Geo. 3, c. xli., entitled an Act for watching the town of Kingston-on-Hull, and also for preventing frauds and impositions in the quality, measure, and delivery of coals sold in the said town. Section 98 of that Act exempted from its operation persons bringing, landing or delivering coals for their own use and consumption only; but persons claiming such exemption were compelled under that Act to verify the same, if required by the inspector, upon oath in the manner prescribed.

This statute was repealed by the Hull Improvement Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. ci., s. 8), which was substituted for it; but section 178 of the Act of 1854 re-enacted an exemption similar to that contained in the previous Act. Section 178 of the latter Act was repealed by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32, s. 4, so that the exemption in favour of coals brought, landed, or delivered by any person for his own use was repealed.

It was contended by the appellant that there was no "dealing" with the coals in the present case, because looking at the different sections the "dealing" contemplated by the 7th section must be taken to involve a trafficking, and that the Act did not intend to prevent persons from consuming their own coals, brought from the pit in their own keels to steamers passing from Hull to places abroad, as in this case.

For the respondents it was contended that the taking the coals on board in the dock at Hull was both a delivery of and dealing with them, and that it was utterly impossible for the local board to know to what purpose coals brought into Hull were intended to be converted, and the Act must be held to apply to all coal brought within the district. The appellant was found guilty of a breach of the provision of the 7th section and was fined under the 17th section.

There was a second case in which the appellant was charged with not paying the tax under section 8; but the question of law involved in the two cases was precisely similar.

Lewers for the appellant.—The question is whether a pit note must be shown for coals transferred from the appellant's own keel to his own ship, under section 7 of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32. That Act was only intended to prevent fraud on purchasers. The preamble of the provisional order incorporated in 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32, recites that a petition had been presented praying for additional powers to prevent "fraud in the sale and delivery of coal." That can only apply when fraud is possible, which is not the case when a person ships coal for his own use. The inspectors mentioned in section 6 are only inspectors of coal which shall be "brought for sale to, or sent from, or shall pass through the district." But the words "for sale" must apply to each of these clauses; and in the 7th section it is admitted that the word "delivered" must mean "delivered for sale," and the meaning assigned to "dealt with" must be "ejusdem generis" with the words which precede it. [KEATING, J.—If the party deliver at a quay, how is it to be known whether they are intended for sale or not? how can the inspectors tell what the coals are intended for when they come into the Humber?] If the coals were there for a double object, no doubt the appellant would be liable.

Philbrick (Mellish, J.C., with him), for the respondents.—The Act was intended to prevent frauds between buyer and seller; possibly it was not intended primarily that a man bringing coal from the pit for his own use should be taxed, but one uniform rule was necessary. The penalties inflicted by the Act of 1854 are kept alive by that of 1863; and under the 17th section of the latter Act, if the offence is not committed within twenty-four hours, it cannot be committed at all. If the party retains the coal within the district twenty-four hours, or deals with it earlier, in either case, without delivering the pit note, he is equally liable. [ERLE, C.J.—I do not find that coal passing through the district need show a ticket or pay a tax.] The case of coal passing through the district is referred to at the end of the 6th section. The Acts of Geo. 3 and 17 & 18 Vict. both exempted coal introduced into a district by a person for his own use; but it was found that fraud then prevailed, to prevent which the exemption was omitted in the last Act.

ERLE, C.J.—I think the conviction ought to be affirmed. The appellant bought the coal in question at the pit, and transported it to Hull in his own keel, and it was there transhipped to a steamer also belonging to the appellant for the purpose of being used by him. He was asked for a pit ticket under section 7, and for the tax under section 8, and he is liable if, by means of these transactions, the coal was dealt with within the meaning of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32. The 7th section of that Act provides that a tax shall be paid if the coal is sold, or delivered, or otherwise dealt with, and I think that I give effect to that statute by holding that this coal was dealt with in the present case. I think that the statute means dealt with as a proprietor would deal with his property, and not in the sense of mercantile traffic. I am confirmed in this opinion by the comparison of the previous statutes. Those statutes exempt the coal imported for the use of the person who imports it from the tax, but by this statute the exemption is repealed. The preamble of the Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 32, recites that a petition had been presented by the mayor, aldermen, &c., of the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, praying "for the alteration and extension of the provisions of the Improvement Act for preventing fraud in the sale and delivering of coal, so as to comprise coal exported beyond the seas as well as any other coal sold or delivered within or passing through a district comprising the borough; and I conclude from this that it is not intended that the provisions of the Act should be limited to cases where the coal is bought for mercantile traffic. If an individual were to import coal which he did not at first intend for sale, and after the expiration of twenty-four hours changed his mind and sold, he would not be liable to pay the tax if the interpretation contended for is correct.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. These Acts were passed for the benefit of the people at large, and not of particular individuals. I had at first some doubt, but I now think that "otherwise dealt with" must comprehend such transactions as these, otherwise the frauds which were intended to be prevented would be easily perpetrated. The former acts contain an exemption in the case of coal imported for the owner's own use, and the exemption is omitted in the last Act.

KEATING, J.—I think the conviction was right. Taking advantage of the light thrown on the case by the former Acts, I think there can be no doubt that the object of the statute was to prevent fraud in the sale of coal. The Legislature at first thought that it would be sufficient if the pit note was shown, but said that if the coal was for personal use that need not be done. This act says that the pit note is to be shown not only with reference to coal actually sold but also to that which is in any way "dealt with." Can it be doubted that the transactions which here took place amounted to a dealing with coal? If they were not, cases should be suggested, as that mentioned by the Lord Chief Justice, when a change of intention after the twenty-four hours had elapsed, would have exempted the owner from paying the tax. That could not have been intended. I am clearly of opinion that this amounted to a dealing with the coal, and that the conviction was right.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

LEWIN AND ANOTHER v. BROWN.

14 W. R. 640.

Patent—Agreement for the assignment of—Mutual undertakings.

PATENT.—The declaration stated that a petition had been presented by the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, for the granting to the defendant of a patent, that the plaintiffs had filed a provisional specification, at their own expense, upon condition that the defendants should complete the specification within six months, and that afterwards it was agreed that the defendant should sell to the plaintiffs his right in respect of the said patent for the sum of 5l., to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant on their having completed at their own expense the said patent; that it thereupon became necessary in order to enable the plaintiffs to complete the said patent in pursuance of the said agreement, that the defendant should sign and seal a complete specification; that the plaintiffs tendered to the defendant a complete specification for his signature.

Breach, that the defendant would not sign it:—Held, that the defendant was bound, under this agreement, to sign the specification.

The first count of the declaration stated for that prior to the making of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 16th day of December, 1864, a petition had been presented by the plaintiffs to her Majesty's Commissioners of Patents for Invention, at the request of the defendants, and at their own expense, for the granting to the defendant of a patent for an improvement in the construction of cylinders used in the manufacture of articles of pottery, such as pipes, tiles, hollow bricks, and the like; and the plaintiffs then duly filed, at their own expense, the provisional specification for the said patent, and on the said 16th day of December, 1864, duly obtained from the said commissioners a patent for the same, and provisional protection for the said patent to the defendant for six months, under the provisions of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 84, upon the condition that the defendant should particularly describe and specify the nature of his said invention within six months from the said 16th of December, 1864, the time limited by the said provisional protection. And the plaintiffs further say that afterwards, to wit, in the month of January, 1865, by an agreement in writing, made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, it was mutually agreed by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant that the defendant should sell and dispose of to the plaintiffs all his right, title, claim or property, value in and in respect of, the said patent right of the defendant in the said improvements so made by the said defendant in the said patent tile machine as aforesaid for the sum of 5l., such sum to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant on their having completed, at their own expense, the said patent for the said improvement, so as to be entitled to sell such pipe machine with the said improvements so made by the said defendant; and the defendant, by the said agreement, confirmed and transferred to the plaintiffs all his right, title, value, or claim to the said patent for the said sum of 5l. And the plaintiffs further say that it thereupon became and was necessary, in order to enable the plaintiffs to complete the said patent, in pursuance of the said agreement, that the defendant should sign and seal a complete specification of the nature of his said invention within the time so limited by the said patent and provisional protection as aforesaid, in order that the plaintiffs should be enabled to file the same pursuant to the provisions of the said Patent Law Amendment Act and the said patent and the said provisional protection; and the plaintiffs further say that afterwards and within reasonable time before the same would be required, they duly tendered to defendant for his signature and seal, the necessary, proper, and complete specification of the nature of his said invention for the said patent so required to be signed and sealed by him in compliance with, and in pursuance of, the provisions of the said Patent Law Amendment Act, as aforesaid, and without which said signature and seal of the defendant to the same the plaintiffs would be unable to obtain the said patent from the said commissioners, and would be unable to perform that part of the said agreement on his part to be performed. And the plaintiffs aver that all things were done on their parts, &c., yet the defendant did not nor would sign or seal the complete specification within the said time so limited in the said provisional specification as aforesaid, although often requested so to do, but therein wholly made default, whereby the plaintiffs were wholly and unavoidably prevented from taking the necessary and proper steps to enable them to complete, at their own expense, the said patent within the said time so limited as aforesaid," &c., &c.

To this count the defendant demurred, on the ground

(1.) That the payment to the defendant of the 5*l.* was conditional upon the patent being completed, but the defendant gave no undertaking, and was under no liability to sign and seal a complete specification.

(2.) That the alleged agreement was void as not being under seal.

Prideaux in support of the demurrer.—There is no promise here either express or implied on the part of the defendant, to complete the patent. The purchase-money was only nominal, and all the parties meant was that if the patent should be completed the plaintiff would pay 5*l.* for it, but there was no obligation to complete. Aspdin v. Austin (5 Q.B. 671); Dunn v. Sayles (5 Q.B. 685). [BYLES, J., referred to Elderton v. Emmens (13 C. B. 495) as overruling these cases.] Rashleigh v. South-Eastern Railway Company (10 C. B. 612); Smith v. The Mayor of Harwich (2 C. B. N.S. 651). The declaration, after stating that a provisional specification had been filed, &c., states that "afterwards by an agreement, &c.," so that what subsequently took place was quite distinct, and the only consideration for the promise was the completing of the agreement. [BYLES, J.—Is it not like the case of a conveyance when the vendor prepares a conveyance which the purchaser refuses to sign?] 2. The agreement amounts to a sale of the defendant's interest in the patent, and is therefore void for not being under seal. Hindmarsh on Patents, 234; Power v. Walker (3 M. & S. 7); Chanter v. Dewhurst (12 M. & W. 823).

Cole, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

ERLE, C.J.—We think the parties intended that the defendant should complete the specification, and we must give effect to their intention.

HARDING v. HALL.

14 W. R. 646; 14 L. T. 410.

Distress—Bailiff—Right to sell for expenses.

DISTRESS.—A bailiff who seizes goods under a distress warrant, if his authority to sell on behalf of the landlord is then withdrawn, has no right to go on and sell for his expenses.

This was an action for the conversion of two horses and a waggon, and the question in dispute was whether they were the property of the plaintiff, or had passed to the defendant by a valid sale.

The case was tried before Pigott, B., at the last Staffordshire Assizes. The plaintiff was the father-in-law of one Barton, and took a bill of sale of Barton's effects, including the property in question. Barton's landlord also put in a distress for rent, and the bailiff who distrained seized the goods in question with other goods on the premises. The bailiff held the goods both on behalf of the landlord, and also of the plaintiff, as the bill of sale creditor. The attorney, who acted both for the plaintiff and for the landlord, then paid out the landlord, and directed the bailiff to withdraw on behalf both of the landlord and of the plaintiff. A dispute then arose as to the fees payable to the bailiff, and whether he was entitled to double possession-money or not. The bailiff thereupon removed the horses and waggon, and sold them to pay his fees and expenses. The defendant became the purchaser at the sale. The learned Judge directed the jury that the bailiff had no right to sell, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendant if the bailiff had power to sell.

H. Matthews now moved accordingly.—There is no direct authority upon the question. But a sheriff may sell for his poundage, although ordered to withdraw by the execution creditor; Alchin v. Wells (5 T. R. 470); Watson on Sheriffs, 83. And the case of a bailiff is analogous. [POLLOCK, C.B.—The bailiff and the landlord are but one person; the sheriff and the creditor are two.] The sheriff can only levy his expenses by statute; and the right is given for the benefit of the creditor, not the sheriff, so that the cases are analogous.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that there ought to be no rule in this case. The question arises thus: The landlord gave his bailiff an authority to distrain. The bailiff does so, and takes the horses and waggon. Before more is done he receives notice from the landlord that the rent is paid. After that it is clear that he had no authority to sell, and therefore the defendant has no title.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The bailiff had no right to sell, for his authority was withdrawn. As to the case of Alchin v. Wells, Mr. Matthew's argument is, first, that the sheriff has a right to sell under these circumstances; and, secondly, that the case of a bailiff is analogous. But Alchin v. Wells fails to establish the first of these positions. It only decides that the Court would not actively interfere against the sheriff by ruling him to return the writ; not that he was not a trespasser, or had any right to sell. And I think it clear that he had none. But, at any rate, a bailiff is a mere agent for a principal, and must look to his principal for his remuneration. It would be absurd, when the landlord may distrain in person, if his employing a bailiff should make any difference. The defendant, therefore, has no title.

PIGOTT, B.—I was clearly of opinion at the trial that the bailiff had no right to sell; and I think so still.

LECOCQ AND WIFE v. THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 649; 7 B. & S. 415; 14 L. T. 401.

Foreign commission—Costs of employing counsel—Practice.

EVIDENCE. K.—In order to entitle the successful party in an action to the cost of employing counsel on a foreign commission it must be shown that special circumstances necessitated such employment.

The action was under Lord Campbell's Act for injury sustained by the death of the plaintiff's son, who was killed at the Staplehurst accident, on the defendant's line. A commission was sent to France to examine witnesses, and counsel were employed on that commission by both plaintiffs and defendants. The plaintiffs recovered 400*l.* On the taxation of costs the Master disallowed the plaintiff's costs of the counsel who attended the commission.

Murphy moved for a rule calling on the defendants to show cause why the master should not be at liberty to review his taxation, by allowing these costs against the defendants. There was no case either way, but the plaintiffs, finding that the defendants would employ counsel, and in view of questions of law which might arise, had employed counsel, and having obtained the verdict were entitled to these costs.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule in this case. I am far from saying that in no case of a commission to a foreign part will costs be allowed, but the course is so unusual that it must only be where some special circumstances of the case show that it was necessary. This is not shown here, and it is not sufficient to contend that as the defendants employed counsel the plaintiffs were obliged to do so without showing something special in the case.

BRANSBY v. THE EAST LONDON BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 652; 14 L. T. 403.

Cheque—Action for non-payment of—Banker—Entry in pass book.

BANKER.—*The plaintiff was entitled to draw on the defendant's bank when his balance there exceeded 100*l.* One Saturday it fell just below that amount, but he paid in on that morning an open cheque for 150*l.* on another bank. Afterwards, the same day, he drew on the defendant's bank a cheque, which was paid, and then, after banking hours, one for 17*l.* 10*s.* The latter cheque was presented on the Monday morning and payment refused, the clerk indorsing on it "effects not cleared." About the same time the plaintiff called at the bank and saw his pass-book, in which the 150*l.* cheque was entered as cash paid in by him on the Saturday. Subsequently the manager* told him that "the walk clerk," whose duty it was to go and get the 150l. cheque cashed, went out at ten o'clock, and so had gone when the cheque was paid in on Saturday, and had not yet returned. In an action against the bank for not paying the 17l. 10s. cheque, the plaintiff was non-suited at the close of his case:—Held, that although the non-payment must be taken with the statement of the manager, there was some evidence that the bank was in funds to pay the cheque on the Saturday, and that, therefore, the non-suit was wrong.

Declaration.—That the plaintiff was a merchant, and the defendants were bankers, in London, and the plaintiff was a customer, and employed the defendants as bankers upon the terms that they would from time to time, out of any moneys of the plaintiff in their hands as such his bankers applicable to the purpose, pay for him, on presentment at their bank, any cheques which might be drawn by him upon them as such bankers at the bank, and which should be duly presented at the bank for payment by any person lawfully entitled to receive the amount of such cheques, not exceeding the amount of the balance of moneys of the plaintiff in their hands as such his bankers applicable to the payment of such cheques at the time of the presentment thereof, and such balance of moneys of the plaintiff having been in their hands as such bankers a sufficient and reasonable time to enable them and their clerks and servants to know that such balance of moneys of the plaintiff in their hands as such his bankers applicable to the payment of such cheques, was so in their hands as such the plaintiff's bankers, and sufficient for the payment of such cheques; and the plaintiff says that whilst he was such customer of and employed the defendants as such bankers on the terms aforesaid, he drew a certain cheque upon and directed to them as such his bankers, and thereby required them as such bankers to pay to one Lake or bearer 17l. 10s., in payment of a debt then due from him to Lake, which cheque he then delivered to Lake, and Lake, then being the lawful holder of the cheque, and entitled to receive the amount thereof, duly presented it at the bank for payment; and the plaintiff says that all conditions were performed, &c., to entitle him to have the cheque paid by the defendants as such his bankers, when so presented; yet the defendants, as such his bankers, did not nor would, pay the cheque when so presented as aforesaid, but neglected and refused so to do, although they, as such his bankers, then had in their hands a balance of money of the plaintiff applicable to the payment of the cheque, more than sufficient in amount for the payment thereof, and although the said balance then had been in their hands, as such his bankers, a sufficient and reasonable time to enable them and their clerks and servants, to know that such balance of moneys applicable to the payment of the cheque was in their hands, as such the plaintiff's bankers, and was more than sufficient for the payment of the cheque; by means of which several premises the plaintiff has been and is greatly injured in his credit, &c.

Pleas:—

1. That at the time of presentment the defendants had not in their hands a balance of the plaintiff applicable to and sufficient for the payment of the cheque.

2. That at the time of presentment the balance had not been in the defendant's hands a sufficient or reasonable time to enable them, their clerks, and servants, to know that a balance applicable to, and sufficient for, the payment of the cheque, was in their hands.

Issue on these pleas.

At the trial before Erle, C.J., at the Guildhall, the following facts were proved:—

The plaintiff was an upholsterer in the Old Kent-road, and, in September, 1864, he opened an account with the defendants, who are bankers in Cornhill.

In March, 1865, the plaintiff received this letter from the defendants' general manager:—

" Sir,—By a rule of the bank I am precluded from granting accommodation to customers whose balance falls below 100*l.*, and, although this regulation has not been enforced hitherto in your case, I must, before passing to credit the bills forwarded by you this day, have a distinct understanding with respect to the balance to be left with us. On your returning to me duly signed the inclosed form of undertaking your bills shall be discounted.—Yours, &c."

The form inclosed was as follows:—

" Sir,—In consideration of your discounting for me from time to time approved bills of exchange, or making me any advance thereon by way of loan, I hereby agree to leave in your hands a minimum balance of 100*l.* as a collateral and continuing security against said bills, and I hereby authorise you to retain this amount on my account for such purpose."

This form was signed by the plaintiff and returned to the manager of the bank.

On the morning of Saturday, the 13th of May, the plaintiff had a balance in the bank of 99*l.* 10*s.* 7*d.*, reduced during the day to 82*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* Two cheques drawn by the plaintiff were presented on this Saturday, one of which was paid, and the other for 3*l.*, which was dishonoured.

About half-past ten the same day the plaintiff paid into his account an open cheque drawn by a third person on Sir Claude Scott and Company's Bank in Cavendish Square for 150*l.*, and it was proved that it was the custom of the bank not to enter cheques to the credit of their customers' accounts until they were cashed. The same afternoon, after banking hours, the plaintiff drew a cheque on the defendant's bank in favour of a Mr. Lake for 17*l.* 10*s.*; and on Monday, the 15th of May, about eleven o'clock, Lake, who had not been in the interval in communication with the plaintiff, presented this cheque at the defendant's bank, when it was returned to him with the indorsement "effects not cleared"; he thereupon served a writ on the plaintiff. About the same time as the presentation of the 17*l.* 10*s.* cheque by Lake, the plaintiff called at the bank and looked at his pass-book, in which the 150*l.* cheque was entered as "cash—150*l.*," under the date of the 13th of May, and on the opposite side of the account was an entry in pencil of 232*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* to his credit. It was not positively shown whether the plaintiff saw these entries in his pass-book before or after the presentation of the 17*l.* 10*s.* cheque, but he himself swore that he saw them in time enough to stop that cheque.

The plaintiff himself was the only witness in support of his case, and he said that about twelve o'clock on the Monday he called at the bank to see the manager about the matter, and the latter then told him that the "walk clerk had gone out before the 150*l.* cheque was paid in on the Saturday, and that, therefore, it could not be cashed till the Monday; and that he did not know if he was back then."

At the close of the plaintiff's case his lordship directed a non-suit.

A rule was obtained to set aside the non-suit, and for a new trial on the grounds (1) that the evidence entitled the plaintiff to a verdict. (2) That the defendants having treated the cheque for 150*l.* as cash, the plaintiff had a balance available for cashing the cheque for 17*l.* 10*s.* (3) That there was evidence for a jury that the plaintiff had such a balance. (4) That the defendants had no right to treat the 150*l.* cheque otherwise than as cash, without positive evidence that they had not received the cash for it; (5) that it was a question for the jury whether, under the terms of the agreement of the 25th of March, they had such a right, or whether those terms had been waived; (6) that they had no such right without evidence either that there were special terms agreed on between the plaintiff and the defendants as to the time which was to elapse before the plaintiff was to be entitled to draw against cheques paid in to his account, or else that a reasonable time had not elapsed, and that the question of reasonable time was a question for the jury.

Karslake, Q.C., and Sir G. Honyman showed cause, and contended that it lay on the plaintiff to show that the bank had in their hands a balance on which he could draw on the Saturday. The entry in the pass book was no evidence against the bank unless the plaintiff could show that he altered his position on the faith of that entry. The cheque paid on the Saturday was cashed as a matter of favour and not of right.

M. Chambers, Q.C., Campbell Foster, and Channell in support of the rule.—The defendants have so dealt with the accounts as to make the 150*l.* cheque money for the plaintiff's purposes as against them, and by payment of the cheque presented on the Saturday they treated the 150*l.* cheque as cash. Cumming v. Shand (8 W. R. 182; 5 H. & N. 95); Skyring v. Greenwood (4 B. & C. 281); Byles on Bills, 17. There is evidence that the plaintiff acted on the faith of the entry in the pass book, for if he had not seen the entry of cash to his credit he might have waited in the bank to ask Lake to defer presenting his cheque. The defendants ought to have adduced evidence to show that they did not get cash for the 150*l.* cheque on the Saturday.

KEATING, J.—This was an action for non-payment of a cheque. By an agreement between the plaintiff and the banking company, the plaintiff was only entitled to draw on them when they had a balance of 100*l.* in their hands to his credit. That being so, it appears that on the 13th of May his balance was just below that sum, and on the morning of that day he paid in a cheque on another bank for 150*l.* The cheque, the non-payment of which is the subject of the present action, was given by the plaintiff to Lake after hours on the Saturday for 17*l.* 10*s.*, and it was presented about half-past ten on the Monday. About the same time, or not very long after, the plaintiff called at the bank, and there saw his pass-book, and that the 150*l.* cheque was entered in it to his credit as cash. Then, after hearing that the 3*l.* cheque had been dishonoured, he learns that the clerk had gone out before the cheque was paid in on the Saturday, and it was for that reason the dishonoured cheque had not been paid; the manager accounted in this way for its dishonour. At the trial it seems to have been considered that this might be taken to be the true reason of the non-payment; and my Lord held that you must take the fact of non-payment together with the explanation of the manager, and, we think, rightly. If that were all there would be no difficulty in saying that this rule should be discharged; but there is some difficulty in saying whether that understanding did prevail, and if not, there was sufficient evidence given to call on the bank for an answer. The statement of the manager was not evidence, and, under the circumstances, it would be better that the case should be inquired into again, and the bank can call their clerk to explain the non-payment.

MONTAGU SMITH, J.—I agree that there was some evidence that the 150*l.* cheque was cashed. It was paid in on the Saturday, and undoubtedly it was treated in the book as cash, and the payment of the cheque on that day indicated that the money had been received. If, however, the bank had not received the money, the plaintiff can only recover on the ground of estoppel; but on that ground he may not be entitled to succeed if he was told at the time that the money had not been received. But there is no evidence of the manager's statement being true in fact. There was, therefore, some prima facie evidence for the plaintiff, and the defendants must meet that. It may have been assumed that the statement of the manager would not be denied; but as the case is now disputed it must go down to ascertain its correctness.

CRUX v. ALDRED.

Contract—Liquidated damages.

PENALTY.—The plaintiff, a builder, contracted with the defendant to do certain repairs and alterations to a house, to be completed within a specified time, "subject to a penalty of 20l. per week that any of the works remained unfinished" after the stipulated periods:—Held, that the sum of 20l. per week was in the nature of liquidated damages, and could be deducted by the defendant without proving the loss he had actually sustained by reason of the delay.

This was an action on a builder's account. A verdict was found for the defendant.

Lord obtained a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, pursuant to leave reserved. The work was performed by the plaintiff under a contract, and consisted of considerable repairs and alterations to a shop in Oxford Street. A portion of the sum claimed by the plaintiff had been paid into court, and the defendant claimed to be entitled to set-off the residue under the following clause of the contract, on account of the completion of the work having been delayed:—

"Penalty clause.—The work shall be begun on Monday, 6th February, and be completed to the carcase of the new building. The shop-front and the shop walls, all the cases and fittings, within two months; and the whole works completed within three months therefrom subject to a penalty of 20l. per week that any of the works remain unfinished after either of the stipulated periods have expired, except in case of frost impeding the works, or of such part of the papering as the walls may not be in a fit state to receive, for which a corresponding allowance shall be made, and in case of extra work an extension of time will be made after the rate of one week for every 100l. value thereof so executed on the premises."

Keane, Q.C., and Tapping, shewed cause against the rule and contended that the deduction of 20l. per week stipulated for in the above clause was not to be considered as liquidated damages, but only a penalty, and that the defendant could only set-off such sum as he proved he had lost in consequence of the delay. The money was payable if the works were not completed; the non-completion might be caused by the omission of any one of a number of things of various degrees of importance, and the rule was that where a sum of money is payable on the performance, or omission to perform any one of several things, such sum of money is considered a penalty, and the damage actually sustained must be proved: Sainter v. Ferguson (7 C. B. 716); Holme v. Guppy (3 M. & W. 387); Astley v. Weldon (2 B. & P. 346); Sparrow v. Paris (7 H. & N. 594); Fletcher v. Dyche (2 T. R. 32); Hitchcock v. Coker (6 A. & E. 438).

Hannen and Lord, in support of the rule, contended that the money in question must be considered as liquidated damages, and was payable on the omission to perform one thing only, viz., the last thing which had to be done in order to complete the work, whatever that might be. If the distinction now contended for had been well founded it would have arisen in many of the previous cases.

ERLE, C.J.—We think the sum of 20l., which is to be deducted on the non-completion of the work within a certain period, must be considered to be liquidated damages, and should not be construed in a nugatory manner as amounting to a penalty.

BYLES, KEATING, and SMITH, JJ., concurred.

Not applied, Sims v. Pay, 1889, 60 L. T. 602 (Q.B.D. Div.).Poor law—55 Geo. 3, c. 137—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76—Penalty—Statute—Repeal.

POOR LAW. A. STATUTE.—The statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, s. 6, enacts that "no overseer of the poor shall supply for his own profit any goods for the use of any workhouse, or otherwise for the support or maintenance of the poor in any place for which he shall be appointed as such, under pain of forfeiting the sum of 100l." The statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 77, enacts that "it shall not be lawful for any person filling an office concerned in the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor in any parish or union to furnish for his own profit any goods ordered to be given in parochial relief, or any goods for or in respect of the money ordered to be given in parochial relief to any person in such parish or union," and imposes a penalty of 5l.:—Held, that the latter statute was not an implied repeal of the former.

Henderson v. Sherborne (2 M. & W. 236), observed upon.

This was an action for a penalty under the statute, 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, s. 6. The declaration stated that the defendant, whilst an overseer of the poor for the Weardale Union, in his own name supplied goods for the maintenance of the poor of the union.

To this declaration there was a demurrer.

George Atkinson, Serjt.—The declaration is founded on the statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, s. 6; but that section is repealed by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 77. The earlier statute prohibited the supply of goods to the workhouse or for the maintenance of the poor. Proctor v. Manwaring (3 B. & A. 145), decided that this did not prohibit the supply of goods to an individual pauper. This decision, no doubt, was the occasion of the later enactment. But the later Act prohibits the supply to any person; and person includes a body corporate: section 109. It therefore imposes a different penalty for the same offences which the former Act dealt with, though it extends to other offences as well, and accordingly it impliedly repeals the earlier Act: Henderson v. Sherborne (2 M. & W. 236), where a doubt is expressed on this very point (see marginal note); Lockwood v. The Attorney-General (9 M. & W. 378, 10 id. 464).

Manisty, Q.C., and A. Wills, on the other side, were not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the declaration is good. It shews a case expressly within the term of the statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, s. 6. But it is said that that section is repealed by the Poor Law Act. The object, however, of this latter Act was merely to remedy the defect found in Proctor v. Manwaring. I think Lord Abinger's reasoning in the case cited sound; but the defect in the present argument is, that no intention to repeal the former Act appears. The true explanation of the matter is that the Legislature thought what was done in Proctor v. Manwaring ought to be prohibited, and they thought a penalty of 5l. sufficient, but no general repeal was intended.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The first Act imposed a penalty of 100l. on supplying the workhouse. The Poor Law Act clearly contemplated the continuance of its provisions, for it says (section 51) that the penalties imposed by it shall apply to officers appointed under the New Act. Then it goes on to provide (section 77) for the case previously omitted, namely, the supply of goods to an individual; and in this case it imposes a penalty of 5*l.* The only doubt upon the matter arises from the mistake of the reporters of Henderson v. Sherborne, in the quære which they have inserted in their marginal note. The quære ought to have been whether the first Act was not repealed so far as it concerned individuals, not whether it was repealed in toto.

Judgment for plaintiff.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., April 30, 1866.

COX v. SLATER.

14 W. R. 665; 14 L. T. 510.

Practice—County Court Act (Equity Jurisdiction)—Appeal—Specific performance—Lease.

COUNTY COURT. F.—Where a county court judge considers that he has not jurisdiction, and a case is stated for the opinion of the appellate court, the appeal can only be heard in the presence of both plaintiff and defendant.

Hull applied in this suit, which was an equity plaint from the Bloomsbury County Court, for the opinion of this Court under these circumstances. The plaintiff by his plaint sought specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease for twenty-one years, at 65*l.* per annum rent, in consideration of 40*l.*

Mr. George Lake Russell, the county court judge, considered that he had no jurisdiction, the same opinion being held by other county court judges, the words of the Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 1 cl. 4) limiting the jurisdiction to suits for specific performance, &c., "when the purchase-money does not exceed the sum of 500*l.*" There was nothing in the Act which expressly restricted its application to absolute sales, but Mr. Russell (and other county court judges) considered that a reservation of rent excluded the jurisdiction. The plaint asked an injunction to restrain an action of ejectment which was in the paper in the Court of Exchequer to-day, and Mr. Russell had this morning refused the injunction. The parties were anxious to save the expense of a bill. If his Honour would express an opinion, the judge would act upon it.

The appeal was in the regular form of a statement, signed by the judge of the county court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It would be going a good way to call this a purchase; giving a premium for a lease is not a purchase; although a purchase of a term might be so. I must not advise you, but if I were to do so I should say, file a bill or take counsel's opinion.

I cannot decide such a question on an ex parte application; it is clearly a question which I am bound to decide, but it must be in the presence of both parties.

Practice—Settled Estates Act—Leave to oppose.

SETTLED LAND.—Where the seven days has expired within which a party may appear to oppose an application, under the 20th section of the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, and under C. O. xli. r. 17, some sufficient reason must be assigned for not coming in time, otherwise an application for special leave will not be granted.

F. O. Haynes applied in this matter, under C. O. xli. r. 17, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 20, for leave to give notice of motion to oppose an application under the Act, the seven days therein mentioned having expired. The petition, which had not been heard, was for a lease under the Act, and was now opposed on behalf of two persons, one of whom, Harriett Gibbs, a widow, was resident in Jamaica, out of the jurisdiction, as appeared on the face of the petition, and the other of whom was entitled to a share of the property of which the lease was to be granted. The petitioner had a life estate in the property under a will, with remainder to her children (there being no possibility of any), and, in default, the property was to be sold and divided among the other brothers and sisters who were living at the death of herself and her husband. Five of these were already dead, and in case of a general failure a Mr. Merry would be entitled. Neither he nor Mrs. Gibbs had been served; but the present application was on behalf of both.

There was nothing in the Act as to alleging reasons why the application had not been made within the seven days.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—As to Mrs. Gibbs, it is a sufficient excuse that she is out of the jurisdiction. With respect to Mr. Merry the case is different; some reason or excuse must be alleged why the application was not made within the seven days, and in his case none being brought forward, his application cannot be granted. The very fact of special leave being requisite shows that some reason must be assigned.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 666.

Railway company—Motion to pay the purchase-money into Court—Unimpeached award.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—A railway company, having entered into possession of land required for their undertaking under an agreement to pay the amount which should be fixed by arbitration for the purchase-money on the final settlement of the purchase with interest thereon in the meantime, will, during the progress of a suit for specific performance of the contract, after the award, which remains unimpeached, has been made, and the title accepted, be ordered to pay the purchase-money with interest thereon into Court, although they set up a case that the amount fixed by the arbitrator was fixed by him higher than it would otherwise have been in consequence of statements made by the other side that the taking of their land would cause them the necessity of executing expensive works, which remain unexecuted at the date of the motion to bring in the purchase-money.

This was a motion that the defendants might pay into Court the sum which had been fixed by arbitration as the compensation for a piece of the plaintiffs' land, which they had taken under their compulsory powers, together with interest on such sum from the day on which they had entered into possession of the land.

The defendants had taken possession more than eighteen months ago, and before the amount of the compensation had been fixed, entering into an agreement, when they did so, to pay, "upon the final settlement of the purchase," the amount to be fixed as the compensation, together with interest thereon from the time of their being let into possession.

The bill was filed for specific performance. The title, however, had been accepted, and the conveyance settled by both parties. The only question between them was whether the plaintiffs were or were not under an obligation to build a boundary wall between their own premises and those of the defendants. It appeared that the plaintiffs had stated before the arbitrator that they should be obliged to build such a wall in consequence of the defendants taking the land in question, and that the building of it would cost them 3,000*l.* This statement of the plaintiffs had, according to the defendants, materially influenced the mind of the arbitrator when fixing the compensation; and it was insisted that the defendants were bound to build the wall. The amount fixed by the arbitrator was 18,500*l.*, which was less by 3,500*l.* than the sum to which the plaintiffs had reduced their first claim.

Giffard, Q.C., and Phear, for the plaintiffs, stated the case.

Taylor, for the defendants, contended that they could not be ordered to pay the purchase-money into court until the final settlement of the purchase, which would not be until the case was heard and the decree made. The defendants had taken possession under a special agreement and not under the Act.

Giffard, Q.C., in reply, said that in cases of this kind, possession was always taken under some agreement; the purchaser never entering against and in spite of the vendor. The point in these cases always was whether there was a bond fide question of title between the parties. Here there was no such question. He cited Morgan v. Shaw (2 Mer. 138); Fowler v. Ward (6 Jur. 547); and the principles laid down by Lord St. Leonards' Vend. and Purch. p. 231.

Wood, V.C., said that he should grant the application. The amount of compensation had been awarded simpliciter. The award itself was unimpeached; and all that was said now was that the plaintiff had done or said something which the arbitrator might possibly have acted upon. It might, however, be observed on the other side that it was possible that the arbitrator had struck out this very item from the estimated value, for he had awarded a sum less than that claimed by more than the alleged cost of building the wall. However that might be, no steps had been taken to set aside the award, and as the defendants had entered into possession of the land, and carried on their operations upon it, they had no claim to retain the purchase money. The amount, with the interest thereon, at the rate stipulated in the agreement, must be paid into court within a month from the service of the order.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, s. 85—Costs of party appearing to consent—Practice.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—The Court will, under special circumstances, allow a party appearing to consent to a petition under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, his costs of appearance, though it is not the usual practice so to do where a party appears merely to consent.

This was a petition by the company for payment out of Court of two sums deposited by the company in Court, under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 18), upon an allegation in the petition that the conditions of the two bonds had been duly performed by payment of the respective purchase-moneys to the parties respectively entitled, the lands having been sold to the company by private contract. There were two respondents, who were both served with the petition, and the two properties were perfectly distinct from each other.

The first respondent admitted that he had been paid and did not appear. The second respondent, a Mr. Eiloart, had been appointed by the Court in a suit to represent seven-tenths, and also by the owners of one-tenth to represent them, in the negotiation of the sale of these shares to the company, and the owner of the remaining two-tenths had also appointed the same respondent for the same purpose. Mr. Eiloart in the completion of the purchases had employed one solicitor in respect of the seven-tenths and one-tenth shares, and the owners of the other two-tenths had employed another solicitor. Mr. Eiloart appeared at the hearing of the petition and admitted by his counsel that he knew of the payment of the purchase-money of the seven-tenths and one-tenth, but stated that he had no personal knowledge of the payment of the purchase-money for the remaining two-tenths, and that the company had not furnished any evidence of the fact of payment until the day before the hearing of the petition, when they filed an affidavit deposing to such payment.

Under these circumstances counsel insisted that Mr. Eiloart was entitled to his costs of appearance notwithstanding the company had, on serving him with the petition, stated that they should oppose any payment of such costs, and also served the solicitor of Mr. Eiloart with a document, which they requested Mr. Eiloart to sign, purporting to authorise the company to instruct counsel to consent to the prayer of the petition, and stating that the company would pay the costs thereof. The company had not requested Mr. Eiloart to join in the petition.

Townsend for the company.

Joyce for Mr. Eiloart.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—Mr. Eiloart is, under the circumstances, entitled to his costs of appearance, as although ordinarily a vendor in such cases is not allowed his costs, it was where the vendor had clearly been paid; but if it were not clear that he had been paid, then he was entitled to appear and be satisfied on that point. With respect to E. P. Stephens, 2 Phil. 772, Seton, 3rd ed. 1099, cited by the respondent's counsel, in which Lord Cottenham had held that a respondent was entitled to his costs of appearance on a petition by a company for the payment out of the deposit, the Court, following the opinion of Lord St. Leonards, now takes a different view, and always* disallows such costs unless there are special circumstances in the case.

* This rule is always followed by his Lordship, never by any of the Vice Chancellors.—Ed. W. R.

Larceny—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.

CRIMINAL LAW. C.—The prisoner, a carrier, was employed by the prosecutor to deliver in his (the prisoner's) cart a boat's cargo of coals to persons named in a list, to whom only he was authorized to deliver them. Having fraudulently sold some of the coals, and appropriated the proceeds:—Held, that he was properly convicted of larceny as a bailee within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.

Case stated by West, Recorder of Manchester:—

The prisoner was tried by me at the Quarter Sessions for the City of Manchester on the 4th of April, 1866. The indictment charged him with stealing two loads of coal, the property of Andrew Dobbie and another. The prisoner was a carter and was engaged by Dobbie to deliver in his (the prisoner's) cart a boat's cargo of coals to certain persons named in a list which was handed to the prisoner, and he was not authorized to deliver coals to any person whose name was not contained in that list. Two of the loads of coal he fraudulently sold to persons not in the list; for one of them he obtained twelve shillings; it did not appear how much he received for the other. Upon these facts it was contended by the counsel for the prisoner that he could not be convicted under 24 and 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 3, as it was clear that the property was never to be restored to the owner, who had entrusted it to the prisoner, and who was therefore not a bailee within the meaning of that Act; and they cited R. v. Hassall (9 W. R. 708; 1 Leigh & Cave's Reports, 58). I however directed the jury that if the coals were entrusted to the prisoner for the specific purpose that they should be delivered by him to the persons named in the list, and that he, instead of delivering them, fraudulently converted them to his own use, that the prisoner ought to be found guilty. The jury found the prisoner guilty and I let him out on bail until the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved was taken upon the propriety of the conviction.

Torr, for the prisoner, cited R. v. Bunkall (12 W. R. 414; 1 L. & C. 371); R. v. Hassall (9 W. R. 708; 1 L. & C. 58), and Mr. Greaves's Criminal Consolidation Acts.

Hopwood, contra, was not called on.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this conviction must be affirmed. It seems to me that the question is only like what I said on Saturday last viz.—whether stealing is stealing.

*Bankruptcy—Provisional assignee—Officer of the Court—Costs.*BANKRUPTCY.—A provisional assignee incurred costs for legal proceedings in respect of a debtor's estate in his hands under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, undertaken without the sanction of the Court.

He also retained the debtor's property after he ceased to be an officer of the Court:—Held, affirming the Judgment of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, that the charges in question must be disallowed, and that he must pay the costs occasioned by such retention.

This was an application for the payment to a debtor of a balance now in the hands of the provisional assignee, under the provision of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and for a revesting order in respect of the debtor's real estate. The insolvency took place in 1851. The whole of the debts had been paid, and a balance remained in the hands of the provisional assignee, who also continued in possession of the real estate. He made a claim upon the balance and the estate on account of the costs of some legal proceedings. On July 28th, 1865, the Lord Chancellor made an order upon an application on behalf of the debtor (reported 13 W. R. 1001), by which it was referred to Mr. Commissioner Holroyd to ascertain and state what was the amount of the debtor's estate in the hands of the provisional assignee. The Commissioner reported that there was a balance of 183*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.*, and some further small sums due to the debtor, and that a portion of the costs of the proceedings instituted by the provisional assignee had been incurred without authority and ought not to be charged against the estate.

Cole, Q.C. and Reed, for the debtor, contended that the provisional assignee was wrongfully retaining the estate, the whole debts having been long since satisfied, and that the estate ought to be revested in the debtor. The provisional assignee was retaining the property for his personal benefit.

Sargood, for the provisional assignee, contended that the insolvency originated in a series of frauds, and that the debtor had no claim upon the indulgence of the Court. It must not be presumed that the provisional assignee had incurred costs without authority, which might have been verbally given by the Commissioner. As to costs, he contended that the provisional assignee had no personal interest in the matter, and therefore ought not to be required to pay them out of his own pocket.

LORD CRANWORTH, C., said that he approved of the report of the Commissioners, and the provisional assignee must pay over the balance disallowed by him. He had spent the insolvent's money in costs which he had no authority to incur, and which had been disallowed. As to costs, he would hear what Mr. Cole had to say in reply. He thought it hard that an officer of the Court should have to pay costs out of pocket, but he ought to have shown authority for the proceedings he had undertaken.

Cole, Q.C., in reply said he only applied for costs since 1864. The provisional assignee had insisted on retaining the estate when he had ceased to be an officer of the Court for his personal advantage.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he allowed the costs of the appeal to himself. because since the time of the appeal the provisional assignee had been just in the position of any one else holding property and refusing to pay it over to those to whom it belonged.

The order was that the balance of 183*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* and the other small sums should be paid over to the insolvent, and he should apply to the Commissioner for a revesting order.

A testator domiciled in this country, by his will bequeathed legacies to two persons domiciled in Hamburg. One, a young lady, being of the age of eighteen, the other a youth, being of the age of seventeen, at the time of the testator's death.

By the law of Hamburg a woman is of age when she attains eighteen years, and the father of a minor, which the male legatee was by the law of his domicil, can receive any legacy bequeathed to such minor and give a receipt for it.

Vaughan Hawkins, after stating the above circumstances, asked whether the executors might pay the legacies, the one given to the female legatee, to the young lady herself, and the other to the father of the minor.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—On the production of proper evidence that the young lady is of age according to the law of her place of domicil, the executors must pay the legacy to the young lady. The legacy to the male legatee may be paid to him on his coming of age, according to the law of this country, or that of his place of domicil, whichever event shall first happen, but not to the father.

Account—Trustee and cestui que trust.

ACCOUNTS AND INQUIRIES. PARTNERSHIP. TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Where A. and B., partners, assigned all their stock-in-trade, &c., to C., in trust to secure a sum of money advanced by C. and upon further trusts that C. might manage the business until he and other creditors were repaid sums due to them:—Held, on a bill for an account filed by the surviving partner, that C. was not entitled to credit himself with any sums as "bonuses," notwithstanding that his management of the concern had been such as to pay all creditors and largely to diminish his own debt, and that the partners had repeatedly acquiesced in such charges.

The bill in this case prayed that an account might be taken of what was due from the plaintiff to the defendant on the security of a certain indenture of the 1st of July, 1848; and that, in taking such account, certain sums claimed and charged by way of "bonuses" on the principal sum, secured by the said indenture, might be disallowed; and that, on payment by the plaintiff to the defendant of what might be found due on such account, the defendant might be ordered to re-assign to the plaintiff the property comprised in the said indenture.

The facts of the case were as follows:—The plaintiff and his father (the late Thomas Barrett the elder) had carried on the business of cotton spinners at Prestolee for many years. Shortly previous to the year 1848, the business had fallen off; and the firm had borrowed various sums of one John Hartley, a near relative of the parties, amounting in the whole to the sum of 6,000*l.* 9*s.* The business still continuing to fall off and the firm becoming, in the year 1848, involved with other creditors, an arrangement was come to between the two Barretts and Hartley, by which the latter agreed to advance a further sum of 3,000*l.* The terms of this agreement were embodied in a deed made between the parties and executed on the 1st July, 1848.

By the terms of this deed, Thomas Barrett the elder and the present plaintiff, in consideration of the advances made to them, assigned to Hartley all their stock-in-trade, business premises, machinery, &c., in trust, that the said Hartley, his executors, administrators, and assigns should take possession of the same and should have power to accept any composition for any of the debts or moneys owing by the said firm; and upon further trust "that the said John Hartley, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should, for so long as he or they should in his or their discretion think fit, but not longer or otherwise, and without incurring any obligation so to do, carry on the said business of cotton spinners then or theretofore carried on by the said Thomas Barrett the elder and Thomas Barrett the younger, or any part or branch of the said business." The deed contained further provisions for the defrayal of all expenses incurred in carrying on the said business, a power of sale, a general assignment of the premises on a further trust to secure the principal sum of 9,000*l.* 6*s.*, with interest at 5 per cent., and a trust of the surplus after payment in favour of the assignors.

From the date of this indenture to the year 1859 Hartley continued to superintend the business, giving to it daily time and attention, the cash book being entirely kept by Hartley, and the ledger being kept partly by Hartley and partly by the plaintiff. By the year 1854, the affairs of the firm had been worked round to a comparatively prosperous condition, and in that year an agreement was alleged to have been made between the Barretts and Hartley, by which the latter was to receive, in addition to his interest on the principal sum lent, a bonus of 1,000*l.* for his services rendered up to that time, and an additional sum of 100*l.* per annum. The only evidence of the character of this agreement consisted of entries made in the books from time to time. From these it appeared that, in 1854, John Hartley had been credited with the sum of 1,000*l.*, as "bonus 6 years," and in the years 1855, 1856, 1857, 1858 and 1859, a further sum of 100*l.* had in each year been entered to the credit of his account. In 1859, John Hartley discontinued his superintendence of the business and a formal settlement of account took place. This account recognised the various "bonuses" as placed to Hartley's credit, and found that a balance of 3,700*l.* was still due to him. This balance it was arranged should be paid off by half-yearly instalments of 250*l.* Thomas Barrett the elder was not a party to this settlement, he being then aged and infirm. He died in May of the ensuing year, and Hartley died shortly after, leaving his widow, the present defendant, his executrix and legal representative. The instalments not having been paid for a considerable time, the defendant had enforced her securities. The plaintiff now sought to reopen the account, stating that he was under the influence of undue pressure at the time of sanctioning the "bonuses" to Hartley and praying that they might be disallowed. There was no evidence either of direct pressure on the part of Hartley or of remonstrance by the defendant.

Bacon, Q.C., and E. K. Karlake, for the plaintiff.—The relationship between the parties was that of mortgagor and mortgagee. The Court will not permit a mortgagee to take advantage of his position to make an agreement with the mortgagor by which he shall receive more than his principal, interest and costs. He cannot receive payment for services rendered in receiving rents: French v. Baron (2 Atk. 120), Godfrey v. Watson (3 Atk. 518), Langstaffe v. Fenwick (10 Ves. 404). If the position of the parties was not strictly that of mortgagor and mortgagee, it was that of trustee and cestui que trust. Neither is a trustee who manages an estate himself entitled to remuneration for his own care and pains: Bonithon v. Hockmore (1 Ver. 315), Lord Trimleston v. Hamill (1 B. & B. 377) was also cited.

Malins, Q.C., and Kay, for the defendant.—This is not a question of mortgagor or mortgagee, or of trustee and cestui que trust. It is a case per se; but, if otherwise, the rule excluding any collateral arrangement with a mortgagee, and limiting the rights of a mortgagee to his principal, interest, and costs, was a rule consequent only on the usury laws. Those laws being repealed the rule must fall with them. There was no pressure on the plaintiff, the whole arrangement was for his and his father's benefit. He cannot now turn round, and having received benefit of the capital and services of Hartley, repudiate an agreement for remuneration so deliberately made, acquiesced it, and confirmed. There was no obligation on the part of Hartley to carry on the business. The deed merely gave him a power to do so if he thought fit.

STUART, V.C.—In this case the question raised is one of great importance. There are certain settled principles in this court with reference to the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee and that of trustee and cestui que trust. There is also a principle acted upon in this court as to the law of contracts, viz., that, in order that a contract of any kind shall be binding, there must be the consent of both parties to the agreement, and under such circumstances as to show that there was no pressure or influence to make that consent an imperfect consent. Where the consent to an agreement is by parties who are not on an equal footing in respect to it, in the eye of this Court it may be no agreement. Cases have been referred to—cases of mortgagor and mortgagee—when the usury laws existed, and when there was a clear and decided contract for a loan and interest. Then the law would not permit the mortgagee to obtain payment for a collateral service by means of a “bonus,” or by any other means to exact from the mortgagee anything beyond the terms of the contract, or even under the contract. In fact the mortgagee was limited to his principal, interest, and costs. It is probably true that the cases in which the principle was declared were decided when the usury laws were in existence, and when it was said that such “bonuses,” being mortgage bonds for disguising the illegal interest taken, would, if allowed, be a cloak for usury. But it is an observation of importance, now that the usury laws are repealed, that there was in these cases another branch of jurisdiction of this Court which prevented any oppressive bargain enacted from a man under grievous necessity or want of money from being enforced against him. The moment the usury laws were repealed and the lender became entitled to exact any thing he pleased—from that moment the jurisdiction of the Court, which existed independently of the usury laws, was again called into operation.

The case in hand, however, depends on other circumstances. The deed of July, 1848—not, perhaps, improperly, called a mortgage deed—was a deed for securing a large sum of money advanced by the late Mr. Hartley, and vested the whole stock-in-trade of the partnership in him. This property was vested in him for various purposes, as to all of which, in my judgment, the character of trustee is carefully preserved. These purposes may shortly be described as, first, to pay the then existing creditors of Barrett & Son; then to repay himself the sum of 9,000*l.* 6*s.* which he had advanced; and on both these sums to pay an interest of 5 per cent. When these purposes were served Hartley was to pay the surplus to the two Barretts. Now there can be no doubt about the terms of that deed and the rights of the Barretts to the surplus after this general purpose was fulfilled. This made Hartley as clearly a trustee of the surplus as any trustee could be. Besides that general purpose, there were various discretionary powers given to Hartley. He was not bound to give his services in the supervision of the business longer than he thought fit. He had a power to sell at any moment; and his powers were so complete that I think the lady now before the Court has truly described the position of the plaintiff to have been such that these advances saved him from ruin. Under the supervision of Hartley the concern prospered, the trade debts were paid, and Hartley's debt was reduced by a very considerable amount. Now, in addition to what has been said upon the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee, and trustee and cestui que trust, there is another very well settled rule of this Court—that a trustee is not to exact anything for his services, nor is he allowed to partake of the bounty of the party for whom he acts, during the existence of the relationship. A trustee who has greatly benefited his cestui que trust is in no better position. The present plaintiff's case is that the mortgagee or trustee (without any covenant in the deed for the purpose), told him that he intended to charge a "bonus," and that he was made to enter the sum of 1,000*l.* in the books as such, or as that which has been called "payment for valuable services." The plaintiff admits, however, that although many conversations took place on the subject, he did not venture to remonstrate. It seems to me that the plaintiff, with all his property in the hands of another person, was clearly under circumstances of great pressure, and that although the original advance was an act of kindness, the law will not permit a man doing an act of kindness to say he must have 1,000*l.* for it. [His Honour here referred to the case of Langstaffe v. Fenwick cited in the argument.]

In this case there are circumstances of pressure and difficulty on the part of the plaintiff which did not occur in the case I have just referred to, and the evidence shows that the plaintiff and his father were not in a position to help themselves. It may be said that this is an agreement, the benefit of which the plaintiff and his father have had—but there still remains the question, Was this done under pressure? My opinion is that this agreement cannot stand, and these "bonuses" cannot be allowed. An account must be taken of what is due on the security of the indenture of July, 1848, without allowing the sums charged as "bonus." There will be no costs of either side up to the decree, and on payment of the sum found due, the plaintiff will have a re-conveyance of the property.

CLINCH v. FINANCIAL CORPORATION (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 685; L. R. 2 Eq. 271; 12 Jur. N.S. 484.

Practice—Production of documents—Company—Directors.

DISCOVERY. A.—Upon the common order for an affidavit of documents the directors of a company must make discovery of all documents in the possession of the company.

Taylor v. Rundell (Cr. & Ph. 104) followed.

This suit was instituted by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders in the Financial Corporation, except the defendants, against the Financial Corporation, the Oriental Commercial Bank, the directors of the Corporation and the bank respectively, and the liquidators appointed to wind up the Corporation.

By an order made in the cause on the 30th day of November, 1865, upon the plaintiff's application, it was ordered that the defendants, the Corporation and the bank, by their secretaries or other proper officers, and also the other defendants, should, within fourteen days after service of the order, make and file a full and sufficient affidavit or affidavits stating whether they, or any, or either of them had or had not in their or any of their possession or power, and, if any, what documents relating to the matters in question in the cause; and it was ordered that the Corporation and bank should produce, at their respective offices, and the directors and the liquidators at the offices of their respective solicitors, the documents which, by such affidavits or affidavit, should appear to be in their or either of their possession or power, except such of the same, if any, as they or either of them might, by such affidavit or affidavits, object to produce.

By their affidavit, filed on the 15th day of January, 1866, the directors of the bank swore that, according to the best of their knowledge, remembrance, information and belief, they had not, and never had had, in their own, or any other person's possession, custody, or power, any document relating to any of the matters in question in the suit, "other than such as might be in the possession of the bank, and which would be accounted for in the affidavit to be made by the secretary of the bank."

This affidavit having been declared by the Court to be insufficient, the directors filed a second affidavit on the 28th of March, 1866, whereby they swore that to the best of their knowledge, information, and belief, they had not then, and they never had had, in their or any other person's possession, custody, or power, any document relating to any of the matters in question in the suit. Thereupon the plaintiff took out a summons to consider the sufficiency of the last-mentioned affidavit; and such summons was adjourned into court and now came on for hearing.

A. E. Miller, for the plaintiff, submitted that the directors had, by their first affidavit, admitted that they had documents in the possession of their agent, the secretary of the bank. The plaintiff wished to test the evidence of the secretary who was not a party to the suit by the oaths of the directors who were parties. A further affidavit must therefore be made by the directors. There were at least two documents in the possession of the directors, which they had mentioned in their answer; and the fact of their being directors made them liable to give a schedule of documents in the possession of the bank, or to explain why they did not. If, indeed, the directors would swear that they had seen the schedule to the affidavit of the secretary, and that there was no document in the possession of the bank other than those mentioned in that schedule, that would be sufficient; but the plaintiff was entitled in this matter to have the oath of each of the directors as well as that of the secretary of the bank. He cited Stuart v. Lord Bute (11 Sim. 442); Attorney-General v. Retford (2 M. & K. 35); Acomb v. The Landed Estates Company (14 W. R. 387).

Little, for the directors, argued that the secretary had accounted for all the documents of the bank, and that, moreover, the plaintiff had access to those documents. It would be wrong, he urged, for the directors to admit possession of the documents of the bank, for in that case they would be obliged, under the order for the production, to produce those documents at the hearing of the cause, though they were merely officers of the bank, whose office might expire before the hearing. The true possession of these documents was in the bank, and the bank was a party to the suit, and the only object of this application was to make the directors repeat the affidavit of the secretary. As the bank was on the record, the proper order would be for the bank to produce; and it was through the secretary of the bank that the plaintiff must have production. From the directors he could only have an account of the documents in their separate private possession, of which there were none. The subject was unfettered by authority, and Stuart v. Lord Bute (loc. cit.) was a case of private partnership.

WOOD, V.C., said he thought that the directors had misconceived the form of the order, for they thought that it alluded to a possession of documents by the bank separate from the possession of the directors; but the possession of the bank was the possession of the directors. It was true that an abstraction called the bank was a party on the record; and that the legal title to the documents in question was vested in that corporation. No order of the Court however could be made on the secretary of the bank without the defendants being represented in Court in their capacity of directors.

The possession of the documents of a company must rest with those who managed its concerns, and who alone could deal with those documents; and the question now before the court had frequently been tried upon exceptions to answer as well as upon summons to consider the sufficiency of an affidavit. His Honour then referred to the case of Taylor v. Rundell (Cr. & Ph. 104), as showing that the directors of a company must give information as to documents not only in their own private possession or power, but also in the possession or power of the company. His Honour said that, with regard to the directors in the present case, they had control over the documents and they must answer for those which were in their possession or power quâ directors; and although the secretary had made an affidavit, yet the directors must affirm that which he had done, and say that they had no other documents but those which were mentioned in his affidavit. There was no difficulty as to the production of the documents; because upon a motion for production of documents the directors could make any defence which might be open to them. The plaintiff had a right to have a list of the documents made by the directors, they not having stated that they had in their possession no other documents than those which had been mentioned by the secretary.

As the directors had misconceived the meaning of the order it would be better to say nothing about costs.

14 W. R. 699; 12 Jur. N.S. 726: affirming 14 W. R. 281; 12 Jur. N.S. 56 (C.P.).

Landlord and tenant—Assignment of lease—Failure to obtain consent of lessor—Recovery of deposit-money.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—The defendant being in possession under a lease, under covenant not to assign without the lessor's assent, agreed to sell the residue of her term to the plaintiff, he paying 750l., part of the purchase-money, before the completion of the purchase. If the lessor's assent to the assignment could not be obtained, the defendant was to be at liberty to rescind the contract, and was thereupon to return the 750l. The plaintiff paid the 750l., and afterwards endeavoured to obtain a new lease; in this endeavour he was assisted by the defendant. The lessors offered a new lease for the same term and at the same rent, but containing different covenants, and refused to give their assent to the assignment of the term. The plaintiff declined to accept this lease, and brought an action to recover the 750l.

Held, affirming the judgment of the Common Pleas, that the application for a new lease did not operate as a rescission of the original contract, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to have the lessors' assent to the assignment, or, failing that, to recover the deposit.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Blackburn, Shee, and Lush, JJ., Bramwell, Channell, and Pigott, BB.

Error from the Court of Common Pleas on a judgment for the plaintiff on a special case.

Reported 14 W. R. 281. The facts are shortly as follows:—

In 1852 the Mercer's Company, owners in fee of St. Martin's Hall, leased it to John Hullah for sixty-four years, he covenanting not to assign or underlet the premises without the written consent of the lessors, and not to use them for any other purpose than as a music hall, or for certain public meetings, or for the exhibition or sale of works of art.

In 1860 Hullah became bankrupt, and the defendant purchased the residue of the term, which was sold by order of the Court of Bankruptcy.

In 1863 the plaintiff, by articles of agreement, agreed to purchase the residue of the term of the defendant, subject to the covenants and conditions contained in the lease to Hullah; 500*l.*, part of the purchase-money, to be paid to the vendor on execution of the agreement, and 250*l.*, further part thereof, on the 1st of December following; on payment of the said sum of 250*l.* before the 1st of December the vendor to deliver an abstract of title before the 15th of December. Then followed this clause:—

“If the vendor shall be unable to procure the lessor's assent to the assignment to the purchaser, the vendor may, by notice in writing to be given to the purchaser or his solicitor, at any time, and notwithstanding any negotiation or litigation in respect of any such objection or requisition as aforesaid, rescind this contract, and shall thereupon return to the purchaser the sum of 500*l.*, paid by him on the execution of these presents, and the said sum of 250*l.*, if paid by him as hereinbefore stipulated.”

The two sums of 500*l.* and 250*l.* were duly paid.

The object of the plaintiff was to establish a central cooking depot, and promenade concerts for the working classes, and the defendant joined with him in endeavouring to obtain for him a lease from the Mercer's Company, which would enable him to carry out this object. After protracted negotiations the Mercer's Company, on the 11th of March, 1865, offered him a lease at the then existing rent, and for the same term, but which would not enable him to carry out his object fully. They refused their licence to assign the original lease. This lease the plaintiff refused to accept, and gave the defendant notice that if the license was not obtained by the 18th of March he should consider the contract at an end. On the 28th of April not having obtained the license, he gave formal notice that he had rescinded the contract, and claimed the repayment of the deposit of 750*l.*

The question for the Court was whether he was entitled to recover this sum.

Manisty, Q.C. (H. T. Cole with him), for the defendant.—The real question is whether the lessors' assent to the assignment of the original lease is part of the title which the plaintiff was entitled to have. The object of the plaintiff was in reality to obtain a new lease with new covenants, and, as a step to this, he at first attempts to get the old lease assigned to him; subsequently, however, he asks in the alternative either for a new lease or for an assignment of the old one, and gets the defendant to concur in the application and to further it. It is submitted that by so doing he has waived his right to the assignment, and that, if he has the offer of a new lease, he cannot turn round and refuse to accept it, and demand the assignment of the old one. [BLACKBURN, J.—Does it come to more than this? The plaintiff prefers a new lease, and the defendant says, I will assist you as far as I can in obtaining it. Does this amount to a rescission of the old contract and the substitution of a new one?] It would not be equitable that he should be able to demand the license after being a party to the application for a new lease; he has departed from the original contract. [BRAMWELL, B.—You must at any rate make out that the lease which was offered was such a lease as the parties contemplated; did the Mercer's Company do more than offer one with entirely different covenants?] The application for the lease has disclosed what the defendants' object in asking for it was, and has been the means of preventing his obtaining the license; and it is submitted that, even if the terms of the lease were not those for which he asked, he cannot recover the deposit.

F. Russell and C. Bowen, for the plaintiff, were not heard.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this judgment must be affirmed, and on the grounds stated in the judgment of the Court below. We think that, although attempts were made to enter into a new arrangement, the original contract was not waived.

Judgment affirmed.

CORSER v. JONES.

14 W. R. 704.

Practice—Transfer of cause from one branch of the court to another.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—When two suits relating to the administration of the same estate are instituted in different branches of the Court, and in one of these suits a decree has been obtained, the circumstances may be such as to render it proper that that suit should be transferred to the branch of the Court where a decree has not been made.

This was an application to have this cause, which was set down before the Master of the Rolls, transferred to the court of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, on the ground that the late Judge had already made a decree in a suit of Brooks v. Jones. Both suits related to the administration of the same estate, but that of Brooks v. Jones was instituted by an equitable mortgagee to realize his security, while the suit of Corser v. Jones was instituted by a specialty creditor on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of the testator. Devisees of specifically devised real estates were made defendants to the latter suit, but not to the former. It was alleged now that it would be necessary, in order to satisfy the creditors, to have recourse to the specifically devised estates.

Southgate, Q.C., Everitt, W. Morris, and B. B. Rogers, appeared upon the motion.

Their Lordships thought that the two causes must come to the same court, and that the reasons in favour of transferring Brooks v. Jones to the Rolls preponderated. As, however, some of the parties to the latter suit had not been served with notice of this motion, unless they consented to the transfer of that suit to the Rolls, the present motion must be dismissed.

Re THE UNIVERSAL BANK (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 705: on appeal, [1866] E. R. A.; 14 W. R. 906 (L. JJ.).

Winding-up—Petitioning creditor—Order—Costs.

COMPANY. M.—A. received from B., a promoter of a company, certain promissory notes which had been given to B. by the company, but which, at the time of the transfer to A., were overdue.

B. was under an agreement not to negotiate the notes unless the company started.

The company never started, but after failing in establishing itself, passed a resolution for a voluntary winding-up. A. presented a petition asking for a winding-up by the Court.

Held, that A. could not stand in a better position with respect to the promissory notes than B.; that B. would have been restrained in equity from suing on the notes; that A. showed no case to interfere with the voluntary winding-up, and his petition must therefore be dismissed with costs.

This was a petition to have the above company wound-up by the Court.

Darby, in support of the petition.—A resolution for a voluntary winding-up has been already passed by the company, but the 145th section of the Companies Act of 1862 saves the rights of creditors to a winding-up by the Court. The company's debt to the petitioner arises from certain promissory notes which have come into the petitioner's hands for value, but after they were overdue. The respondents dispute the payment of these notes, on the ground that they were given to a promoter of the company, on condition that they should not be negotiated unless the bank started. The petitioner knew nothing of this arrangement though the bank in fact never was established. The voluntary liquidator is one of the guarantors for the payment of the preliminary expenses, and his liability therefore subsisting, he is interested in disputing the petitioner's claim; so as to lessen the number of creditors. At the time of being appointed liquidator he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and he is not a proper person therefore to be intrusted with the winding-up.

Caldecott, for the voluntary liquidator, objected that the petitioner had produced no evidence showing any necessity for superseding the voluntary winding-up, that in fact he was not a creditor of the company at all, for according to his own showing the petitioner's claim was a disputed one, which he ought to establish at law.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—This is an application to wind up a company which never had any business. It was agreed that the directors and promoters should receive 1,000*l.* if the company started, and certain notes were therefore given to two of the promoters subject however to an agreement that they should not be negotiated unless the company started. These notes never were negotiated, and the promoters swear that they returned them, but in the course of certain transactions some of the notes were transferred to the petitioner. The promoter who received such notes would have been restrained in equity from suing on them, and the petitioner received them after they were overdue, and says that he made inquiries but could get no information about them.

The petitioner taking the notes overdue as he did, can stand in no better position than the promoter who received them, and has not in my opinion shewn any cause for interference with the voluntary winding up. The petition is dismissed with costs.

ROMILLY, M.R., April 28, May 4, 7, 1886.

In re GREAT NORTHERN COPPER MINING COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 705.

Petition—Winding-up order—Opinion of shareholders—Costs.

COMPANY. M.—If, on a petition for winding-up a company, the Court is of opinion that the circumstances are such that the opinion of the shareholders ought to be obtained, and such opinion, when obtained, is to the effect that there should be no winding-up, the Court, if satisfied that such is the bona fide opinion of the shareholders, will consider itself bound thereby.

Therefore, such a petition having been ordered to stand over for the wish of the shareholders to be ascertained, and the shareholders expressing a bona fide desire to continue their concern, the Court dismissed the petition; but, being of opinion that the petitioner had a bona fide case at the time of presenting the petition, dismissed it without costs.

This was a petition to wind up the above company.

The company had been formed for the purpose of carrying on a mining business. It was a perfectly bona fide concern in its institution, but for some time past it had not obtained any ore from the mines which the company was formed to work. The matter had been before the Court before, and had stood over on a suggestion made by the Court, that the opinion of the shareholders should be taken as to whether the company should be wound up, or should continue, the officers of the company, undertaking meanwhile not to take their salaries so as to diminish the assets of the company. (10 S. J. 309). The works had been stopped for the time by a resolution of the company. The shareholders had in accordance with the suggestion of the Court held a meeting, and had at such meeting come to a resolution that the business should be continued.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Brooksbank, for the petition.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—As the matter stood over in order that the opinion of the shareholders should be taken, if I find that a bona fide expression of the shareholders as to the continuance of the undertaking has been obtained, I shall consider myself bound by that opinion.

Brooksbank.—If the circumstances are such as in the opinion of the Court to justify a winding up order, the opinion of the majority of the shareholders is utterly unimportant. [The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—My impression is that the petitioner's case was a bona fide one. The question on which I must however determine this petition is, whether or not the expressed desire of the shareholders to carry on the business is bona fide.]

Jessel, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for the company, opposed the petition, and contended that the petition was a mere speculation got up by the petitioners for the purpose of getting the costs of the petition.

His Lordship, in the course of the argument, decided that he would make no order on the petition, but would simply deal with the question of costs.

Southgate, Q.C., in reply on the question of costs.—This is not a sham petition. The petitioner has endeavoured to obtain the opinion of the shareholders, and holds proxies to a large amount. He has endeavoured to obtain from the shareholders an expression of their opinion, and from many he has received an expression of their desire to have it wound up. There is nothing to justify the attack made upon him.

Bush, and Jenner, for other shareholders, against the petition.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—This petition stood over for the purpose of ascertaining the wishes of the shareholders. It is a case in which the shareholders ought to have an opportunity of determining what should be done to realise the company's property, and whether or not the concern should be carried on. The shareholders have met, and determined to carry on the concern. On the evidence it appears that the meeting has been fairly held, and considering the fact that there are no debts of the concern unpaid, it cannot be said that the conclusion the shareholders have come to is a wrong one. The petition is dismissed; it appears, however, on the evidence that at the time the petition was presented there was a proper case for a petition, and it will therefore be dismissed without costs.

ROMILLY, M.R., May 22, 1866.

BARONESS HERBERT v. SALISBURY AND YEOVIL RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 706; L. R. 2 Eq. 221; 14 L. T. 507.

Purchaser—Specific performance—Rate of interest—Penalty.

PENALTY.—A purchaser contracted after a fixed day to pay 4l. per cent. on unpaid purchase-money, and after another fixed day to pay 8l. per cent.:—Held, that such contract was not in the nature of a penalty, and would be enforced in equity.

This was a suit for specific performance of agreements entered into by the defendant company for the purchase of certain lands belonging to the late Lord Pembroke. There was no dispute as to the facts as set out by the bill, which were shortly as follows:—

The late Lord Pembroke was seised of part of the land the subject of the suit, as tenant for life under a settlement, and part as tenant in tail made, with reversion to the Crown.

The Act authorising the Salisbury and Yeovil Railway was passed in 1854, and, subsequently thereto, agreements were entered into between Lord Pembroke and the railway company for the purchase by the company of the said land, by which it was stipulated that all the lands to be taken by the company should be considered as comprised in the settlement, except such (if any) as the earl's solicitor should state to be lands the reversion to which was in the Crown. That the title should be absolutely accepted as to the whole of the lands to be taken, and that the purchase-money for the lands granted by the Crown should be paid into Court, and that for the lands in settlement should be paid to the trustees of the settlement before July 1st, 1858, and that from that day interest at 4l. per cent. should be paid on so much of the purchase-money as remained unpaid; but that if payment should be delayed beyond January 1st, 1859, interest at the rate of 8l. per cent. on the purchase-money should be paid from that day until the day of payment.

Delay was afterwards occasioned by disagreement as to quantity of acreage, and by difficulty of distinguishing the Crown lands and the settled lands which were required to be conveyed by separate instruments.

No steps were taken by the defendants to relieve themselves from this liability to the higher rate of interest by paying the purchase-money into court.

A compromise as to the disputed points was entered into in September, 1864, but the defendants refused to pay interest at the rate of 8l. per cent. as stipulated by the agreement.

The bill prayed specific performance, and that interest might be paid on the purchase-money at the rate of 8l. per cent. from the 1st January, 1859, and that such interest might be declared to be a charge or lien upon the purchased premises.

Baggallay, Q.C., and C. Hall, for the plaintiffs, cited Esdaile v. Stevenson (1 Sim. & Stu. 122); Lord Palmerston v. Turner (33 Beav. 524); Williams v. Glenton (1 L. R. Eq. 200); De Visme v. De Visme (1 M. & G. 836).

Townsend (Selwyn, Q.C., with him).—The delay was all on the part of the vendors, who neglected to distinguish the lands granted by the Crown from those in settlement, and they ought not to make profit of their own default. [LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—You might at any time have applied to me, and paid the money into court.] The question is not, as in De Visme v. De Visme and other cases cited, whether we are to pay interest at all, but whether we are to pay the higher rate of interest, which the Court will view as a penalty, and will relieve against as in the case of a mortgage. He cited: Lady Holles v. Wise (2 Vern. 289); Strode v. Parker (2 Vern. 316); Nicholls v. Maynard (3 Atk. 519); Walmesley v. Booth (3 Ch. Rep. 481).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I agree that the case of De Visme v. De Visme, and other similar cases, have no application here, for the question is not whether interest shall be paid at all, but whether 8l. per cent. is a penal rate of interest such as this Court will relieve against. If a man enters into a contract with his eyes open to pay a high rate of interest definitely and unconditionally, he cannot afterwards complain of the hardness of the contract, nor does it matter whether there is, as in this case, an ascending scale of interest. This is quite different from a covenant to pay a higher rate of interest if the lower rate is not paid punctually. The stipulation to pay 8l. per cent. was an essential term of the contract, and not in the nature of a penalty, and no fraud having been proved there must be a decree for specific performance according to the terms of the contract.

Wood, V.C., May 2, 1866.

GASKIN v. ROGERS.

14 W. R. 707; L. R. 2 Eq. 284.

Will—Construction—“Penalty legatees.”

WILL.—Where a testator has impressed a particular sense of his own on the expression “pecuniary legatees,” annuitants under the will do not fall within the meaning of that expression.

Further consideration.

The principal question was whether, under a residuary gift to persons taking “pecuniary legacies” under the will of the testator in the cause, annuitants could take. The testator after directing that his trustees should pay his “debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the life annuities hereby given as the same shall become due, and in the next place pay the several pecuniary legacies hereinbefore given,” and directing a certain accumulation; directed that after the expiration of the term of accumulation and the termination of certain annuities, the accumulated fund should be divided amongst and paid to “the several persons including the executors of my will herein named and charitable institutions, taking pecuniary legacies under which denomination legacies of government stock or funds are intended to be included of the amount or value of 50l. each or upwards, under this my will, or any codicil I may hereafter make to the same, including servants entitled to legacies of accumulative nature depending on length of service in cases wherein the accumulated amount or value at the time of my death shall be or exceed 50l.; but excluding persons taking legacies as to which express provision has been or shall be made by me to the contrary, rateably and in proportion to the amount or value of their respective original legacies, the legacies of 3l. per Cent. Annuities being for this purpose estimated and valued at par, without regard to the actual market price or value thereof."

The testator made a codicil to his will, written in the margin of it, and by the side of an erasure of a clause in the will, which had directed that annuitants were not to share in the residue. The codicil directed that the words erased should be treated as cancelled. It was attested by a legatee and annuitant under the will.

Gifford, Q.C., Rolt, Q.C., Amphlett, Q.C., Daniell, Q.C., Cotterell, Speed, Dickinson, and E. K. Karlake, for various parties interested in the exclusion of the annuitants, contended that the testator intended to exclude annuitants.

Bristowe for the charities; Osborne, Q.C., and C. O. Boys for the personal representatives of the legatee and annuitant who had attested the codicil, cited Gurney v. Gurney (3 Drew. 208).

Rodwell and F. Vaughan Hawkins for other parties.

WOOD, V.C., said there was no doubt on the construction of the will and codicil that the annuitants took nothing under the residuary gift. The term "pecuniary legatees" would have no effect, primâ facie, in excluding annuitants; but this rule must give way to the cardinal rule of giving effect to the testator's intention as expressed in his will. Taking the whole will irrespective of the passage erased, the ambiguity would be removed. (His Honour read the gift of the residue, commenting on the distinction between "pecuniary legacies" and "life annuities" in the will.) The testator had impressed a particular sense of his own on the word "pecuniary legacies." Having no more than this, we could have no doubt but that the annuitants were intended to be included. Let us now introduce the clause struck out (His Honour read the clause). This was not making an exception out of a class which he had before included, but it stated the intention to include them. It was a monstrous construction to suppose that by striking out the words the testator meant to give the annuitants a share.

With regard to the attesting witness, His Honour held that the case before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley (Gurney v. Gurney loc. cit.) had no application. There the residue was well vested in the witness by the will, subject to charges, and on condition of surviving the period of distribution.

His Honour made a decree in accordance with these views, excluding the annuitants and the attesting witness from sharing in this residue.

Allotment of shares—Contributory—Shareholders—Winding-up.

COMPANY. C.M.—Where a man had paid a deposit on application for shares in a company, but the shares were never allotted:—Held, that he could not be placed on the list of contributories.

For allotment it is not sufficient to place a man's name on the list of shareholders if he is not placed upon the registered list within a reasonable time after application for shares.

This was an application to have the name of W. P. Hawkins struck off the list of contributories to the winding up of the Chesterfield and Midland Colliery Company.

The Company was established in 1861, and the prospectus stated that a deposit of 10s. per share was to be made on application. If 2,000 shares were not subscribed for the deposit would be returned. The shares were 5l. each. The applicant applied for 50 shares on the 3rd of September, 1861. On the 20th of December, 1861, the directors passed a resolution that a sufficient number of applications had been made, and proceeded to allot shares. Hawkins' name did not appear in its proper place in the list of directors made out, and he never had any notice of allotment. The directors made out the list for the registry of shareholders for 1862 without including his name. It appeared, however, in the list for 1863. He had refused to pay the call on allotment.

T. A. Roberts, for the official liquidator, said that it was for Hawkins to show why his name should be struck out.

Roxburgh, for Hawkins, contended that it did not appear that the necessary 4,000 shares had been subscribed for at the time of the allotment, and that Hawkins was not registered as a shareholder within the proper time. He referred to the case of the Ramsgate Victoria Hotel Company v. Montefiore (14 W. R. 335; 1 L. R. Ex. 109). No calls were ever paid by Hawkins.

T. A. Roberts, in reply, read some letters which passed between the secretary to the company and Hawkins, tending to show an intention to allot, and referred to the ledgers of the company to show that his name appeared all through.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—If there had been an allotment made I should have made him a contributory. But no allotment ever was made to him. No letter ever was written to show that he was a shareholder. They call upon him to pay his allotment call, and then acquiesce in his non-payment of it. The books of the company are evidence, but they do not show that his name was put down in the list in due time. I will not give costs in this case.

Re BARNED'S BANKING COMPANY.

Petition for winding-up—Question whether compulsory or voluntary—Order.

COMPANY. M.—In the month of June, in the year 1865, a company purchased a banking business for about 150,000l. In the month of April, 1866, the company failed, with liabilities estimated at about three and a-half millions. Some creditors of the company presented a petition for a compulsory winding-up. The company itself presented a petition for a voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the Court. The petition for the compulsory winding-up came on to be heard before the petition for the voluntary winding-up under supervision.

The Court ordered a compulsory winding-up without waiting till the other petition would be heard. Where a company has failed under such circumstances, the shareholders ought to have every opportunity of ascertaining the cause of failure. This is better done by means of official liquidators.

This was a petition for the compulsory winding-up of the above company. The company commenced business in the month of June, 1865, having purchased the business of a banking firm in Liverpool for about 150,000*l.* In the month of February, 1866, the directors presented a report to the shareholders representing the prospects of the company as most favourable, and recommending the declaration of a dividend. In April, 1866, the company suspended payment, with liabilities estimated at about 3,000,000*l.* The company had itself at a meeting held on the 1st of May passed a resolution for a voluntary winding-up. The liabilities of the company appeared at such meeting to be greater by half-a-million of money than they appeared to be by the balance-sheet attached to the report.

The petition, which was presented by the Bank of England, was presented on the 20th of April.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Cotton, in support of the petition, stated the facts, and said it was urged on the other side that there had been a resolution for a voluntary winding-up, and therefore there ought not to be a compulsory order. What the petitioners desired was that the business should not be conducted by persons who might be improperly biassed, and that nothing should be done without the sanction of the Court. By section 84 of the Companies' Act, 1862, the winding-up commences from the presentation of the petition. If, therefore, a creditor makes a proper case by petition for winding-up the company, nothing that has been done in the interim between the presentation and hearing of the petition, can affect the creditors' right to a winding-up order. A bankrupt might as well say, "I would rather manage my own affairs," and therefore be allowed to do so.

Baggallay, Q.C., Jessel, Q.C., and Kekewich, for other parties, also supported the petition.

Southgate, Q.C., and Robinson, for the company, opposed.—With regard to many of the liabilities arising from bills, the company are not the persons primarily liable, but are only liable as indorsers. There is another petition, by the company, for a voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the Court, which cannot come on before next term. This petition should not have been forced on before that presented by the company. [LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The ground on which this petition was permitted to come on at this time was the unexpected withdrawal of other petitioners, whose petition would have come on earlier in the regular course.] The petitioners have not stated the amount of their security, and although they are large creditors, still they may be amply secured. A large number of creditors who attended the meeting of the company are in favour of the voluntary winding-up under supervision. There is no question here but that the assets are very considerable, and the sole question is in what manner the company shall be wound up. That question ought to be decided on the hearing of the petition presented by the company.

The General Rolling Stock Company (Limited) (34 Beav. 314); Isle of Wight Ferry Company (2 H. & M. 597), were cited.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—A compulsory winding-up order ought to be made in this case. Nothing could be gained by the petition standing over, even if, in the view of the meeting of the 1st of May, a voluntary winding-up was thought desirable. It is most desirable that immediate steps should be taken to realise the assets of the company. This can be better done by official than provisional liquidators. Moreover, better security can be obtained from the former than the latter, and the Court is bound in these cases, where the amount coming into the hands of the liquidators is so large, to see that ample security is provided. In one case that came before me the amount actually in the hands of the liquidator before he came to pass his periodical accounts was double, or more than double the amount of security given by him. In the event, therefore, of any grave defalcation, which fortunately has not yet happened, the members of the companies who guarantee liquidators, often to large amounts, would be seriously involved. This is not the case of an old establishment having failed, when it might be advantageous to allow the winding-up to be, to a certain extent, conducted by those who had been for years connected with it.

There can be a more searching inquiry into, and more complete disclosure of, the affairs of a company when wound up compulsorily. The career of this undertaking is startling. In June, 1865, the sale of the bank business to the company took place. In April of the following year it fails, with liabilities to the extent of 3,800,000*l*. The creditors ought to be put in the best position possible to obtain the fullest information as to everything connected with this company, and the causes which led to such a disastrous issue. The order must be for a compulsory winding-up.

WEBB v. HUNT.

14 W. R. 725.

Injunction—Light and air—Degree of injury—Sky area.

EASEMENTS AND PRESCRIPTION.—W., residing near Fenchurch Street, London, had ancient windows looking into an archway and passage passing under part of his house towards the rear, and also a skylight near a cottage belonging to Messrs. H., who pulled down the cottage and commenced a building intended to be very lofty, immediately facing the end of the archway passage. On a written notice from W. they desisted, but seven months after, when the Courts were not sitting, suddenly recommenced, and carried up the wall to a great height before a bill could be filed or an interim order for an injunction obtained, which was done as soon as possible, to restrain raising any buildings so as to obstruct the plaintiff's light and air, and the enjoyment of his ancient lights, and for damages:—Held, on the evidence at the hearing, and measurement of sky area, that the plaintiff was entitled to damages.

This case came on for the Hearing.

The bill was filed by Richard Francis Webb against Robert Holdsworth Carew Hunt, Thomas Turnbull, and Holdsworth Hunt, to restrain them, their agents, servants, and workmen, from raising, or permitting, or continuing to remain raised, the height of certain new buildings then erecting above the height of the old buildings standing on the defendant's land; or above the height of a certain ware-room, or nearer than a certain cottage stood prior to the alterations so commenced by the defendants; and from erecting, or allowing to continue erected any building or buildings of the defendants which might obstruct, darken, or prejudicially affect the ancient lights, or the access of air, to the enjoyment of which the plaintiff was entitled; and from constructing or allowing to remain constructed in these said new buildings any window which might overlook the plaintiff's premises; and that they might pay such costs and damages as the Court might award, and the costs of suit.

The plaintiff was the lessee of a house No. 9, Coopers Row, Allhallows, Fenchurch Street, for seventeen years' lease unexpired, dated in March, 1861, from St. John's College, Oxford, the defendants being the owners and occupiers of large buildings eighty feet high to the north and east, that is at the back of his premises. The defendant's premises were approached by an archway ten feet six inches wide under part of the plaintiff's house, and for more than twenty years the road leading backwards, and being a continuation of the archway, had not been built upon nor obstructed for 60 ft. and upwards. Beyond this stood a cottage belonging to the defendant of the variable height of 21 to 26 ft., and by the side of it, and opposite to the back of the rest of the plaintiff's house, a ware-room 24 ft. high. The plaintiff's house was generally 20 ft. or more distant from the cottage and ware-room, although a one-storied room belonging to him approached within 6 ft. of the ware-room, and was lighted by a skylight. The plaintiff was a wine merchant and picture dealer, and the bill alleged that the light obtained through the skylight of the one-storied room was of large amount and essential to his business, and that he and his predecessors for twenty years had enjoyed free access of light and air, except as obstructed by the cottage and ware-room. In October, 1864, the defendants pulled down the cottage, and began to erect large buildings, which completely blocked up the road beyond and being a continuation of the archway, and touched the east wall of the ware-room. The plaintiff ascertained that the intention was to raise the new buildings to a height far exceeding the old ones, and Messrs. Young & Son, his solicitors (by his direction), on the 22nd October, gave the defendants and their architect notice in writing requiring them not to raise the new buildings so as to obstruct his light, and threatening proceedings in chancery. On the receipt of this notice the building operations were suspended, but on the 15th May, 1865, the building was recommenced and carried on with such dispatch that before the bill could be filed an interim order for the injunction obtained (which was done immediately), the wall was raised to 45 ft., and the defendants threatened to raise it to the height of 70 ft.

The bill then charged injury, and that the one-storied show-room would be rendered almost useless, and prayed for an injunction and damages. Evidence was produced in support of the plaintiff's case, both by himself and his undertenants, a sack manufacturer and a wine merchant; and it was also alleged that an old gentleman in bad health, who also was a tenant, had been obliged to leave in consequence of the building; but this was denied, as also the obstruction and injury. It was stated that the defendant had purchased the plaintiff's premises, and that a railway company had given notice to take the whole property.

Baily, Q.C., and Andrew Thomson, for the plaintiff.

Glasse, Q.C., and Cecil Russell, for the defendants.

R. 538); Robson v. Whittingham (14 W. R. 291).

May 8.—KINDERSLEY, V.C. (after stating the facts).—The position of the plaintiff's house is peculiar, and his ancient windows look out into the archway, down which the only light from the sky comes, that is a strip from the zenith to the horizon; and I do not propose to refer to any other windows; but there is a skylight in the roof sloping south. This strip of sky therefore came to the windows at an angle of about twenty-seven degrees with the horizon, and that was the principal light. From the defendants' proceedings in May, 1865, it is impossible to doubt that they intended to get the building completed as soon as possible, and it is remarkable that they chose a time when the Courts were not sitting, and the plaintiff was obliged to send down into the country to me to get an interim order, and they thus outstripped the plaintiff's solicitor and draftsman. This is a case in which, it appears to me, supposing there is sufficient injury, the Court will give damages. The defendants' new building immediately faces the passage from which the plaintiff's windows get light, and cuts off about thirty or thirty-three degrees, and the proportion which that bears to the total area of sky which the plaintiff previously had it is difficult to ascertain, but having regard to the measurement, it is clear that it does materially interfere with the light of the windows and the skylight. As to the evidence, there is, as usual, a conflict, and whether the plaintiff's pictures would be better or worse for a good light I do not know; but he swears that the light is materially interfered with. As to their invalid lodger, I do not think it is established that he left in consequence of the diminution of light; nor can I place any reliance upon the scientific evidence, which is mere discussion of probabilities à priori. But, having regard to the evidence and measurements, I think the plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that he ought to be compensated by damages, with the usual reference; the defendants to pay the costs, including the costs of the motion.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 726.

Railway Company—Deviation—Nuisance to the public.

RAILWAY.—Where a railway company, keeping within their powers of deviation, deviate from their deposited plans in such a way as to arouse an apprehension, which was not aroused by the deposited plans, that great inconvenience and risk will be caused to the public, yet they will not be restrained by injunction if the information or bill against them does not charge them with capriciously using their powers of deviation, and if no evidence is given to show that, granting the deviation, the line could be constructed in such a way as to allay the aroused apprehension.

Motion for decree.

This was an information and bill against the Great Western Railway Company. The information was filed at the relation of the Clerk to the Local Board of Health for the hamlet of Smethwick, in the parish of Harborne, in the county of Stafford; and the bill by the same clerk as plaintiff. The informant and plaintiff prayed that the defendants, their servants, &c., might be restrained from constructing, or causing or permitting to be constructed, a certain bridge carrying a public roadway in Smethwick, called Roebuck Lane, over their railway so and in such manner that the level of the said Roebuck Lane should or might be raised more than four feet higher than its former level.

Roebuck Lane was one of the principal thoroughfares of Smethwick, and was also the main thoroughfare between Smethwick and West Bromwich. A very large amount of traffic, consisting to a great extent of waggons carrying loads of ironwork of enormous weight, was in the constant habit of passing along it.

It was alleged by the information and bill that the result of the construction of the railway in the manner now intended by the defendants, would be serious inconvenience and risk to the persons engaged in the traffic along Roebuck Lane, in consequence of the fact that near the proposed bridge or viaduct which was to carry Roebuck Lane over the railway, Roebuck Lane makes a considerable curve, and then passes over a canal by a narrow and inconvenient bridge. Had the defendants kept to their deposited plans and sections, the incline of Roebuck Lane from the viaduct would have terminated before reaching the canal bridge. Now, however, the canal bridge would about bisect the incline, and serious consequences might be apprehended from the enormous loads of iron, &c., having to go down and make a sharp turn close by the canal bridge.

The information and bill contained some allegations, which his Honour thought were not proved, as to an express agreement between the local board and the defendants, that the latter were not to raise the roadway of Roebuck Lane more than four feet above its former level.

Amphlett, Q.C., and Eddis, for the informant and plaintiff, argued that, admitting that the defendants had power to do the acts complained of, yet they ought to be compelled to construct their line with as little inconvenience to the public as possible. They cited Manser v. Northern and Eastern Counties Railway Company (2 R. Cas. 380).

Rolt, Q.C., and T. Stevens, for the defendants, cited The Queen v. East and West India Docks and Birmingham Junction Railway Company (1 W. R. 409; 2 El. & Bl. 466), and Coats v. The Clarence Railway Company (1 R. & M. 181).

WOOD, V.C., said that there was nothing in the information and bill about the company's having capriciously used or exceeded their powers. The Company clearly had power to make the deviation, which they said caused them to raise the level of the road. There was no evidence to show that if the deviation was made, the line could be constructed in any better way than that proposed by the company. The information and bill must be dismissed with costs.

Will—Construction—Changing words.

WILL.—A testator bequeathed personalty in trust for his wife for life, and after her death to be divided between his brothers and sisters; and he declared that in any case any or either of his brothers or sisters should die in his lifetime, and before they should have received any benefit from the bequest, then the share of him or her so dying should go over.

The Court refused to change the word "and" into "or," but held the second clause of the declaration to be explanatory of the first.

This was a petition under the Trustee Act.

James Kirkbride, by his will, dated January 14th, 1846, bequeathed his residuary personalty to his executors, upon trust to invest and pay the produce to his wife Jane Kirkbride for life, and after her death upon trust to pay and divide the principal unto and between his brothers, Jonathan Kirkbride, John Kirkbride, and his sisters, Margaret Cameron, and Mary Liddle, in equal shares. The testator then proceeded as follows:—"My will is, that in case any or either of them the said Jonathan Kirkbride, John Kirkbride, Margaret Cameron, and Martha Liddle shall die in my lifetime, and before they shall have received any benefit from the aforesaid bequest, then the share of him or her so dying shall go to and be divided equally between and amongst his or her respective children, if more than one, share and share alike, and if but one then to such one."

The testator died on the 19th of August, 1852, leaving his wife, and all his said brothers and sisters him surviving.

The testator's brother John Kirkbride was the only one of the legatees who died before the testator's wife. He died in 1854. The testator's wife died in 1863.

After the death of the testator's wife, the executors, having realized the estate, paid the shares of Jonathan and Martha to them respectively, and accounted for the share of Margaret, who had died in the meantime, with her personal representatives. A dispute having arisen about John's share, they paid it into Court. The present petition was presented for the payment of such share.

The testator's brother John left seven children, four sons and three daughters, viz.:—James the younger (since deceased), Isaac, John the younger, William, Jane wife of Richard Highmoor, Margaret wife of John Story, and Elizabeth Byers (since deceased).

The testator's brother John, by his will, left his residuary personalty to his four sons in equal shares. Isaac and John the younger had been partners in business, but were now bankrupts.

The petition was presented by the two surviving daughters of John and their husbands, the personal representatives of the deceased daughter, and Isaac; and it prayed that the fund in Court, after payment thereof of costs, &c., might be divided into seven equal parts, and severally paid to the surviving children of John, the representatives of such as were dead, and the assignee of the two bankrupts.

Willcock, Q.C., and Brodrick, for the petitioners, contended that the testator had contemplated more contingencies than one, viz.—(1) the death of any of his brothers and sisters in his own lifetime; and (2) the death of any of them in the lifetime of the tenant for life, and, therefore, before receiving any benefit from the bequest. The word "and," then, must be read "or" in the expression "die in my lifetime and before receiving, &c." If the literal sense be kept to, the second portion of the sentence would be silenced. They cited 1 Jarm. on Wills, 483; Maberly v. Strode (3 Ves. 450); Bell v. Phyn (7 Ves. 458); Mackenzie v. King (12 Jur. 787).

Babington for the representatives of James the younger and William. The second clause explains the first, and is equivalent to, "and consequently before receiving any benefit, &c." The brothers and sisters took a vested interest, and, therefore, by surviving the testator only they would receive some benefit, for they could alien their reversions.

Bagshawe for the creditors' assignee of Isaac and John the younger.—The Court will not read "or" for "and" if the consequence will be a divesting of a vested interest: See 1 Jarm. on Wills, 484; Day v. King (Kay, 708). If "and" be read "or," then the first clause of the sentence is reduced to silence.

Willcock, Q.C., in reply.

Wood, V.C., said that it would be best to adhere to the language of the will. This was, however, a case very near the line where alterations were made to suit the supposed intention of the testator. It had been urged that "and" should be read "or," because, if it were not, then the second clause of the sentence would be identical with the former. But if "and" were read "or," then besides the difficulty arising from the fact that the operation of changing words would be gone through for the purpose of divesting a vested legacy, further difficulties would arise. For if the disjunctive were taken, then the second clause might mean either (1) dying in the lifetime of the tenant for life, or if it be taken more strictly, (2) dying before the actual receipt of the legacy. That the latter construction should be the right one was against Lord Thurlow's condemnation of "an immeasurable intent." If the former were the right one the testator could easily have described it simpliciter. The reasonable construction was that the second clause explained the first. If the Court did change "and" into "or" for the purpose of avoiding the surplusage arising from the second clause of the sentence being silent, there would then be a new surplusage, for the first clause would be silent. And if the Court did make the change it would then place itself in the difficult position of being obliged to conjecture the meaning of the words "before they shall have received," &c.

There must, therefore, be a declaration that the legacy to John vested in him absolutely on the death of the testator.

WOOD, V.C., April 21, 1866.

In re MANIFOLD'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS.

14 W. R. 729.

Settlement—Construction—Interest upon interest—Absence of express power to accumulate.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—A settlor assigned certain mortgages and "all interest thereon then due and payable, and thereafter to accrue and become due and payable" unto trustees for the equal benefit of his two infant granddaughters. The trusts as to one moiety were that, when one of the granddaughters attained twenty-one, the trustees were to pay the rents, interest, and annual produce of such moiety of the said principal moneys, interest, and securities to her for life; the moiety after her death to be in trust for her children, if any. There was no express provision for either accumulation or maintenance during the granddaughter's minority; but there was a power of maintenance during the minority of her possible children. In default of children, after her decease the moiety of "the said principal sums, securities, and premises" was to go over to the petitioner.

The trustees accumulated and invested the produce of her moiety during her minority; and after she had attained her majority they paid her the interest of the invested accumulations, together with that of her moiety of the principal sums until her death. She died without having been married.

It was held that the accumulated sum formed part of the principal of her moiety, and went over to the petitioner under the trust in his favour declared in the settlement.

This was a petition for the payment of a sum of money out of Court.

The facts were as follows:—

James Manifold, by an indenture of settlement, dated March 2nd, 1837, after reciting that in consideration of the natural love and affection which he had for his two granddaughters, Ann Orford and Elizabeth Orford, he had determined to assign the several principal sums of money then due and owing to him upon the mortgages and securities thereafter referred to, and the interest thereof, unto trustees for the benefit of his said granddaughters, assigned the same and "all interest then due and payable, and thereafter to accrue and become due and payable" for and in respect of the said sums respectively, and the securities, &c., unto trustees, upon certain trusts, for the benefit of his said granddaughters.

At the date of the settlement both the granddaughters were infants, Elizabeth being only fifteen years of age. The sum in court arose out of Elizabeth's share of the trust funds. Her share being settled by reference to Ann's share, in the following extract from the trust in her favour, Ann's name has been changed to Elizabeth's. The words of the material part of the trust were as follows:—"Upon trust that when and so soon as the said Elizabeth Orford shall attain the age of twenty-one years, the said (trustees) shall, during the life of the said Elizabeth Orford, pay one moiety of the rents, interest, and annual produce of the said principal moneys, interest, securities, and premises into the hands of the said Elizabeth Orford, for her separate use." After her death, one moiety of the principal was to be in trust for her children (if any). Powers of maintenance were given to the trustees, after her death, for the benefit of her children during their minority; and powers of advancement out of expectant shares were given to them during her life, and with her consent. In default of children, the moiety, described in this provision as "a moiety of the said principal sums, securities, and premises," was to go to the present petitioner. The latter, who was one of the original, but not one of the present, trustees of the settlement, afterwards became the settlor's sole executor and residuary legatee.

Nothing was said in the settlement about the application of the produce of the moiety of the trust funds during Elizabeth's minority. Accordingly the trustees, who entered into possession of the settled monies immediately after the execution of the settlement, accumulated such produce until, on Elizabeth's attaining her majority, it amounted to 600*l*. They then invested that sum, and paid the interest thereof along with the interest of a moiety of the principal, unto Elizabeth during the rest of her life. She died, without having been married, in 1864, at the age of forty-two, having made a will and appointed William Orford and the petitioner her executors. The petitioner renounced probate, and the will was proved by William Orford alone.

William Orford, as Elizabeth's executor, claimed the 600*l*. as having become her absolute property on her attaining twenty-one. The petitioner claimed to be entitled to it either in his own right under the settlement or as being the sole personal representative of the settlor. In consequence of these rival claims the present trustees of the settlement paid the money into court, and the present petition was presented.

Freeling for the petitioner.—The sum in court either reverted to the settlor, or else forms part of the principal settled, or else passed to Elizabeth. The true view is that it forms part of the capital.

Little for William Orford.—The sum passed to Elizabeth. There was no provision made by the settlement for accumulating, and the trustees were not justified by it in accumulating and investing at all.

Wood, V.C., said that he thought the right construction was that the accumulation in question formed a portion of the capital. Mr. Little's remark that there was no power in the settlement for accumulating applied with greater force to the absence therefrom of a power of maintenance during Elizabeth's minority, especially when it was considered that there was such a power for the benefit of her children should she have any. Where the expression "interest upon interest" was found, there must, at all events, be some investment which was not provided for. The only question was, what interest was the settlor speaking of as producing other interest? Was it only the interest accrued due at the date of the deed? Some light was thrown upon that question by the words "all interest now due and payable and thereafter to become due and payable." Nothing was directed to be done with the trust moneys until Elizabeth attained twenty-one, when the interest of the principal and interest was to be paid to her. Looking back to see what interest the settlor was speaking of, the only interest found was interest then due and thereafter to become due. He must hold, therefore, that the interest which accrued due before the time when the trustees were directed to pay the produce to Elizabeth became part of the principal. The gift over to the petitioner being of "the principal moneys, securities, and premises," which latter word was wide enough to embrace everything, he should hold that, in the events which had occurred, the petitioner was entitled to the sum in court under the trust in his favour declared in the settlement.

ELLISON v. MCCORMICK.

14 W. R. 742.

Administration—Next of kin—Needless opposition—Costs.

WILL.—The Court will adhere to its usual practice in granting administration, unless a strong case is shewn against its doing so.

And accordingly, although charges of intemperance and misconduct were alleged against the eldest male next of kin, who represented the majority of interests, and who was the prior applicant, the Court granted administration to him in preference to a female representative of the deceased.

Margaret Perry, of Chorlton-upon-Medlock, died on February 1, 1866, intestate, a widow without child or parent, leaving two brothers, Nehemiah and William Ellison, the elder of whom, Nehemiah, was the plaintiff in this suit, and one sister Mary Ann, now the wife of the defendant William McCormick, her next of kin, and the only persons entitled to her personal estate.

Affidavits were put in on behalf of the plaintiff, stating that the younger brother William was desirous that his elder brother Nehemiah, rather than his sister Mary Ann McCormick, should have the grant of letters of administration. That the deceased had in her lifetime always expressed a wish that Nehemiah Ellison should have the management of her affairs after her death. That the estate consisted principally of a beerhouse in the management of which the plaintiff's daughter, Mary Anne Ellison, had assisted the deceased for four years previous to her death. That she was well acquainted with the customers and the requirements of the house, and that she was conducting the business. That subsequent to the death of the intestate, the defendant and his wife had endeavoured to effect the removal of the plaintiff's daughter from the beerhouse. That the defendant had in the first instance proposed a joint administration with the plaintiff, but that, on that being objected to, he had offered to consent to the grant being made to the plaintiff alone, on the terms that the plaintiff should give him a promissory note for 7*l.*, payable on demand.

The defendant's affidavits stated that the plaintiff was a person of intemperate habits, and that he would be likely to mismanage the property. These charges the plaintiff distinctly denied, and stated that he was a gate-keeper on a railway, a situation which he could not have retained had he been any other than a sober and trustworthy person.

Spinks, Dr., contended that the grant of administration should be made to Nehemiah Ellison the plaintiff, the elder surviving brother of the deceased. The Court never forces a joint administration, and where there are several next of kin the Court inclines to make the grant to the person with whom the majority of parties interested are desirous of entrusting the estate. If the interests are equal the elder brother will be preferred. The person to whom the deceased herself gave a preference, and in whom she had greater confidence, has a greater claim: Warwick v. Greville (1 Phill. 123), Coppin v. Dillon (4 Hagg. 361), Budd v. Silver (2 Phill. 115), Napper v. Napper (10 Jur. 342). A son has been preferred to a married daughter, though there were affidavits that he had improperly interfered in the estate: Chittenden v. Knight (2 Lee, 559).

Littler, contra, for the defendant, opposed the grant, on the ground that the plaintiff was an habitual drunkard, and unfit to have the control of the estate which he alleged had already suffered from the plaintiff's mismanagement.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—The grant of administration must be made to that person to whom, according to the general practice of this Court, it naturally would go. The plaintiff has a right, as the elder brother of the deceased; but that alone would not be conclusive. He also represents the majority of interests; and lastly, he is the male, whereas the party opposing is the female, representative of the deceased. On all grounds he is shewn to be the person to whom the Court would make the grant.

It is much to be deprecated that where there is a person who, according to the usual practice of this Court, is entitled to administration, there should be any opposition unless a strong case is made out against him. Here it is alleged that the plaintiff is a drunkard, and I should consider that if a charge of habitual drunkenness were established against him, it would be a sufficient reason to justify his exclusion from the grant. Here, however, it is oath against oath, as the plaintiff most positively denies the charge, and states, in support of that denial, that he is now, and has been for some time past, a gatekeeper on a railway, a position of trust and responsibility, which he reasonably urges would not be confided to him were he a person of intemperate habits, as the defendant describes him.

All the rest of the case is immaterial. It would be monstrous if, when a man is entitled to the possession of goods for the purposes of administration, the other parties entitled should, by their own acts, throw difficulties in his way and derange the conduct of the business, and then should find fault with the way in which it was carried on, and comment on the mismanagement which they themselves had caused.

The grant must go to the prior petens, the plaintiff in this suit.

Now, with regard to the costs, I consider that the opposition was needless and frivolous, and I therefore give costs against the opposition. It would be a most dangerous precedent were I not to do so. The opposition in this case was not with the object of getting administration, but was prompted by the expectation that the plaintiff would thereby be forced into accepting the terms which the opposer propounded to him.

Administration will be granted to the plaintiff, who must give justifying security to the amount of the defendant's share.

LORDS JUSTICES, Feb. 28, March 5, April 20, May 25, 1866.

WAITE v. MORLAND.

14 W. R. 746; 14 L. T. 649; 12 Jur. N.S. 763.

Will—Construction—“All my property, brewery, &c.”—Right to purchase at an undervalue—Property subject to a mortgage.

WILL.—S., who carried on the business of a brewer, by a codicil to her will, directed “that M. do, on my decease, immediately purchase all my property, brewery, &c., at one-fourth less than its value, with the proviso only that from that time and for ever, C. receives no profit from the business, and has nothing more to do with the property in any way or form whatsoever.” C. had formerly been in partnership with S. in the brewery business. Part of the property of the testatrix connected with the brewery was, at her death, subject to a mortgage:—Held, upon the construction of the codicil, coupled with the facts of the case, that M. was entitled to purchase at three-fourths of its value, not only the actual brewery and the property lying within its precincts, but also the public-houses belonging to the testatrix, and which were held by her for the purposes of her trade, the tenants thereof being bound to take their beer from her brewery. Held also, that M. was entitled to purchase the equity of redemption of the property in mortgage at three-fourths of its value, and then to take the property subject to the mortgage.

This was an appeal by the defendant, G. B. Morland, from the order made by Vice-Chancellor Wood, upon the further consideration of this cause. The case is reported on the hearing before the Vice-Chancellor in 13 W. R. 963.* In addition to the statement of facts contained in that report, it may be mentioned that the testatrix, in the year 1842, purchased from the trustees of her father's will the Abbey Brewery, at Abingdon, the plant of the brewery, some cottages within its precincts, and a large number of public-houses, partly freehold, partly copyhold, and partly leasehold, which were attached to the brewery. 15,000*l.*, part of the purchase-money for this property, was secured by the testatrix to the trustees of her father's will, by a mortgage of the freehold and copyhold premises comprised in the purchase, and was made payable by instalments. 6,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, part of this purchase-money, was remaining unpaid at the time of the death of the testatrix. The testatrix, from the time of her making this purchase, until the time of her death, carried on the business of the brewery, either alone, or in partnership with John Moses Carter (the gentleman referred to as "Mr. Carter" in the former report). In the years 1843 and 1844 the testatrix purchased two other public-houses, and in the year 1848 she took John Moses Carter into partnership with her in the brewery; and an agreement dated 19th of October, 1848, was entered into between her and John Moses Carter. In the schedule to this agreement the public-houses from the father's trustees, and the two public-houses purchased by the testatrix as above mentioned, were described as belonging to the brewery. The term of this partnership was afterwards extended by a memorandum dated the 13th of October, 1849. After the formation of this partnership, the testatrix purchased another public-house, and from that time the firm, during its continuance, paid her interest at 5 per cent. upon the purchase-money of this house, in addition to a sum of 1,400*l.* per annum, provided for by the agreement. The partnership expired on the 11th of October, 1856, and after that date the testatrix purchased several other public-houses. All the public-houses purchased by the testatrix after she had become the purchaser of the brewery, as well those purchased before as those purchased after the formation of the partnership, were purchased by her as additions to the brewery premises, and with the object of thereby increasing the trade or business of the brewery. All these public-houses, as well as those which the testatrix had purchased from the trustees of her father's will, were always employed in carrying on the business of the brewery, the tenants being bound by their agreements to take their beer from that establishment. Many of the leasehold public-houses above mentioned were held by the testatrix under the Corporation of Abingdon for terms of twenty-one years, renewable every fourteen years; and about the year 1860 the testatrix agreed with the corporation to purchase the reversion of these houses, and since the death of the testatrix, this agreement was carried into effect under an order in this cause, under which the purchase-money was paid out of the personal estate of the testatrix, without prejudice to any question. About the year 1856, the testatrix agreed with Sir G. Bowyer to take a lease of a piece of land and to build a public-house thereon. This public-house was afterwards built by her, but no written agreement was entered into, nor had any lease been actually granted.

Rolt, Q.C., J. W. Chitty, and C. H. Blake, for the appellant.

Giffard, Q.C., Willcock, Q.C., Eddis, Berkeley, and Swanston, for the different respondents.

J. W. Chitty, in reply.

* By an accidental misprint, the date of the codicil is in that report given as 20th January, 1863; it ought to be 1853.—W. L. C.

April 20.—TURNER, L.J., after stating the facts of the case, proceeded as follows:—The first and most material point to be determined upon this appeal is whether the appellant is entitled to purchase all or any of the public-houses above mentioned at three-fourths of their value; and it will be convenient first to consider this question without reference to the purchase by the testatrix from the Corporation of Abingdon, or to her agreement with Sir G. Bowyer. This question must depend upon the words and the context of the codicil. It was argued, on the part of some of the respondents, that no certain meaning can be collected from any part of this instrument, and that the whole of it ought to be held void for uncertainty. But some part of the instrument at least is clear; it is clear that the brewery, in the sense of the place in which the business was carried on, is well disposed of by the instrument; and the difficulty of determining to what further extent, if any, the instrument was intended to operate, cannot make the instrument void; and this argument, therefore, may be laid out of the case. It was also argued for the appellant that the instrument gave him the right to purchase the whole of the property of the testatrix upon the stipulated terms, and that this right on his part could not be affected by his having limited his claim to the public-houses in question; but I think that this argument, also, cannot be maintained, and that the right of purchase, given by this instrument, was intended to be, and was, limited, and not universal. To hold that the instrument gave the right to purchase the whole property upon the stipulated terms would, as it seems to me, be inconsistent with the insertion in the instrument of the words "brewery, &c.," and with the whole context of the instrument. The question, then, is, what was the limit intended by this instrument; in other words, what is the meaning of the words "all my property, brewery, &c.," construed in connection with the context. These words, no doubt, are difficult of construction, but it is to be observed that the testatrix was evidently dealing with property in which John Moses Carter individually had had some interest, and he had individually had no interest in any part of her property except that part of it which was employed in the brewery. It is to be observed, too, that the purposes of this instrument were twofold: one, to exclude John Moses Carter; the other, to give to the appellant. These circumstances satisfy my mind that, awkwardly as the words "all my property, brewery, &c.," stand in point of collocation, the true meaning of them is, "all my brewery property." It must be admitted, however, that this conclusion does not wholly solve the difficulty of the case. There is still to be considered the question whether these public-houses ought to be considered as falling within the description of brewery property, and I think that they ought to be so considered. I think so for several reasons—First, it is obvious from the facts above stated, that they were throughout so treated and considered by the testatrix. Secondly, I am satisfied that, having regard to the context of this instrument, it is too narrow a construction of the word "brewery" to treat it as applying only to the place in which the business of the brewery was carried on. The context seems to me to shew that the word "brewery" in this instrument was not used as descriptive of locality, but was used as extending and referring to the trade or business. By the terms of the instrument, J. M. Carter was to receive no profit from the business, and the public-houses in question were the source and fountain of the business. Thirdly, having regard to the two purposes of this instrument, it is, I think, reasonable to conclude that what was taken away from J. M. Carter was intended to be given to the appellant. Apart, therefore, from any question as to the purchase from the Corporation of Abingdon, and as to the agreement with Sir G. Bowyer, my opinion is that the appellant is entitled to purchase all these public-houses at three-fourths of their value, and I respectfully dissent from the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor upon this point. Then how does the case stand as to the two last-mentioned properties? There was, as I understand, a binding contract by the testatrix, in her lifetime, with the Corporation of Abingdon for the purchase of the fee of the public-houses held under leases from them, and there was also, as I think, by reason of the expenditure made by the testatrix, a contract for a lease binding upon Sir G. Bowyer, upon his admitting, as he has in fact done, the terms on which the lease was to be granted; and I think that, according to the true construction of this codicil, the appellant was entitled to purchase upon the stipulated terms, whatever property the testatrix had in connection with the brewery. It seems to me, therefore, that he is entitled to purchase these public-houses also upon those terms.

In the course of the argument before us, some question was raised on the part of the appellant with respect to the mortgage to the trustees of the father's will; but, as the appellant succeeds wholly upon the first point, I do not see what question there can be about that mortgage. I observe that the petition of appeal also raises some other points, but nothing was said upon those points in the course of the argument before us, and, if necessary, the case must be further spoken to upon those points. Assuming that my learned brother agrees with me in the conclusions at which I have arrived, this order will be so materially altered, that minutes should, I think, be prepared, and the case spoken to upon the minutes.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., concurred.

May 25.—This case now came on upon the minutes of the decree, and was argued upon the question how the mortgage debt, affecting part of the property, which the Court held that Mr. G. B. Morland was entitled to purchase at three-fourths of its value, was to be dealt with.

Rolt, Q.C., Chitty, and C. H. Blake, for G. B. Morland.—The will was made before Locke King's Act, and therefore the mortgage debt ought to be paid off out of the personal estate of the testatrix. The only two possible constructions would be either (1) that the equity of redemption should be valued, then that Mr. Morland should pay three-fourths of that value, and take the estate subject to the mortgage; (2) that the mortgage should be first paid off out of the testatrix's personal estates, and then that Mr. Morland should pay three-fourths of the gross value of the property. Suppose the estate were worth 20,000*l.*, and the mortgage debt upon it were 10,000*l.* The equity of redemption would then be worth 10,000*l.* If the first be the true construction, Morland would pay 7,500*l.*, and then take the estate subject to a debt of 10,000*l.*—that is, he would pay 17,500*l.* for an estate worth 20,000*l.* But if the second be the true construction, then the mortgage being paid off, Mr. Morland would have to pay 15,000*l.* for the estate worth 20,000*l.* It is clear that the second must be the right construction. Mr. Morland is in the position of a devisee of the property upon condition; viz., the condition of paying three-fourths of its value: Earl of Radnor v. Shafts (11 Ves. 448; Sugd. Vend. & Purch. (ed. 1839), 194).

Willcock, Q.C., Giffard, Q.C., Berkeley, and Eddis, contra.—The debt was not a personal debt of the testatrix. There is no covenant to pay it in the conveyance to her. The devisee is not entitled to have the mortgage paid off out of the personal estate. This is more properly, not a devise of the estate, but a simple right to purchase. In the will a right to purchase is given to the trustees; in the codicil a right is given to a particular trustee to purchase in a particular manner. He stands in the position of an ordinary purchaser, and must take the estate subject to all liabilities affecting it. They cited Scott v. Beecher (5 Mad. 96).

Rolt, Q.C., in reply.

TURNER, L.J., said that it was impossible to say clearly what the testatrix meant. The impression, however, on his mind was that Mr. G. B. Morland was intended to take the equity of redemption—that is, the estate as it stood. He was entitled to buy the equity of redemption at three-fourths of its value.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—The good sense of the case is so.

As to the property purchased by the Corporation of Abingdon,

Their LORDSHIPS held that Mr. G. B. Morland was entitled to purchase that at three-fourths of the value of the leasehold interest, in addition to three-fourths of the sum paid by the testatrix for the purchase of the reversion.

LORDS JUSTICES, April 27, June 1, 1866.

Ex parte RICHARDSON.

Re MOSELEY GREEN COAL AND COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 749; 14 L. T. 610; 12 Jur. N.S. 517.

Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, section 91—Clerk to official liquidator—Costs—Taxation.

COMPANY. M.—The certificate of the taxing-master as to the costs of a clerk employed by an official liquidator under section 91 of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, is subject to review by the commissioner in bankruptcy, and it is open to him to refer the reasonableness of such costs to the liquidator to report thereon, notwithstanding the fact that the taxation of those costs took place in the presence of the liquidator's solicitors.

Semble, a report of the liquidator in such a case would not be binding upon the commissioner.

The above company was formed under the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1856, and was being wound up. The official liquidator of the company employed a clerk of the name of Hutton, in the business of the winding-up. Hutton afterwards sent in a bill of costs for the work done by him. This bill was referred to the taxing-master in bankruptcy for taxation, and he, on the 30th June, 1864, taxed it at 219*l.* 2*s.* Hutton afterwards got into difficulties, and made an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, to Richardson, the present applicant. Richardson applied to the official liquidator for payment of the above sum, who objected that the charges were exorbitant, and refused to pay the amount, but offered to pay 50*l.* as a sufficient sum. Richardson then applied to Commissioner Goulburn, and he made the order now complained of, referring the matter back to the liquidator, for him to report whether the amount charged was reasonable. From this order Richardson now appealed.

De Gez, Q.C., and Reed, for the appellant, referred to section 91 of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47. The Court always acts by its officer the taxing-master. At any rate it was wrong to refer the matter back to the person liable to pay the sum in question. The bill was taxed in the presence of the liquidator's solicitors, and no complaint was made then. They cited Alsop v. Lord Oxford (1 M. & K. 564).

Bagley, for the respondent, the liquidator.—The reference was only to the commissioner's own officer, for him to report in writing. Under section 91, the commissioner himself only has power to make a final order.

TURNER, L.J., said that he thought the right course would be for this appeal to stand over. It had been assumed in the argument for the appellant that the commissioner must be guided entirely by what the liquidator might report. He, however, did not so understand the order. When the liquidator had made his report it would be open to the commissioner to act upon it, or not to act upon it, as he should think fit. He could not say that the commissioner was not authorised to consult his own officer to guide him in the view which he should take in the matter. The taxing-master's certificate must be subject to the review of the Court itself. When the commissioner had come to a final decision, the matter could, if necessary, be mentioned here again.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., said that he should have been in favour of discharging the commissioner's order; but, as his learned brother did not agree with him, this could not be done. He did not, therefore, see any advantage in dissenting from the course proposed by his learned brother.

TURNER, L.J., said that he, too, should have been in favour of discharging the order, if he had thought that the commissioner was bound to act upon the report of his own officer.

Appeal to stand over, with liberty to apply.

ROMILLY, M.R., April 25, 1866.

LAWRANCE v. BELL.

14 W. R. 753.

Covenant to pay annuity—Assignee of covenantee—Set off—Right of covenantee to proceed in equity.

ANNUITY.—A person entitled to an annuity under a deed assigned the annuity. The assignee filed a bill to recover some arrears of the annuity, the defendant, the covenantor, filed an affidavit stating that he had claims against the original covenantee more than the amount claimed by the bill:—Held, that the defendant had, by his affidavit, precluded himself from raising the point that the plaintiff's demand was merely legal, and that the plaintiff was entitled to proceed in equity, but that the defendant might set off any sums bonâ fide advanced or paid on account of the annuity previous to the notice of assignment.

This was a suit by the assignee of a certain indenture made between the defendant and one Mr. Lawrance, securing to the said Mr. Lawrance an annuity of 200l., for arrears due in respect of the annuity. The defendant, in consideration of the said Mr. Lawrance appointing him his deputy in certain offices held by him, and allowing him to receive the emolument derivable from such offices, and as in consideration of the plaintiff advancing to him a sum of money and giving up to him the occupation of the offices occupied by Mr. Lawrance as a solicitor, and assigning to him the lease thereof, covenanted to pay the said Mr. Lawrance an annuity of 200l. a-year.

Baggallay, Q.C., and E. Cook, for the plaintiff.

Freeman, for the defendant.—This is a purely legal demand and cannot be the subject of a suit in equity. There is no allegation or evidence that the covenantee in the indenture securing the annuity refuses to allow the plaintiff to sue in his name in an action at law; he has, in fact, made an affidavit on behalf of the plaintiff: Hammond v. Messenger (9 Sim. 327), Keys v. Williams (3 Y. & C. 462), Cator v. Burke (1 Br. C. C. 434).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The defendant has precluded himself from raising any such defence; by his affidavit he shows that the plaintiff cannot proceed at law. He alleges that he has made certain payments on behalf of Lawrance which he has a right to set off against any money due in respect of the annuity, and disputes the fact of anything being due. The plaintiff has a right to have the benefit of the covenant. The defendant may set off payments made by him by way of advance of the annuity at Lawrance's request between the date of the indenture and his having notice of the assignment.

LORD KENSINGTON v. METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

WILLIAMS v. THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 754.

Railway company — Contractor — Possession — Purchase-money — Offer to compromise—Costs.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Two companies employed the same solicitor and contractor:—Held, that it is no defence to a suit against one of the companies for acts done by the contractor upon the land purchased by that company, that the acts complained of were done by him in his capacity of contractor for the other company.

An injunction was sought to restrain a railway company from entering on land before payment of the purchase-money. They remained in possession three months, and then paid the purchase-money:—Held, that they must pay the costs of the suit.

COSTS.—In a suit in which the plaintiffs ultimately succeeded, an offer had been made by the defendants to submit to a decree, on the basis of each party paying their own costs, which was simply refused:—Held, that each party must pay the costs subsequent to the offer, for it was open to the plaintiffs to propose to vary the terms offered by adding a provision for the payment of costs by the defendants.

The bills in these suits were filed to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering upon some land belonging to Lord Kensington, of which the plaintiff in the second suit was the occupying tenant.

The District Railway Company had purchased from Lord Kensington, for the sum of 75,000*l.*, a piece of land adjoining that in question in the present suits. The Metropolitan Company had agreed to purchase from Lord Kensington the property in question for the sum of 27,000*l.*, and as far as he was concerned, they only needed to deposit the purchase-money in order to entitle them to possession.

Messrs. Burchell were the solicitors, and Messrs. Peto & Co. the contractors for both railway companies. The District Company deposited their purchase-money, and Messrs. Burchell wrote to the contractors directing them to enter upon the land for the purpose of constructing the railway. Upon this, on the 13th of October, 1865, the contractors took possession, not only of the land sold to the District Company, but also of that sold to the Metropolitan Company. This entry, as far as the Metropolitan Company was concerned, was stated by Messrs. Burchell to have been a mistake; but as the contractors still remained in possession, without depositing the purchase-money due to Lord Kensington, or purchasing the interest of the plaintiff Williams therein, the plaintiffs, on the 9th of November, 1865, filed their bills for injunction, as above stated.

On the 16th November, 1865, motions for injunction were made, and were turned into motions for decree on an undertaking by the defendants not to enter. They continued, however, in possession till the month of January, 1866, when they deposited Lord Kensington's purchase-money, and made an arrangement with the plaintiff Williams.

On the 28th of February, 1866, they proposed to settle the suits on the basis of each party paying his own costs, to which the plaintiffs declined to accede.

The causes now came on for hearing.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Eddis, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants were not entitled to possession till payment of the purchase-money. They had, however, entered and carried on the works of the railway three months before payment, by this means gaining three months' use of the land.

Jessel, Q.C., and Bovill, for the defendant.—The entry was entirely an accident, and was wholly the fault of the contractors. The contractors ought to have been made parties. The acts of the contractors do not bind the company, except by express authority. The letter authorising the entry is headed "Re District Company." The acts of the solicitors and contractors were done solely in their capacity of solicitors and contractors for the District Company. They cited Reedie v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (4 Exch. 244), and Allen v. Hayward (7 Q.B. 960).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The distinction between the contractors as contractors for the different companies is untenable. The only question will be whether the plaintiffs are entitled to costs.

Selwyn, Q.C., in reply.—Everything done upon the land must have been done for the benefit of the Metropolitan Company. The District Company could not possibly have had any business there.

May 28.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The plaintiff in the first suit agreed to sell six acres of land for 27,000*l.* Possession was not to be taken till the money was paid. Messrs. Peto, however, entered into possession on the 24th of October, 1865, and began to dig for the purpose of carrying on their works. On the 31st of October the plaintiffs' solicitor wrote to Messrs. Burchell, informing them of the entry. Messrs. Burchell, in reply, stated that the entry was not by their authority, but did not inform the plaintiffs' solicitor that they had directed Messrs. Peto to retire from the land, and when they did so direct them Messrs. Peto disregarded the notice, and continued in occupation. Accordingly, on the 3rd of November, the plaintiffs filed their bills. I am of opinion that the conduct of the defendants was such as to mystify and mislead the plaintiffs. The defendants rely on the fact that the contractors entered without the authority of the Metropolitan Company. Messrs. Peto, however, remained in possession of the property for three months before the purchase-money was paid, and when Messrs. Burchell sent notice to the contractors to withdraw, they did not specify the land from which they were to withdraw, and the contractors remained in possession, and now seek to shelter themselves by saying that it was a mistake. They attempted also to raise a question, which they afterwards abandoned, as to the identity of the land. If this question had not been raised, and the solicitors had really endeavoured to make Messrs. Peto withdraw, they might have raised their defence more properly.

I am of opinion that the defendants have been in the wrong, and must pay all the costs up to the 28th of February, 1866. If they had then made an offer to settle and pay all the costs, I should have given them costs now, but their offer only extended to the payment of their own costs. I think, however, that the plaintiff might have suggested the condition of payment of all the costs by the defendant. I am of opinion that I can give no costs after that day.

In Williams' case there will be no costs at all.

COOPER v. MACDONALD.

14 W. R. 755.

Power to appoint new trustees—Trustees appointed by the Court.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—A power to appoint new trustees was to the survivors and survivor. Trustees had, on a former occasion, been appointed by the Court:—Held, that the power was gone, and new trustees must be appointed by the Court.

This was an application for the appointment of new trustees of a will.

The will contained a power for the survivors and survivor of the trustees therein named, their or his assigns, to appoint new trustees (subject to certain consents not material to the question raised), the original number being three. New trustees had been appointed by the Court on a former occasion. There were now two of these last trustees, and the question was whether a new trustee should be appointed by them or by the Court, or whether no new trustee at all should be appointed.

Southgate, Q.C., Selwyn, Q.C., Baggallay, Q.C., Beavan, Everett, and Speed, appeared for the various parties.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The power was to the survivors and survivor of the trustees under the will. The present trustees are not appointed under this power, and therefore they are not donees thereof, and the power is gone.

The petition will be adjourned to chambers, with a direction to appoint new trustees.

Re THE ST. DAVID'S GOLD MINING COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 755; 14 L. T. 529.

See Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), ss. 193, 199, 200.

Voluntary winding-up—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 138, 147, 148.

COMPANY. M.—The Court will not, at the instance of shareholders, interfere where a company is being wound up voluntarily, and order a winding-up under supervision, except where the resolution determining on the voluntary winding-up has been obtained by fraud or undue overbearing.

The mere fact of some dissentient shareholders making charges against the liquidators under a voluntary winding-up is not sufficient ground for interference.

Semble, the affidavit prescribed by the 4th Gen. Ord. under the Act is in all cases necessary, but not, therefore, in all cases sufficient.

This was a petition praying that this company, then in course of a voluntary winding-up, might be ordered to be wound up under the supervision of the Court; and that some proper persons might be appointed liquidators, either in substitution for, or to act jointly with, the existing liquidators.

The material facts were briefly as follows:—

In 1862 one Searby obtained a mining lease of a large tract of land in the vicinity of the well-known Vigra and Clogau gold mine, near Dolgelly, and in September, 1862, the present company was formed, with a nominal capital of 100,000*l.*, in 40,000 shares of 2*l.* 10*s.* each, for the purpose of purchasing and working the grant. Messrs. C. H. Maude and E. J. Bridell, the petitioners, were two of the first board of directors. The purchase was made of Searby at the price of 25,000*l.*, half in shares. In 1863 the directors made a further purchase from one Wright, of the right to wash for gold the alluvial deposit of the river Mawddach, at the price of 2,500*l.* They issued a further prospectus stating this arrangement, and that a considerable gain was anticipated as the result; and an allotment took place of such shares as had not hitherto been taken up. No gold was ever discovered to any amount worth mentioning either by mining or washing, and after awhile the shareholders became dissatisfied with the prospects of the concern. (It was stated that gold dust had been introduced by some of the employes on the mine into such specimens of the river mud as were selected for testing, thus raising expectancies of gold where none in reality existed). And at a general meeting of the company a resolution passed in favour of filing a bill in equity against Searby and Wright, which was subsequently done. In August, 1864, took place the second general meeting of the company, at which much dissatisfaction was expressed at the conduct of the directors (the petition stated that an attack was made on the directors by the respondents), and several alterations were made in the directory. The petitioners also impugned the legality of this meeting, alleging that necessary formalities were not complied with. In November, 1864, an extraordinary general meeting was held, at which Messrs. E. Pearson, F. H. Deane, and A. Bathurst, the respondents, were appointed sole directors (Messrs. Maude and Bridell, the petitioners, had previously retired). Shortly after this a Mr. Petherick, who had been commissioned by the former directors to report on the prospects of the mine, sent in an unfavourable report, and soon afterwards a Mr. Deane, employed on the Vigra and Clogau mine, who had been engaged by the former directors to test specimens of the river mud, and who had reported favourably thereon, also sent in an unfavourable report. A requisition was now got up by Maude and forwarded to the directors, requiring them to convene an extraordinary general meeting, to consider the position and management of the company, and take the necessary steps. The directors (respondents) then convened an extraordinary general meeting to consider the past and present management of the company, and appoint a committee of investigation. This meeting took place on May 30th, 1865, and a committee of investigation was appointed, but the fitness of the members composing it was impugned by the petitioners. On the 3rd of August, 1865, this committee made their report, unfavourable in some respects to the respondents, but exonerating them in the main from any imputation of mismanagement. Another extraordinary general meeting took place on December 19th, 1865, at which it was resolved that the company should be wound up voluntarily, and the respondents should be appointed liquidators. This resolution was subsequently confirmed by another meeting held in January, 1866.

The principal charges made by the petitioners against the respondents were—

1. That the appointment of the respondents as directors had been obtained by improper means.
2. That the respondents had made improper appropriations of the company's money for their own remuneration.
3. That they had not prosecuted the working of the undertaking.
4. That they had plunged the company into ruinous and unwarrantable litigation.
5. That their appointment as liquidators was improper, and improperly obtained.

Part of the allegations of the petitioners were not verified otherwise than by the ordinary affidavit in support of the petition; some discussion took place on this point, and his Honour intimated an opinion that the meaning of the 4th Consolidated Order under the Act was that such an affidavit was always necessary, but not that it was in all cases necessarily sufficient.

Glasse, Q.C., and C. F. Randolph, for the petitioners, and J. Pearson for several other shareholders, in support, urged that the individuals whose conduct as directors would have to be investigated, ought not, as liquidators, to have the carriage of the winding-up. They were willing to waive the removal of the present liquidators, or even any addition to their number, if they could only obtain the supervision of the Court, and contended that, at any rate, they were entitled, on the strength of the London Mercantile Discount Company (1 L. R. Eq. 277; 1 W. R. 219), to have the petition stand over until a meeting of the shareholders could be held.

Baily, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the respondents.

Re Bank of Gibraltar and Malta (1 L. R. Ap. 69; 14 W. R. 69), and Re Northumberland and Durham Banking Company (2 De G. & J. 508; 6 W. R. 527), were also cited.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., said that but for the fact that the respondents, the present liquidators, were, at the date of the resolution appointing them such, the sole directors, he could not have entertained the application at all; he then proceeded to weigh the effect of this consideration in the present case.

After recapitulating the facts, his Honour remarked that the conduct of the respondents had been fully investigated by a regularly appointed committee of investigation, and there was no reason for doubting the honesty of this report, which tallied with the evidence before the Court; and an additional probability of its truth arose from the fact that, as stated by the petition, it was in some respects unfavourable to the respondents. After this a perfectly regular meeting had resolved on a voluntary winding-up, and after their conduct had undergone a minute investigation by the committee appointed for that purpose, the respondents had been appointed liquidators at an extraordinary general meeting, and, as required by law, the resolution so appointing them had been confirmed by a subsequent meeting. There had thus been a deliberate determination by the company, in favour of winding up voluntarily with the respondents as liquidators. The principle governing the Court in these cases was to be gathered from the cases cited, and appeared to be that where a company has deliberately determined on a voluntary winding-up, the Court will not interfere unless the resolution has been obtained by fraud or improper overbearing influence, and is, therefore, not truly the sense of the company on the subject. He thought this was quite in accordance with the language of the Act. In the London Mercantile Discount Company's case (ubi sup.) Vice-Chancellor Wood had ordered the petition to stand over until a meeting of the shareholders could be held, and he himself was pressed to do the same here; but in that case there was an important reason for such a course, which was wanting here. There an important report was not produced to the shareholders until after the resolution, whereas here the shareholders knew, at the date of the resolution, all they could possibly be told. There was therefore no ground for ordering the petition to stand over. In fact, if a meeting was desirable, it might have been, and might still be, held; it was said, however, that the sanction of the Court was required before a meeting could be held which could bind the company; but the object of such a meeting was not to bind but to obtain the sense of the company, and it had not been shewn that that had already been otherwise than fairly done. The deliberate determination of the company could not be upset by a few dissentient shareholders. The Lord Justice Turner and Vice-Chancellor Wood had both been of opinion that, where a voluntary winding up was possible, it was certainly advisable; it would always be competent for the Court to interfere under section 138.

The application must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Glasse, Q.C., asked his Honour to add to the order, leave to the petitioners to file a bill in the name of the company, (they undertaking to indemnify the company,) in the terms of the order granted by the Lords Justices in Re Bank of Gibraltar and Malta (ubi sup).

His Honour refused to add to the order.

PENN v. JACK.

PENN v. BIBBY.

PENN v. FERNIE.

14 W. R. 760; L. R. 2 Eq. 314.

Practice—Evidence—Patent—Trial of issues—Particulars of objections—Form of issue.

PATENT.—In a patent case, where issues have been tendered for trial, and particulars of objections delivered by the defendant, though the plaintiff opens by calling witnesses to prove the novelty of his invention, yet the onus of proving affirmatively the instances alleged in the particulars of objections rests on the defendant; and when he has completed his evidence in support of them, the plaintiff can call witnesses to rebut it.

When the plaintiff's rebutting witnesses have been examined, the defendant will not be allowed to call witnesses in reply—at all events after his counsel has summed up his evidence, and where the judge is of opinion that the witnesses whom the defendant now wishes to call should have been called in chief, and not in rejoinder.

The Court expressed great dissatisfaction with the issue—whether the alleged invention was or was not proper subject-matter for a patent.

The bills in these three suits were filed to restrain the infringement of a patent, taken out by the plaintiff in October, 1854, for the use of wood in the construction of the bearings and bushes of the shafts of screw and submerged propellers instead of metal, which, he said, previously to that time had been universally employed in the construction of such bushes and bearings.

The defendant in the first suit was the ship-smith who had constructed and fitted certain ships with the bushes or bearings for the shaft—i.e., the supporting holders of the shaft—which were alleged to have infringed the plaintiff's patent; and the defendants in the other two suits were the owners of the ships so fitted.

The three suits came on together on motion for decree, and trial without a jury of the issues which had been delivered.

Rolt, Q.C., Grove, Q.C., Cotton, and T. Aston, for the plaintiff.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., Webster, Q.C., and E. E. Kay, for the defendants.

The first issue was as to the novelty of the alleged invention. Particulars of objections had been tendered by the defendant in compliance with the Patent Law Amendment Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. The chief particular of objection was, that the defendant Jack had, previously to the date of the plaintiff's patent, viz., in May, 1851, fitted up a screw steamer, called the Livorno, with wooden bearings, which were in all material respects identical with those described in the plaintiff's specification, and that the Livorno, so fitted, had successfully made a voyage round the Mediterranean.

The trial of the issues was opened by the plaintiff calling a number of scientific and practical engineers, who deposed as their belief that the alleged invention was novel, and that, antecedently to the date of the patent, wood had never, to their knowledge, been used in the construction of the bearings of the shafts of screw propellers.

The defendant then called witnesses in support of his particulars of objection, and in particular he called one Greenshields, who was the chief engineer of the Livorno in 1851. Greenshields deposed to having ordered the defendant Jack to make wooden bushes for the shaft of the screw, and to having himself superintended the substitution of the wooden bushes so made for the old metal bushes which had been in the ship before. He stated further, that the wooden bushes were not removed during his continuance in the ship, and that they were in when he left her about a year afterwards. It appeared that some two or three years after Greenshields left her she foundered in the Black Sea.

Rolt, Q.C., said that he should now call witnesses on the part of the plaintiff to rebut Greenshield's evidence, and upon an objection being raised by the defendant's counsel, Cotton and T. Aston contended that the plaintiff had a right to call such witnesses.

Kay opposed, on the ground that the onus of proving the novelty of the alleged invention rested on the plaintiff. The defendants had brought witnesses to disprove the novelty; they had not opened a new case. The plaintiff had had notice of the instance of the Livorno; and if he could have displaced that instance he should have done it at the opening.

Aston contended that the plaintiff had not taken upon himself to prove his own version of every instance of prior user which had been alleged by the defendants. Both sides should have an opportunity to state to the Court their version of every disputed question of fact. Here there was a fact in dispute. In what way could the plaintiff have stated this fact? How could he have known the defendants' case? Not from the objections. The Court would not force a plaintiff to go through all the objections in the dark.

Wood, V.C., said that it was quite impossible that the Court could be satisfied as to the true state of the facts without hearing the plaintiff's witnesses. The plaintiff did not know the nature of the proof to be given by the defendant of the instance alleged by him without hearing it. Though at common law the plaintiff in a patent case was bound to aver the novelty of his invention, yet even there all he had to do was to call witnesses, who, from their pursuits or position, were likely to know whether the patented invention was new or not, to speak as to their never having heard of it before the date of the patent; "and that" (he was quoting from the summing-up of Tindal, C.J., in Galloway v. Bleadon, (1 Web. 526)) "was enough to call on the other side to show affirmatively that it was not new; that it was an old matter." The affirmative, therefore, of this instance lay upon the defendant. In the particular of objection the defendant was not bound to give the name of the witnesses or the nature of the facts to which they would depose. The plaintiff could not be expected to meet a case like the present on such scanty information as the mere name of the vessel. His Honour would be sorry to give occasion to such an expensive proceeding as a motion for a new trial. The witnesses were all present; and the most direct and sensible course was to have the whole case brought before the Court at once. Independently of this last consideration, however, he was clearly of opinion that, as a matter of principle, the plaintiff should be allowed to call his rebutting witnesses. His Honour then, in support of his decision, read from Taylor on Evidence, 376: "If several issues," &c., and from the judgment of Pollock, C.B., in Shaw v. Beck (8 Ex. 392).

The plaintiff then called the engineer who succeeded Greenshields in the Livorno. He swore that soon after he went aboard of her, and before anything was done to her bushes, he saw the bushes while she was in the graving-dock, and they were not wood but iron.

Kay then summed up the evidence for the defence, and afterwards—

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., said that the rebutting evidence was as unknown to the defendants as the evidence of the latter was said to be to the plaintiff. He asked leave, therefore, to call a witness who could swear that at the time when the last witness said he examined the bushes in the graving-dock, the Livorno was not in the graving-dock at all.

Grove, Q.C., opposed, and—

Wood, V.C., refused the application, chiefly on the ground that the evidence which the defendants now wished to tender in rejoinder ought to have been tendered in chief. They knew the importance which attached to this instance of the Livorno and they should have followed the vessel up until she was lost.

The issues tried in these suits were four in number, viz.—1. The novelty of the invention. 2. The sufficiency of the specification. 3. The fitness of the alleged invention to be the subject of a patent. 4. The infringement.

Wood, V.C., during the trial, more than once expressed his dissatisfaction at the form of the third issue, and hoped never to see such an issue before him again.

Wood, V.C., May 7, 1866.

Re BOOTH'S CHARITIES.

14 W. R. 761.

CHARITY.—Where property is held by trustees to be employed in the repairs of a chapel, and any surplus is to be distributed among the poor of the parish, the trustees will not be ordered to rebuild the chapel instead of merely repairing it, although it is in a very dilapidated condition, and unequal to the wants of the inhabitants, and the trust estate has increased very largely since its first institution.

By an indenture of grant and feoffment of the 18th February, 1630, Humphrey Booth the elder conveyed certain real estate in Manchester to the use of himself for life, with remainder to trustees upon certain trusts for the benefit of the poor of the borough or town of Salford. His grandson Humphrey Booth, by his will dated the 3rd March, 1672, devised certain real estates in Salford to be employed towards all repairs of the chapel of Salford, and in case there should be any overplus, then his will and mind was that it should be distributed amongst the poor of Salford at Christmas as the moneys left by his grandfather (meaning thereby the rents, issues, and profits of the trust estate and premises comprised in or subject to the trusts of the said indenture of the 18th February, 1630) were.

By "the Booth's Charities' Act, 1846," the two charities, and the charity estates of Humphrey Booth the elder, and Humphrey Booth the younger, his grandson, were amalgamated. This Act contained provisions for the repairs and maintenance of Trinity Chapel, Salford (the chapel of Salford alluded to in Humphrey Booth's, the grandson's, will), and of the "fittings, furniture, and ornaments suitable for divine service," and for the formation of a reserve fund "to be applied in the re-building, renovating, or restoring of the said chapel, or its fittings, furniture, or ornaments; or for any of them as occasion shall require; or in defraying any extraordinary expenses to be incurred in the repairs and maintenance of the same particulars." The church or chapel of the Holy Trinity, Salford, the subject of the above charitable trusts, being in a very dilapidated condition, and exceedingly deficient in its accommodation, the rector and churchwardens, with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, took out a summons to procure the expenditure of part of the charity funds, which had very greatly increased in value, in having the church re-built instead of merely repaired. It was also sought to enlarge the chapel.

This summons having been adjourned into court—

Rolt, Q.C., and W. Barber in support of it, contended that the church must be rebuilt, and that there was nothing in the will of Humphrey Booth the grandson, or the "Booth's Charities' Act" inconsistent with the application of the charity funds for this purpose. They argued, that, under the grandson's will, the capital was what was given for the repairs, and that the right of the poor of Salford was merely contingent, the expression of the will being "and in case there shall be any surplus." The church was the primary object of the testator's bounty, the poor were merely a subordinate object. Had the church been burned down when uninsured, the trustees would have been bound to rebuild it.

Wickens, for the Attorney General.

Sir H. Cairns and Little for the trustees, argued that they ought not to rebuild, but only to repair.

Rolt, Q.C., in reply.

Wood, V.C., said that this was a question between those interested in the repair of the chapel and those interested in the surplus. It was not for him to inquire into the nature of the charities. The intention of the testator was to repair the chapel effectually, and to provide for it in future, but not for enlarging it. We are not entitled to say that because the funds are increased, therefore we may increase the objects of the charity. He could not direct a reference to chambers to approve of the new scheme proposed. His Honour made a declaration that the trustees were not at liberty, under the Act of Parliament, to apply any part of the rents and profits of the estates to Humphrey Booth, the younger, in enlarging the chapel in the Act referred to by rebuilding the same on any larger site.

THE "PHANTOM." *

14 W. R. 774; L. R. 1 A. & E. 58; 12 Jur. N.S. 529.

SHIPPING. E.—Salvage, its ingredients—Validity of agreement made beforehand with salvors.

This was an appeal from an award of justices of a petty sessional division in a case of salvage for services rendered on the 11th of January last, in Lowestoft Harbour.

* Before Dr Lushington.

The smack Phantom was one of a considerable number of small craft which hurriedly entered the harbour of Lowestoft about the same time, on the day in question, owing to a gale from N.N.E. Naturally the vessels fell towards the south pier in a confused mass, damaging each other considerably by the falling and entangling of masts, spars, &c., and the services forming the subject of the present claim were rendered by the appellants in aiding the Phantom to cross to the north side of the harbour so as to be out of the way of vessels coming in. During the performance of this service, a brig, which had run into the harbour, actually came into collision with the Phantom.

It was alleged, on the part of the respondents, but denied by the appellants, that there was an agreement to perform the service for eight shillings and sixpence. The magistrates disallowed the claim for salvage, and dismissed the case with costs, on the ground that there was no ingredient of salvage in it; that the smack was in no danger; that the collision with the brig had nothing to do with danger; and that there was not much risk incurred. The value of the property saved was 700*l*.

The appeal was now argued by—

V. Lushington, for the appellants.

E. C. Clarkson for the respondents.

LUSHINGTON, Dr.—I am of opinion that, to constitute a salvage service, it is not necessary that there should be absolute danger; it is sufficient if there be a state of difficulty, and a reasonable apprehension that there might be danger of further difficulty occurring. I think that is proved in this case. I do not find it denied that masts and spars were falling in all directions, there was, therefore, risk to the asserted salvors. As to the alleged agreement for eight shillings and sixpence, assuming it to have been made as asserted by the master, is it valid? With respect to all agreements made when salvors are about to perform a duty, the Court is in the habit of overruling them if they are unjust and inequitable. Seeing that the vessel came in in consequence of a storm, and was aided in consequence of apprehended danger, which proved to be real, I think an agreement for the sum of eight shillings and sixpence utterly futile, and shall overrule the award. I think it is a service that requires a small sum of money, and I shall give 10*l*. and costs.

SKENE v. DAVIES.

14 W. R. 776; 7 B. & S. 463; 14 L. T. 622.

Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 93—Security for costs—Plaintiff not within jurisdiction—Ejectment—Discontinuance—Second action for same premises.

PRACTICE. M.—S., in 1857, brought an action of ejectment against D. for certain lands. In 1858 it was agreed that the ejectment should be discontinued, and a chancery suit substituted. The ejectment was not, in fact, discontinued, but the chancery suit in substitution was instituted; and was dismissed:—Held, that this was such an unsuccessful prosecution of the previous suit as to entitle the defendant to have the plaintiff give security for costs in the subsequent action of ejectment for the same lands.

The facts in the present case were as follows:—In the year 1857 the plaintiff brought an action of ejectment, and the defendant, a tenant as representing his landlord, appeared to defend. Later in the year 1857 there was a consultation of equity counsel representing both parties in the ejectment, and by their recommendation it was agreed that the action of ejectment should be discontinued, and that a chancery suit should be substituted for it. A suit in chancery was accordingly commenced, but there was no formal entry of the discontinuance of the action of ejectment. The suit in chancery thus substituted for the ejectment was dismissed.

Subsequently, at the beginning of the year 1865, the plaintiff brought another action of ejectment against the defendant for the same premises. This action was stayed by order of Crompton, J., until security for costs should be given, on the ground that the plaintiff resided out of the jurisdiction.

Keane, Q.C. (Cooke with him), in Easter Term obtained a rule nisi calling on the defendant to show cause why the order of Crompton, J., should not be rescinded, on the ground that the plaintiff had returned within the jurisdiction and intended permanently to reside therein.

Lord now showed cause.—He contended that the order ought not to be rescinded—first, because the plaintiff's affidavits did not sufficiently show an intention permanently to return within the jurisdiction; and, secondly, because the defendant was entitled, under section 93 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to have the plaintiff give security for the costs, on the ground that there had been a prior action of ejectment by the plaintiff against the defendant for the same premises, and that the Court would not rescind an order to stay proceedings until security for costs was given, on whatever ground the order might have been obtained, if on other grounds, the defendant was entitled to have the plaintiff give security for costs.

Keane, Q.C. (Cooke with him), in support of the rule.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case the rule must be discharged. The order to stay proceedings was, at the time it was made, right. The cases seem clearly to establish that where security has been given under an order, the security is not vacated by the return to the jurisdiction; but where the security has not been actually given, the return to the jurisdiction is a good ground to set aside the order for security for costs. Now, as to the first point, viz., whether or no the affidavits are sufficiently explicit as to the return within the jurisdiction, it is immaterial, as we are going to discharge the rule on the second ground. As to the second ground the facts appear to be these. [His Lordship then stated the facts from the plaintiff's attorney's affidavit.] So that from plaintiff's own attorney's affidavit it appears that it was agreed that the action of ejectment should be discontinued upon a suit in chancery being instituted for the same object, and in place of the action of ejectment, and this chancery suit was dismissed. Now, section 93 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, says—"If any person shall bring an action of ejectment after a prior action of ejectment for the same premises has been, or shall have been, unsuccessfully brought by such person, or by any person through or under whom he claims, against the same defendants or against any person through or under whom he defends, the Court or judge may, if they or he think fit, on the application of the defendant, at any time after such defendant has appeared to the writ, order that the plaintiff shall give security for the defendant's costs, and that all further proceedings shall be stayed until such security shall be given, whether the prior action has been or shall have been disposed of by discontinuance or by nonsuit, or by judgment for the defendant." Before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, when a man was harrassed by perpetual actions of ejectment in respect of the same premises, the Courts ordered a stay of proceedings until the costs of the previous ejectment were paid, but if the costs of the previous action were paid the Court had no power to prevent these continuous harrassing ejectments. To remedy this wrong, section 98 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was passed. It provided, not as formerly, that the costs of the former ejectments should be paid, and a stay of proceedings until they were paid, but that whether the costs of the previous action were paid or no the Court should have the power to stay the proceedings until security for costs was given in all cases of ejectment where there had been a previous action of ejectment which had not been successfully prosecuted, whether the ejectment had been discontinued or a nonsuit entered, or in whatever way it had not been successfully prosecuted. Here the action was not in fact actually discontinued or a nonsuit entered, but it was agreed that the action should be discontinued and a chancery suit substituted for it. This chancery suit was actually instituted and dismissed. Now it seems to me that the Legislature, by these words at the end of the section, "discontinued or a nonsuit entered," did not mean to cut down the wide words at the beginning of the section "after an action was unsuccessfully brought," but rather says that in whatever way it happens, that the ejectment is not successfully prosecuted, whether the termination of the action is final or interlocutory, enumerating the usual ways of finishing an action, the Court shall have power to stay proceedings until security is given.

In the present case the plaintiff is evidently unwilling to give security for costs. This itself is a very good reason why the order should issue. Then Mr. Keane says that we have no jurisdiction to make such an order, there being no application to us by the defendant to do so; the question before us being whether an order made on a different ground shall be rescinded or not, and that we must set aside this order, and undo to-day what we should have to do to-morrow. It cannot be that we should undo one day what we should do the next day.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion, I will only add, that I think it would have been more satisfactory if the plaintiff's affidavits of return had been more explicit. As to the other point, I had at first some doubt whether the words at the end of section 98 did not limit ways in which action must have been unsuccessfully prosecuted to entitled the defendant to have the plaintiff give security for costs, but I now think that these words are merely words enumerating the ordinary ways in which an action is unsuccessfully prosecuted. The grounds on which the Legislature have thought fit to give the defendant a right to have the plaintiff give security for costs, will exist equally, however the previous action may have been finished, or unsuccessfully prosecuted; as to the other matters urged by Mr. Keane, it would be absurd to set aside to-day an order which we should have to make to-morrow. Surely we should rather sustain the present order.

LUSH, J., concurred.

tive society, executed a promissory note "on behalf of" the society. After the making of the note, the society was registered under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87. This action was brought upon the note, and at the time it was commenced the society was being wound up under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. Held, that section 202 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, read in connection with section 17 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87, took away from the Court the power of adding a plea to the jurisdiction.

This was an action on a promissory note. The defendants were members of the London and South-Western Co-operative Society (Limited), which was, in the year 1855, registered under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 31, and was, on the 29th September, 1862, after the making of the note, also registered under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87.

The only plea was that the said note was not the defendants' note, as alleged.

The note on which the action was brought was in the following form:—

"May 8th, 1861.

"12 months after date we, the undersigned, being members of the executive committee on behalf of the London and South-Western Railway Co-operative Society, do jointly promise to pay W. Gray, or order, the sum of £100 value received.

"WILLIAM RAPER."

[Signed also by the other defendants.]

"John Wilson, Secretary."

The case was tried before Keating, J., at Guildhall, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 107l. 10s., with leave to move for a rule to enter a verdict for the defendants, and with liberty to add a plea on such terms as the Court of Common Pleas might think fit.

On a former day McCalmont had obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict found for him should not be set aside and a verdict be entered for the defendants pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that the company was being wound up under section 202 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, and that the Court of Pleas had no jurisdiction to try the case.

Prentice showed cause against the rule, and contended that there was no plea to raise the defence that the society was being wound up under the Act of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, and that the Court had no jurisdiction to add such a plea. He also argued that this was an action against the defendants in their personal capacity, and not as the committee of the society: Penkivil v. Connell (19 L. J. Ex. 305). [He was here stopped by the Court.]

McCalmont, in support of the rule.—The wording of the note shows that it was not intended that the defendants should be personally liable: Dean v. Mellard (11 W. R. 913; 15 C. B. N.S. 19) is distinguishable because there the society was not being wound up. The 17th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87, gives a jurisdiction to the county court, and section 202 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, read in connection with the previous Act, shows that no action shall be commenced or proceeded with "except with leave of the county court." No leave was obtained here, and therefore this Court had no jurisdiction to try the case: Henderson v. Bamber (35 L. J. C.P. 65).

ERLE, C.J.—It is clear that this Court cannot add a plea, because it has no jurisdiction; the proper course is by motion in the Court which has jurisdiction.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Rule discharged.

WILSON v. GRAY.

WHITTAKER v. FOX.

PIETRONI v. TRANSATLANTIC COMPANY.

BETTS v. RIMMEL.

14 W. R. 783.

Practice—Transfer of causes from one judge to another—Re-transfer.

PRACTICE. J.—Where, on the occasion of an interlocutory application prior to the transfer of a cause, the question involved in the suit has been argued and dealt with on the merits, that is sufficient ground for ordering a re-transfer to the Judge before whom such interlocutory application was heard; but it is no ground for ordering such re-transfer that a precisely similar point has been decided by such Judge in a different suit.

Semble, that every order for transfer is made subject to any application of any party; and that every order for re-transfer is, in the nature of an order nisi, and may be obtained ex parte, leaving it to the other side to move to discharge it.

All these causes had been originally set down before Vice-Chancellor Wood, and formed part of an extensive transfer which had been recently made from that Judge to Vice-Chancellor Stuart.

Fooks now asked for a re-transfer of the cause of Wilson v. Gray.

This cause had been three times before Vice-Chancellor Wood on motion for injunction, a motion for a receiver, and a motion to commit for breach of the injunction; and on all these occasions it had been necessary to go into the merits of the case. Vice-Chancellor Wood was therefore fully acquainted with the case, and it would have to be all gone in de novo before Vice-Chancellor Stuart if not re-transferred.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Have you given notice of this application to the other side?

Fooks.—No, my Lord.

LORD CRANWORTH, C.—I do not think it necessary to do so; they can move to discharge this order if they are so advised. I think the grounds stated sufficient to authorise me in directing a re-transfer.

A. E. Miller then made a similar application as regarded the cause of Whittaker v. Fox. The cause had been practically heard on the hearing of a motion for injunction, subject only to one small question on the evidence. He had not yet applied to the Vice-Chancellors for leave, but asked for an order subject to their Honours' approbation.

LORD CRANWORTH, C.—Take the order.

June 2.—Bedwell applied for a similar order in the thirdly-mentioned cause on similar grounds.

F. O. Haynes for the defendants.

Malins, Q.C. (amicus curiæ).—Lord Westbury never allowed a re-transfer, except when suits which ought to be heard together had become separated.

LORD CRANWORTH, C.—It would be convenient before making a transfer to find out whether there is any objection in the case of any of the causes selected. That, however, of course cannot be done, the order is to take the first fifty or seventy causes, beginning at such and such a place, and therefore it seems to me that it would be very unreasonable to refuse to entertain these applications. The order for transfer should be merely in the nature of an order to show cause why the suit should not be transferred, and if any party shows a prima facie ground for a re-transfer the order should be made, subject to the right of the other party to move to discharge it on notice. You may take the order.

Willcock, Q.C., and Everitt, now made a similar application in the fourthly-mentioned cause. This cause had not itself been yet before Vice-Chancellor Wood, but the same point had been decided by him in Betts v. Menzies, which had afterwards been affirmed by the House of Lords. There was also a cause of Betts v. Neilson now in Vice-Chancellor Wood's paper (not transferred), involving the very same question, and which would probably be heard sooner than this cause.

Malins, Q.C., and Davey, opposed the application.—Whichever cause came on first would, of course, rule the other; neither Vice-Chancellor would think of disregarding the order of the other in pari materia.

Willcock, Q.C., in reply.—The subject of this particular patent is one with which Vice-Chancellor Wood is especially familiar.

LORD CRANWORTH, C., refused the application. There was a great difference between a case where the very point had been already settled between the parties, and a case where only a similar point had been adjudicated upon. The one was something very analogous to res judicata, the other was merely a case in point, like any other precedent.

Motion refused. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Winding-up petition abandoned—Costs.

COMPANY. M.—A creditor who had issued execution presented a winding-up petition. After the petition was presented the company disputed the creditor's claim. A new trial at law, on terms, was ordered, resulting in the petitioner's favour, whose claim was then satisfied. The petition stood over to abide the result of the new trial, and the petitioner took no further steps in the petition:—Held, that he was entitled to the costs of the petition.

This was a question as to the costs of a petition for winding up the company, which had been presented by a creditor of the company. A creditor against the company had, in the month of December, 1865, obtained, in an action at law, execution against the company. The sheriff's return was nulla bona. The creditor then presented a petition to wind up the company. After the presentation of the petition the company raised a dispute as to the validity of the creditor's claim, and a new trial was ordered at law upon the terms of the company bringing the amount of the claim into court, to abide the event of the trial. An application was thereupon made to postpone the hearing of the petition until the new trial at law was decided. The new trial resulted in favour of the petitioner. The question that now came before the Court was as to the costs of the petition.

Baggallay, Q.C., asked for the costs of the petition against the company.

Swanston opposed the application, contended that this was the case of a creditor with a bona fide disputed claim, and the petition should have been dismissed, and cited Re The Catholic Publishing Company (2 D. J. S. 116); Brighton Club and Norfolk Hotel (13 W. R. 733; 11 Jur. N.S. 436).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—There is a distinction between this case and those cited. If this petition had come on in December, no winding-up order would have been made; but the petitioner did not proceed with his petition, and all I am asked now is, in effect, to say whether or not he was justified in presenting a petition. Up to the 16th December, which was the first notice he had of any dispute against his claim raised by the company, he had a right to present a petition, and he did not afterwards proceed with it, but he had a right to present it, and is entitled to his costs and the costs of this application.

HENRY'S CASE.

14 W. R. 785; 14 L. T. 457; 12 Jur. N.S. 494.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Incomplete transfer.

COMPANY. M.—W. was shareholder in a company which could refuse to register transfers. W. had contracted to assign his shares to S., and H. had applied to S. for a sub-assignment of the same shares, and had filed a bill against S. for specific performance:—Held, that though W. was registered owner, H. must be entered on the list of contributories.

The London and Hamburg Banking Company had been ordered to be wound up in April, 1865.

Mr. Ward was registered owner of thirty shares in the company. The company was allowed by its articles of association, to refuse to register transfers until approved by the board. Mr. Ward had entered into two distinct contracts. The first was to transfer his shares to Stafford. Stafford, meanwhile, agreed to sub-assign them to Henry, a broker, but afterwards refused to complete the agreement, and Henry had filed a bill against Stafford for specific performance. The company was wound-up before Henry's bill came to a hearing, and Henry now declined to take the shares. The second contract into which Ward had entered, was to transfer his shares to Henry directly, Henry being a stockbroker, and acting for a Mr. Powell. Stafford had prevented the completion of this contract by giving the company notice that the shares were his, and must not be registered in Henry's name. A question being raised as to who should be held contributory in respect of Ward's thirty shares, the chief clerk had upon summons put Henry on the list. This decision was now appealed against.

E. R. Turner appeared for Ward, the registered owner.

Swanston, for Stafford, the purchaser under the first incomplete contract, contended that, as Henry had actually filed a bill for specific performance against Stafford, and the sub-transfer to him had not been objected to by the company, he could not now seek to throw the burden back on Stafford, and cited Hyam's case (4 De G. & J. 544).

Jessel, Q.C., and Caldecott, contended that Hyam's case, and that class of cases, had no application here, where the company might refuse to register transfers. Ward was still registered owner and ought to be liable: Robinson v. Chartered Bank (14 W. R. 71; 1 L. R. Eq. 32); Poole v. Middleton (9 W. R. 758; 29 Beav. 646).

Selwyn, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for the company, took no part in the argument.

May 24.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—In this case Stafford and Henry have agreed to endeavour to throw the shares back upon Ward as registered proprietor; but Ward has been always ready to complete the transfer, and I am of opinion that Henry and Stafford cannot, by agreement among themselves, throw such an obligation back upon the seller. The Court is not bound to consider the register conclusive, for if so no question of fraud could ever be inquired into. The 35th and 160th sections of the Companies Act, 1862, give me power to correct the register at any time, and on the common principles of equity I must hold that Henry is the real owner of these shares, and must be placed on the list of contributories. I have no power to make Stafford, who caused the litigation, pay the costs, but he will probably be liable for damages in an action at law.

Identical case—Suspension of decree.

APPEAL. B.—Where an appeal, involving the identical question before the Court, was about to be heard before the House of Lords, on appeal from the Lords Justices, the same decree as that appealed from was made, but its operation was suspended till after the hearing in the House of Lords, with liberty to apply.

This was a bill for an injunction to restrain the defendants from prosecuting an action at law for payment of calls, on the ground of alleged misrepresentations in the prospectus issued on the formation of the company.

A similar suit, Kisch v. The Central Railway Company of Venezuela, reported 13 W. R. 1006, had, on appeal, been decided in favour of the plaintiff by the Lords Justices in July, 1865, and an appeal from that decision to the House of Lords was now pending. It was suggested that the hearing of the present suit should be postponed till after the hearing of the appeal to the House of Lords; but the plaintiff elected to take the hearing now, on the ground that, in case of the winding-up of the company, there would be an advantage in his having a decree in his favour.

The company was formed under the Act of 1862 for the purpose of constructing a railway in Venezuela. The capital was to consist of 500,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 50*l.* each.

The principal misrepresentations complained of were those which formed the ground of the decision of the Lords Justices in Kisch v. The Central Railway Company of Venezuela. They were—first, the statement that, by the concession of the Government of Venezuela, a guarantee of nine per cent.

interest on all calls paid on account of the subscribed capital for a period of twenty years was secured to the company; whereas, in fact, the nine per cent. was guaranteed only whilst the line did not produce it from no default of the company; and secondly, the statement that the contractor had agreed to pay two and a-half per cent. interest on the paid-up capital during the construction of the railway; whereas, in fact, the liability of the contractor extended only to a sum of 20,000*l*.

The company was registered on the 6th July, 1864, and the plaintiff received the prospectus two days afterwards, applied for and received an allotment of fifty shares.

The bill alleged that the plaintiff remained in total ignorance of the misrepresentations till the month of July, 1865, when he saw in the newspapers the report of the former case before the Lords Justices, whereupon he refused to pay the call which afterwards became due.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Swanston, for the plaintiff.—This case is in all respects similar to the former. There can be no difference, because the question in both turns upon the representations contained in the same document. It is important for the plaintiff to have a decree in his favour, as his position would thereby be materially altered in case of a winding-up.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., and Morris, for the defendants.—There are facts common to this case and the former, and different facts. There was no sound distinction between those points which the Lords Justices decided in favour of the former plaintiff, and those which they rejected. In this case the plaintiff's acts are inconsistent with his present application. He paid a call and received a dividend after he knew of the misrepresentation. Ex parte Briggs (1 L. R. Eq. 483) was quoted.

Baggallay, Q.C., in reply.—As to the question of delay he received the dividend before he knew of Kisch's suit.

May 28.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I think that this case is identical with the former, and I decide this case in favour of the plaintiff, simply on the ground of the decision of the Lords Justices. I am bound by their decision until it is reversed; I offer no opinion upon it. The decree will be precisely the same. The operation of the decree will be suspended till after the hearing before the House of Lords. There will be no costs. Liberty to apply.

PATENT BREAD MACHINERY COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 787; 14 L. T. 582.

Contributory—Fully paid-up shares—Winding-up.

COMPANY. M.—A patentee sold his patent to a limited company, receiving, as the price, some fully paid-up shares in the company:—Held, that since he could not be liable as a contributory, he was not entitled to a winding-up order.

Stephens, the petitioner in this case, had invented and patented a machine for diminishing manual labour in the manufacture of bread, and had carried on the manufacture at his shop. In the year 1862 a company was formed for working his patent. It was provided by the articles of association that the price of the purchase of his patent should be 2,500 fully paid-up shares of the company, and that in the event of the company being wound-up, the patent should revert to the petitioner. The company had purchased the places of business of the petitioner, and of several other bakers. The business they undertook was baking bread by the petitioner's process, and making his machines for sale. The articles of association provided that in case seventy per cent. of the capital of the company should be spent, a meeting of shareholders should be summoned to consider the propriety of winding-up. The baking business proved unsuccessful, but a meeting of the shareholders had decided to continue the machine making, which seemed likely to be eventually profitable.

Southgate, Q.C., and Bevir, contended that they had only to shew that it was right and equitable that the company should be wound-up to entitle them to the order. The petitioner, as a shareholder, was entitled to apply. Most of the baking places were shut up, and had resulted in loss, and by 4th February, 1865, the company had no funds in hand.

Wintle, for the company.—One of the bakeries is now going on successfully, and the losses in other cases have been caused by the petitioner's mistakes, and they paid him 5,000*l.* for the purchase of his bakery. The baking business is one not suitable for a company, but the machine making will be profitable. The petitioner's interests are adverse to those of the shareholders, inasmuch as he would receive his patents back in case of a winding-up.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I think that the petitioner would not be entitled to the patent in priority to the creditors of the company.

Wintle.—By the 82nd section of the Act of 1862, a petitioner, to entitle him to a winding-up order, must be either a contributory or a creditor. Stephens cannot be contributory, for his shares are fully paid-up, and he is not a creditor, for all the money due to him has been paid. The interests of the petitioner on a winding-up are contrary to those of the other shareholders, which shews that it was for the company to decide whether there should be a winding-up.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I do not think he is a creditor.

Southgate, in reply.—I have only to prove a reasonable case.

May 30.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I cannot make the order in this case. The company was established for baking and machine making. The baking has failed, but the machine making may succeed. The shareholders and execution-creditors wish to carry on the business. The plaintiff is not liable for the company's debts, and has no interests which would entitle him to the order. The sole result of granting an order would be to vest the most valuable assets of the company in the petitioner. In my opinion, this is not a case in which he is entitled to come here and ask for a winding-up order. The petition will be dismissed with costs.

DYSON v. LUM.

14 W. R. 788; 14 L. T. 588.

Trustee and cestui que trust—Purchase by trustee.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—The Court will, as of course, and irrespective of the adequacy of the purchase-money, set aside a purchase by a trustee of the trust property.

This was a bill to set aside the purchase of two farms, called the Wormald and Jugs Farms, respectively, on the ground that the purchasers were trustees of the property. The lands in question were devised by one Lum to trustees on trust for sale, the defendants John Lum and Thomas Dyson being two of the trustees named. After an ineffectual attempt at a sale by auction, the lands were again put up in December, 1860, when the Wormald Farm was sold to Thomas Dyson for 817*l.*, and the Jugs Farm to a Mrs. Hamer for 300*l.* Mrs. Hamer was alleged, and sufficiently proved according to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, to have been a mere agent for John Lum. There was no material dispute as to the sufficiency of the purchase-money.

John Lum contended that Mrs. Hamer was not his agent, but that even if she were, the estate had now been fully administered, a full value had been given, and that the re-sale of the property could produce no benefit to any party. Dyson consented to give up the property.

Greene, Q.C., and E. K. Karlake, for the plaintiff.

W. F. Robinson for the defendant Dyson.

Malins, Q.C., and C. Hall for defendant Lum.

STUART, V.C., said that the Court had no choice but to set aside the purchases. The law was so well settled that he knew of no exceptional case. All the features of the present case which had been referred to by the defendant's counsel, viz., the sufficiency of price, and the uselessness of the litigation, had occurred in other cases, but they had not been sufficient to induce the Court to relax the rule. The property must be put up at the price purchased by the trustees, and if no more were offered they must be held to their bargain.

Costs occasioned by his purchase to be paid by John Lum; all other costs for further consideration.

SPARROW v. EWING.

14 W. R. 788; 14 L. T. 494; 12 Jur. N.S. 428.

Practice—Supplemental order to revive—Subpœna to hear judgment.

Where a subpœna to hear judgment has been served on a defendant, who becomes bankrupt before the decree, and upon whose assignees a supplemental order to revive is served, it is not necessary to serve a fresh subpœna to hear judgment upon the assignees.

In this suit, after replication filed, &c., and subpœna to hear judgment served on the defendants, one of the defendants became bankrupt. The plaintiff obtained the usual supplemental order to revive as against the assignees in bankruptcy (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 51). The order was served upon them, and they made no objection to it; but the plaintiff's counsel, thinking that it was not necessary to serve a fresh subpœna to hear judgment upon them, no such subpœna was taken out. The cause came on for hearing, but the assignees did not appear. The decree was accordingly taken as against them in their absence, upon affidavit of service of the order to revive.

Kay, for the plaintiff, now took the opinion of the Court on the question as to whether a fresh subpœna was necessary or not. Under the old practice, when a bill of revivor was necessary, no fresh subpœna was required—Bray v. Woodran (6 Mad. 72). The assignees are introduced into the suit by the supplemental order in the place of the bankrupt. They stand in his shoes for all the purposes of the original suit. The evidence, &c., has not to be taken afresh as against them. Why, then, should this one step in the cause be picked out as being necessary to be gone over again in order to affect the assignees? The rule is clear and intelligible that every proceeding of every kind taken against the defendant before he became bankrupt is to be considered as taken against the assignees when once they have been brought into the suit.

WOOD, V.C., decided that no fresh subpœna to hear judgment was necessary. He said that persons brought into a suit by supplemental order were bound to inform themselves of the exact position of the suit.

Practice—Evidence—Reading depositions taken in another suit in another court—Lancaster Chancery Court.

EVIDENCE.—An order of course, obtained by the plaintiff, for permission to read, at the hearing of this cause, depositions taken in the Lancaster Palatinate Court, in a cause in which he was defendant and the present defendant was plaintiff, was discharged with costs, as irregular.

This was a motion made on behalf of the defendant to discharge an order of course which had been obtained at the Rolls by the plaintiff. The order was that the plaintiff might be at liberty at the hearing of this cause to read and make use of the documents therein specified; such documents, which included a great number of voluminous affidavits, having been filed in the Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, in a cause of Biney v. Stephenson, between the same parties as those to the present cause, the defendant in the one being the plaintiff in the other, and vice versa.

The bill was filed in the Palatinate Court for the purpose of obtaining the dissolution of a partnership between the parties as hotel keepers. Vice-Chancellor James dismissed the bill with costs. Such dismissal, however, not having the effect of causing the plaintiff to relinquish the occupation of the hotel, which the present plaintiff contended that he was bound to do under a clause of the articles of partnership, this bill was filed in the High Court. It prayed that the defendant might be restrained from continuing in the occupation of the hotel in contravention of such clause, and for consequential directions. An affidavit had been filed in support of the present motion to the effect that the persons who had sworn the affidavits, which the plaintiff had obtained an order to read, were still living.

Giffard, Q.C., and E. R. Turner, for the defendant, contended that the order to read was irregular and could not be supported. In Williams v. Broadhead (1 Sm. 151), where a plaintiff in this Court, who had also been a plaintiff in a suit in the Exchequer, had obtained an order to read against a defendant in this Court, who made the same defence as had been made in the Exchequer, copies of depositions taken in the Exchequer, the order was discharged for irregularity; on the ground that the depositions could not be read except from the production of a copy of the bill and answer in the Exchequer, for the purpose of showing that the issue was the same in both causes; and that upon such production the depositions could be read without any order. They also cited Hope v. Liddell (No. 2), (21 Beav. 181); Palmer v. Lord Aylesbury (15 Ves. 299); and referred to Dan. Chan. Prac. 826-7; and the note to C. O. xix. r. 4, in Morgan's Acts and Orders, 447-8. With respect to this last authority, which says that the true test of the admissibility of depositions in one cause to be read in another when the parties in both causes are, as in the present case, the same, is whether the issues in both causes are the same, they argued that if the issues were the same in this suit and in the Lancaster suit, then the rights of the parties had been already settled; and if they were not the same, then the depositions could not be evidence.

E. K. Karlake (Rolt, Q.C., with him). for the plaintiff, in support of the order to read, contended that this suit was merely a cross cause to the cause in the Lancaster Court.

Wood, V.C., said that it was well established that when there was a cause and a cross cause in this Court the depositions taken in the one could be read in the other; and further, that if depositions were taken in a separate cause in this court, the Court would not require the attendance of any of its officers, or the production of the bill and answer, but would take notice of its own record, and, if satisfied that the issue was the same in both causes, would order the depositions in the one to be read in the other.

But, as regarded all matters of proceeding in a different Court, the case was different. This Court did not know what the record of another Court might be, and, therefore, before allowing the party to read depositions taken in another Court, it required the production of the documents which were the foundation of the proceedings in such other Court. If, upon that production, it was proved that the issues raised in both Courts were the same, the depositions taken in the other Court could then be read in this Court without an order. That was the substance of the authorities. The present order, therefore, was irregular, and must be discharged with costs.

Pleading—Answer—Exceptions—Correspondence.

DISCOVERY. A.—Where a defendant is required by an interrogatory to set forth a list of all correspondence relating to a negotiation, and answers that, if he wrote or received any letters on the subject, he has not preserved them, and that he has none except those in the schedule, the answer is insufficient.

This case has been reported before (14 W. R. 578), when it was argued on exceptions to defendant's answer to the interrogatory relating to the representations made by him as to his profits, and requiring him to set forth a list of all correspondence relating to the negotiation for the sale of his business. The defendant, by his further answer, in reply to the demand for a list of correspondence, said that, if he ever wrote or received any letter relating to the negotiations (which he did not admit that he had done), he had not preserved it; and also that, save as appeared by the schedule to this further answer, he had not any letter or draft or copy of or extract from any letter relating to the said negotiation. To this answer the plaintiff again excepted.

Willcock, Q.C., and Hemming, for the plaintiff, said that the further answer was also insufficient. It was quite possible that correspondence might have existed up to the time of the answer, and then have been destroyed. Probably the correspondence was conducted by a clerk of defendant.

J. Pearson, for the defendant, argued that he had traversed the interrogatory. If plaintiff wanted a list of those letters that had been destroyed, he should have framed his interrogatory differently. The answer follows the interrogatory.

WOOD, V.C. (without calling for a reply), said that something had come out when a former answer was pressed. The object was to get a list of the correspondence. The answer that, if the defendant ever wrote or received any letter, he had not preserved it, did not prevent him from setting out a list. There might have been an important document. If there had been, and it had been destroyed, it would have impressed itself on his mind. He did not find a full traverse to the interrogatory. The better way would be to examine the defendant at chambers, where the matter would be cleared up in two or three minutes. Defendant must attend at his own expense.

REG. v. STUDD AND OTHERS.

14 W. R. 806; 14 L. T. 633.

Forcible entry—Re-stating case.

CRIMINAL LAW. C.—(1) One V., the prosecutor, having been in possession of a house from May to October, the defendants called there, and, insisting that V. had no title, proceeded to take the keys out of the room doors. Upon their doing that V. gave them into custody for stealing the keys; but the magistrate before whom they were taken refused to detain them. They then returned to the house, and having procured a sledge-hammer, forced the inner door of the hall, and some having entered that way, and some by a staircase-window, overpowering the prosecutor's opposition, and furnished with a hatchet and other weapon, after a struggle which caused a disorderly crowd to assemble, they ejected the prosecutor and his servants. From the commencement of the proceedings till the conclusion a female servant of the prosecutor's was in the kitchen:—Held, assuming the title of the prosecutor to have been bad, and that the defendants had acted by the orders of those who had a good title to the premises, that the evidence was sufficient to support a conviction of the defendants for a forcible entry and riot.

CRIMINAL LAW. D.—(2) Where a case reserved had been re-stated by order of the Court, an application, supported by affidavit, to have it again re-stated was refused.

Case:—“ George Deeks, Alfred Studd, and eight other defendants who were named, were tried before me at the Middlesex Sessions, in November, 1865, upon an indictment which charged them with a forcible entry into certain premises, and a riot.

“ George Deeks was acquitted, and the other defendants were found guilty upon the count charging a forcible entry, subject to the opinion of this honourable Court upon the following case:—

“ The prosecutor, John Vincent, was in possession of the premises in question from May, 1865, and there carried on his business of a house agent until October in the same year, when several of the defendants called at the house and said they had come to take possession. They produced an opinion which they said had been taken on the subject, by which they were advised that the parties of whom Vincent had bought a term had no legal right to assign it, and they said that if possession was not given, they should use force. They proceeded to take out the keys of the room doors, upon which the prosecutor sent for a police constable, and gave them in charge for stealing the door-keys. The magistrate before whom they were taken refused to detain them, and they returned to the house, accompanied by the other defendants. During their absence the prosecutor had fastened and barricaded the premises, but the defendants procured a sledge-hammer and forced the inner door of the hall, and some of them then entered, whilst other of the defendants entered by a staircase-window, overpowering the prosecutor's opposition. They had a hatchet and other weapons, and after a considerable struggle, which caused the assemblage of a large disorderly crowd, they succeeded in ejecting the prosecutor and his servants from the premises. A female servant of the prosecutor was in the kitchen of the house from the commencement of the proceeding, and remained until the conclusion. The office furniture and books of the prosecutor were also left on the premises when possession was forcibly taken as before described.

“ The counsel for the defendants contended that the prosecutor had no legal title to the premises, and that as the defendants had got in and taken the keys, they were in lawful possession; that the charge of felony improperly removed them from the premises, and that they were legally entitled to use the force they had used in consequence of the prosecutor's refusal to admit them.

“ The counsel for the defendants relied on this objection, and declined to address the jury on the facts. I told the jury that if it were shown that the title of the prosecutor was objectionable, and that the defendants acted by the orders of parties who could show a legal title to the premises, that such proof would not justify the conduct of the defendants, or furnish any answer to the indictment.

“ The question on which I solicit the opinion of this Court is whether my direction, in point of law, was correct. If it were, the conviction is to stand; but if not, it is to be reversed; and the defendants have been severally admitted to bail pending the decision.

“ W. H. BODKIN, Assistant Judge, Middlesex Sessions,
December 19th, 1865.

“ Re-stated by order of the Court of Criminal Appeal, April 16th, 1866.

“ W. H. BODKIN.”

Ballantine, Serj. (Lanyon, with him), applied that the case, as re-stated, might again be sent back to the Assistant Judge for amendment, and handed to the Court an affidavit in support of his application. He desired that it should be stated in the case—1. That the defendant had a clear title to the possession of the premises. 2. That they had obtained peaceable possession of the premises before the charge against them had been dismissed by the magistrate? [ERLE, C.J.—What do you mean by obtaining peaceable possession?] That the doors being open, the owner peaceably went in with his servants, and took possession of the keys, and ordered out those who were in the house. [ERLE, C. J.—It is stated in the case that the prosecutor's cook was down stairs all the time, and was never off the premises. That makes all the difference, because the premises were never in the possession of the defendants, whilst the cook and the prosecutor's furniture were there, and ex hypothesi Vincent had no idea of letting you in.] The points reserved are not stated in the case, and as it now stands, I cannot argue it. [MARTIN, B.—For my part it seems to me that it was for the judge who tried the defendants to state the case for this court, and it was right if the defendants' counsel was not satisfied with the manner in which it was stated, that he should suggest to the judge in what way it should be amended. Here the case has been re-stated by the judge, and I do not think we ought to send it back.]

Metcalfe for the prosecution was not called on.

The COURT affirmed the conviction.

Absconding defendant—Bill taken pro confesso.

For the purpose of having a bill taken pro confesso against an absconding defendant, it must be shown that, at the time of making the application, the defendant cannot be found.

This was an application under the 22nd General Order, rule 4, to have a bill taken pro confesso against a defendant who had absconded. An attachment had issued against the defendant in 1864, and had been returned non est inventus, and the application was made on an affidavit of those facts.

Bovill appeared in support of the application.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R., refused the application on the ground that it must be shown that the defendant cannot be found now.

HENRY v. NAGHTEN.

14 W. R. 814.

Rectification of settlement—Written instructions.

SETTLEMENT.—A memorandum by a solicitor of verbal instructions will not be treated as written instructions so as to prevent a decree for rectification of a settlement made in accordance with the memorandum.

This was an application to rectify a marriage settlement by excluding some property from its operation, which, it was alleged, was not intended to have formed part of the settled property.

The marriage in question took place at Paris on the 9th of August, 1865. The wife was possessed of 500*l.* Railway Stock, and some property expectant on the death of her grandmother, which, it was believed, was strictly settled. The marriage was very hurriedly arranged, and on the 8th of August it was suggested that a settlement of the wife's expectant property should be made to provide for the case of her grandmother's property not being effectually settled, and to settle after-acquired property. The husband and wife accordingly instructed a Mr. Moore, a solicitor residing at Paris, to prepare a settlement. He was disinclined to do so at one day's notice, but, as there was no possibility of delay, he consented to prepare one by the next day. His note of the instructions, which were otherwise verbal, was "present and future property." The settlement was in general terms, and thereby included the 500*l.* Stock. The wife was afterwards much surprised to find that she could not sell out any portion of the Stock on account of the settlement. She had not mentioned the Railway Stock to Mr. Moore.

Cotton, for the plaintiff.—It was never intended to include this property in the settlement, and it was only by reason of the unavoidable haste that it was not expressly excluded.

Owen, contrà.—The memorandum of the solicitor was equivalent to written instructions, and the Court will not rectify a settlement which is in accordance with written instructions.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—Mr. Cotton, you must take a decree. The fact of the immediate application by the wife for the 500*l.* Stock shows that there was a mistake. The existence of the grandmother's property is quite a sufficient reason for a settlement of present property. The question was whether there should be no settlement, or a settlement executed in twenty-four hours. Nothing was said about the Railway Stock, and therefore the settlement was silent about it. The memorandum of the solicitor does not amount to written instructions. The plaintiffs will have to pay costs as between solicitor and client. The decree will be to rectify the settlement by saying that it is not to extend to the Railway Stock. Let that be indorsed on the settlement.

GARRETT v. SALISBURY AND DORSET JUNCTION RAILWAY.

14 W. R. 816; L. R. 2 Eq. 358; 12 Jur. N.S. 495.

Contractor—Injunction—Use of plant—Construction of works.

WORK AND LABOUR.—A company will be restrained by injunction from selling plant belonging to a contractor who has made default, where they have power in that case to take possession of the plant at a valuation, and to allow it in account with the contractor, and have also power to use it in the construction of the line, unless it appears that there is a balance of account actually due from the contractor.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing certain plant which had been used by the plaintiff, a railway contractor, in the construction of their line.

The plaintiff had contracted to make the defendants' line, which was a short junction line. The contract contained a clause giving the railway company power, in case of the failure of the contractor to complete his contract, to take possession of the works, and to take the plant at a valuation, and allow the value in account with the contractor. It contained also a clause giving them power to use such plant in completing the works left incomplete by the contractor.

The contractor commenced the works, and carried them on for some time. He was afterwards sued for a debt, and, being unable to pay, was sent to prison. By this means it became impossible for him to continue the works, and he afterwards became insolvent. He had, in consequence of the delay in completing, rendered himself liable in damages to the company. He had instituted a suit before Vice-Chancellor Wood, but the accounts applied for in that suit, and other matters in dispute between the parties, had been referred to arbitration. A new contractor named Jackson had been appointed to continue the works, which were now nearly completed. Jackson had taken away a shed which formerly belonged to the plaintiff, and four waggons had been moved off the line. The removal of the shed had been rendered necessary to prevent the spread of the small-pox which had broken out there, and had been done without the authority of the company. The removal of the waggons was said to be a temporary measure. The defendants intended, on the completion of the line, to sell the plant for the purpose of clearing the line for traffic, and account for the proceeds of the sale in their account before the arbitrator. The injunction was prayed to prevent their selling the plant.

Jessel, Q.C., and Stock, for the plaintiff.—The company are not entitled to sell the plant. They can only take possession of it and use it for the purpose of construction. Until the account is taken it does not appear that there is anything due to the company. We say that there is a balance due to the contractor.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Townsend, for the company.—The contractor has made default, and we are absolutely entitled to the plant. We have been put to loss and inconvenience by his failure to complete the works. It will be necessary to remove the plant before the line is opened, and the proceeds of the sale will be brought into the account before the arbitrator. The Court will not interfere between a contractor and a railway company on an interlocutory application: Garrett v. The Banstead and Epsom Downs Railway Company (13 W. R. 878); Munro v. The Wivenhoe and Brightlingsea Railway Company (13 W. R. 880).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I shall not restrain you from using the plant. If there is a balance due to the plaintiff the property belongs to him.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Fitzhugh, for Jackson, the new contractor.—This matter ought to go before the arbitrator. [LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The reference was of the matters in dispute. This was not in dispute at the time.] The injunction asked for would restrain us from using the plant for the purpose of the works.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The cases cited appear to me to be in favour of the order I am going to make, unless they show that the Court will never interfere on an interlocutory proceeding between a contractor and a railway company. They merely mean that the Crown will not pre-judge a case between a contractor and a railway company. When the company establish that they are creditors of the contractor they will be entitled to sell the plant; but if the contractor is proved to be the creditor of the railway company he will be entitled to have his plant back again. When the contractor failed to perform his contract he entitled the railway company to possession, and, as it is said by the company, to take the plant at a valuation, and then allow it in account with the contractor. But if so, what is the meaning of the clause giving them power to use the plant when it was their own property? It is obvious that it did not become their property; it was only to be their property so far as to provide for losses caused by the contractor's default. The company may use the contractor's property, they may also take the plant which they find on the works at the time of the default, which, in my opinion, will become the property of the company so far as shall be necessary for providing for the losses and expenses incurred by reason of the default. There is an inquiry going on to ascertain what these losses are, and the plaintiff claims the right to remove these things and dispose of them. In my opinion such a claim cannot be sustained in these courts. A price must be ascertained and the money paid into court to abide the results of the arbitration, or else there will be an absolute injunction against selling the plant, and an injunction to restrain the removal except so far as is necessary for the completion of the works, and for preventing any impediment to working the line when completed. The plaintiff will have his costs.

Re LONDON AND HAMBURG BANK. WATKINS' CASE.

14 W. R. 817; 14 L. T. 696.

Contributory—Stock broker—Undisclosed principal—Transferee—Costs.

COMPANY. M.—A shareholder had made a bonâ fide sale before the petition for winding-up was presented, but the purchaser's broker did not disclose his principal at first, and afterwards a question arose as to who was really the principal:—Held, that the Court could not strike off the transferor's name until some person was found clearly liable as a contributory. Who was the real transferee could only be determined by a suit.

The Court refused the costs of the transferee's broker.

This was an application to substitute the name of a transferee of some shares in the company for the transferor, who had been placed on the list of contributories.

Watkins, the applicant, had taken sixty shares in the company at the end of the year 1864. On the 13th of March, 1865, he went to his broker's for the purpose of selling his shares. He believed the concern at that time to be quite solvent. A bonâ fide transfer was made to a broker named Henry, who did not at the time disclose his principal.

On the 14th of April, 1865, Watkins applied, through his broker, to Henry for the name of his principal. He gave the name of W. Hussey (who was a costermonger, and wholly without property) as the purchaser of fifty shares. As to the other ten shares no question arose. He afterwards stated that the real purchaser was his brother-in-law, and that Hussey was a mere trustee for him. A few days after the transfer, viz., on the 25th March, 1865, the petition for winding up the company was presented, and the advertisements were issued on the 11th of April.

Baggallay, Q.C., for Watkins.—There was a bond fide sale before the issue of the advertisements. As Henry did not disclose his principal in proper time, he ought to suffer the consequences, and to be made a contributory in respect of these shares.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I have laid down a rule in the exercise of my discretion that I should treat the time of the issue of the advertisements as the time for determining who is to be made a contributory. The transfer, therefore, in this case, is in plenty of time; but the difficulty is, who is the real transferee? It was pointed out to me some time ago that questions involving difficult points of law and equity would arise in these cases. The question here can only be determined by a suit. Mr. Baggallay suggests that I should take Watkins' name off, and put Henry's on; but I cannot do that. I must have some person clearly liable to be put on.

Caldecott for Henry, then applied for costs.—It was stated in the affidavit of Henry that it was the common practice on the Stock Exchange to put forward a false person as real owner.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—It is the common practice of the Court of Chancery not to give costs in such a case.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for the official liquidator, were not called upon.

PRATT v. LATIMER.

14 W. R. 818.

Divorce—Life interest of wife—Decree of Judge Ordinary.

The Court of Chancery cannot act upon an order of the Judge Ordinary which extinguishes a divorced wife's life interest on a fund in court.

This was an application to have the dividends on a fund in court, in which a wife who had been divorced at the suit of the husband had a first life-interest, paid to the husband, as if the wife were dead.

A settlement had been made, on the marriage, of a fund in Court, which was the property of the wife. The wife was entitled to the first life interest under the settlement, and the husband was entitled for life after her death. The Judge Ordinary had pronounced a decree of divorce at the suit of the husband, and had made an order for the payment to the husband of the settled fund, as if the wife were dead. The order had been made by the authority of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5, which provides in general terms for inquiring into the existence of settlements made on the marriage of parties affected by the decree, and for making such orders as to the Court should seem fit for the benefit of the children or parents.

Longley appeared in support of the application. He cited also 21 & 22 Vict. c. 85, s. 45.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I cannot make an order to extinguish a wife's life estate. A wife's property cannot be taken away in that manner. You must mention the matter to the Lords Justices.

GRIGGS v. GIBSON. }
MAYNARD v. GIBSON. } No. 3.

14 W. R. 818.

4 & 5 Vict. c. 35 was repealed by the Copyhold Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 46).

Infant lady of the manor—Appointment of a valuer by her guardian—
4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 11.

COPYHOLD INFANT.—A female infant tenant for life in possession of a manor, but subject to a legal term of 1,000 years vested in trustees for securing annuities, and also subject to a provision for the receipt by the same trustees of the rents during the minority, and for the application of a certain limited sum thereout for her maintenance, was held to be the lady of the manor.

And, although the trustees had the usual power of sale, yet it was held that, on notice given by tenants to apply for enfranchisement, her guardian was the proper person, and not the trustees, to appoint a valuer.

This was an adjourned summons.

The plaintiff in the second suit, Frances Evelyn Maynard, an infant, was, under the trusts of the will of her late grandfather, Lord Maynard, tenant for life in possession of his estates, but subject to the trusts in the will respecting the receipt of the rents and profits of the estates by the trustees of the will during the minority of any person for the time being entitled to the possession or to the rents and profits of the estates, whereby the trustees were directed, out of such rents and profits, to pay and apply any annual sum or sums of money, according to the age of such minor, not exceeding the clear annual sum of 400l., for or towards the maintenance and education of such minor, and to accumulate the surplus of such rents and profits in the manner and for the purposes therein specified.

Over-riding all the other trusts of the will was a term of 1,000 years, vested in the same persons as were appointed to receive the rents during minorities, upon trusts for securing the payment of certain life annuities given by the will. The will also contained a power of sale by the trustees, with the usual consent.

Some of Lord Maynard's estates were held by tenants as copyhold, and some of these tenants had recently intimated their intention of applying for enfranchisement. The question now in dispute was as to who had the right to appoint a valuer on behalf of the infant plaintiff under the provisions of the Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35. The plaintiff's mother and guardian, the honourable Blanche Adeliza Maynard, took out the present summons for the appointment of a valuer by her, as such guardian. The trustees opposed, on the ground that the appointment should be made by them.

The 11th section of the Act on which Mrs. Maynard relied is, so far as material, as follows:—"Whenever the lord or tenant of a manor, or any person interested in any question or right connected with any commutation, or enfranchisement under this Act, shall be a minor, idiot, lunatic, feme covert, or under any other legal disability, or shall be beyond the seas, the guardian, trustees, committee of the estate, husband, or attorney of such person respectively, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be substituted in the place of such lord, tenant, or other person."

Amphlett, Q.C., and Walford, in support of the summons, argued that the infant plaintiff was the lady of the manor. The trustees had raised two objections to this view. First, that the term of 1,000 years would prevent her from being lady of the manor, and secondly, that she would be so prevented by the fact that, during her minority, she was limited to 400l. a-year out of the rents. To the first objection there were two answers, viz., that the Court would not allow the trustees to set up their legal title against a beneficiary; and that if it were held good, then a mortgagee of a manor with a legal estate would be lord of the mortgaged manor, which was not the case. With respect to the second objection, it might be argued that, the mere receipt of rents by the trustees during minority, gave them no estate. The committee of a lunatic lord of a manor, was held not to be lord of the manor himself, though entitled to receive the rents.

Rolt, Q.C., and Faber, for the trustees, contended that an enfranchisement was, in effect, a sale, and that by the will the power of sale was given to the trustees. They cited 6 & 7 Vict. c. 23, s. 14, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51, s. 36.

Wood, V.C., said that the young lady was undoubtedly the lady of the manor. The only question was as to the words of the Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 11. He thought that by the principle reddendi singula singulis the word "guardian" should be referred to the word "infant." The summons, therefore, would be allowed, and Mrs. Maynard would have the appointment of a valuer.

Wood, V.C., June 2, 1866.

BANK OF TURKEY v. OTTOMAN COMPANY.

BANKER AND BANKING COMPANY. TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Where money has been paid in to the ordinary banking account of a company, not being in any way ear-marked, the company will not, on an allegation that the money is impressed with a trust, such allegation not being admitted by the company, be restrained, on motion, from dealing with the money.

This was a motion to restrain the defendants from withdrawing a sum of 5,000*l.* from their account at the London and Westminster Bank, and transferring it to Turkey. This sum had been paid by the Bank of Turkey to the Ottoman Company for promotion-money.

The bill alleged that the Bank of Turkey was projected by the defendants Farley, Palmer, and Barnes and others, (who were directors of the Ottoman Company), and that the Ottoman Company relied on an agreement alleged to have been come to between the two bodies of directors, that the company should introduce the bank to the public, the price to be paid for this service being the 5,000*l.* in question.

It appeared that the company had in fact been promoters of the bank. Payment was made by order of Farley, Palmer, and Barnes and other defendants, directors of the bank, by a cheque drawn by the bank. The plaintiffs alleged that this payment to the company was a gross breach of trust. This cheque was paid in by the company to their bankers to their ordinary current account, and was not in any way distinguished from the ordinary assets of the company. The defendants (the company) said that the 5,000*l.* had all been drawn out from their bankers, more than that amount having been drawn from their balance since it was paid in. They denied that the 5,000*l.* was about to be sent out to Turkey.

The 94th article of association of the Bank of Turkey contains, amongst others, the following clause:—

"In their management of the business of the company the directors, without any further power or authority from the shareholders, may do the following things, viz., they may and shall pay out of the funds of the company such sums as they shall think proper to be paid in satisfaction for all costs, charges, and expenses not hereinbefore provided for, and which shall have been or shall be hereafter incurred or sustained in or about the formation and establishment of the company, or the obtaining the capital, or in any matter in relation thereto; and they may appropriate and pay such reasonable amounts by way of commission or otherwise as they may think fit to any person or persons in respect of any services performed or benefits derived by or through such person or persons in relation to the formation or bringing out of the company."

Rolt, Q.C., and Lindley, for the plaintiffs, supported the motion, citing Ernest v. Croysdill (6 Jur. N.S. 740); Pennell v. Deffell (1 W. R. 499; 4 D. M. G. 372).

W. M. James, Q.C., and A. E. Miller, for the company, and Roxburgh, for the directors, were not called upon.

Wood, V.C., said that the plaintiffs alleged there were trust moneys in the hands of the defendants. If they could get an admission of this from the defendants, then they might have the money paid into court as a matter of course. Here, however, there was a question to be tried at the hearing, viz., whether the defendants had the trust moneys or not. It had been determined that those who subscribed to these companies must be taken to have notice of the articles of association. [His Honour then referred to article 94, which he considered gave the directors of the Bank of Turkey power to pay promotion-money.] It was not astonishing that the directors should pay the 5,000*l.*, when the name of the Ottoman Company appeared prominently on the prospectus of the bank, which also gave the names of influential banks as agents for the new bank. His Honour said that he was now asked to restrain people from dealing with what they claimed as their own money till the issue of the suit was known. The money had been paid in to the general account of the bank, not as trust money. It was like the case of a bill against trustees who had paid money to A. B. for their private debts, and A. B. was alleged to know of the trust, but denied it. You would never dream of restraining A. B., by interlocutory injunction, from dealing with the money. He could not possibly restrain the defendants from dealing with the money. The motion must be refused with costs.

WASHOE COMPANY v. FERGUSON.

PRACTICE. M.—Practice—Security for costs—Companies Act, 1862, s. 69—Adjourned summons.

Bedwell asked, under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 69, that the plaintiff, the company, might find security for costs, on the ground that there was reason to believe that if the defendants were successful in their defence, the assets of the company would be insufficient to pay their costs. The company had had a bill drawn on them by their manager in America, and had returned it unpaid from want of funds to meet it. They afterwards called two meetings, the first for the purpose of obtaining powers to raise additional capital, and the second to obtain leave to borrow a large sum of money. The new capital was not raised, nor the money borrowed. The defendants only received notice of the ultimate failure of these two plans for raising money on or after the last day for putting in their answer. While these negotiations were proceeding, the defendants asked for and obtained further time for putting in their answer. For the defendants it was submitted that they had not waived their right to security for costs, as they had done no voluntary act since they knew of the failure of the negotiations.

Elderton, for the company, resisted the summons, on two grounds—first, that this was a cross suit; secondly, that the defendants had waived their rights. The defendant O'Connor had filed a bill against the company to restrain them from registering a transfer of shares. The answer of the company in that suit alleged fraud, and claimed the shares. The present bill was filed by the company to obtain a declaration that the defendants were trustees for the company of the shares. The defendants had waived their rights by asking for further time to answer after they knew the company was in a doubtful condition. Dyott v. Dyott (1 Madd. 187); Macon v. Gardiner (2 Bro. C.C. 609).

WOOD, V.C. (without calling for a reply), said that the present case was totally different from that of a plaintiff being abroad. Under the Act you are allowed to ask for security for costs "If it appears by any credible testimony that there is reason to believe that if the defendant be successful in his defence, the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay his costs," and therefore a person was not justified in taking any steps until he knew whether the company was insolvent. If he did, he would do so at considerable peril. His Honour then went into the circumstances of the attempts to raise money, and the notice given of these to the defendants, and said that if the defendants had applied before either of the meetings, the Court would have been disposed to hold its hand. He could not compare this to the case of a plaintiff abroad. Under these circumstances, could he say that the putting in of the answer on the day when the letter was posted giving the defendants notice of the final failure to raise money was a waiver of their rights? To do so would be to extend the rule of waiver to an extent he could not do. He must now hold that the assets would be insufficient to pay the defendants their costs if successful. The doctrine that there could be no right to security for costs in a cross suit did not apply to the present case as the defence was here complete without the cross bill. The plaintiff must give security for costs or pay 120*l.* into Court.

Bottomry bond—Prior charges on ship.

SHIPPING. C.—Leave to bondholders to pay such prior charges, and to be held to have a lien on the ship, cargo, and freight in respect of such payments.

This was a motion on the part of the legal holders of a bottomry bond on the brig Fair Haven, her cargo and freight in the sum of 5,500*l.* The ship and cargo were arrested, and were under arrest at Liverpool, at the time of the motion, the ship had been abandoned to the bondholders, and there was a probability that the ship and cargo would not be sufficient to satisfy the bond.

* Before Dr. Lushington.

There were charges in respect of towage, pilotage, &c., which had precedence over the bond.

C. P. Butt, on the part of the plaintiffs (the bondholders), now moved the Court for permission to pay all the prior liabilities of the ship, so as to avoid the expense of suits on behalf of the claimants, and to have a lien upon the ship, cargo, and freight in respect of such payments. The motion was grounded on an affidavit of one of the bondholders specifying the principal payments which it was desired to make.

Dr. Lushington.—I could not have granted this motion but for the affidavit which specifies the charges you desire to pay; nothing must be paid beyond those charges, and you must take the responsibility on yourself to see they are correct payments. On looking at the smallness of the amount I grant the motion.

LORDS JUSTICES, June 2, 8, 1866.

Ex parte SAMPSON. Re COBHAM.

14 W. R. 824; L. R. 1 Ch. 476.

Bankruptcy—Adjudication on bankrupt's own petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 93—Statement of debts—Gen. Ord. 1861, rule 4.

Semble, that the statement required by section 93 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and rule 4 of the General Orders of 1861, to be filed by a debtor petitioning for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself, need not include such debts of secured creditors as are fully covered by the securities held by them.

In this case Cobham had been adjudged bankrupt upon his own petition, upon the 18th January, 1866. On the 22nd January he filed the statement of his debts and liabilities, required by section 93 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. On the 6th February assignees were chosen. On the 21st February a Mrs. Macdonald, one of the creditors who had proved her debt, gave notice of motion to annul the adjudication, upon the ground that the statement of debts made by the bankrupt was inaccurate, inasmuch as he had omitted to include therein the debts of two creditors which were fully covered by some securities held by them. On the 5th March the commissioner adjourned the hearing of this application, giving leave to the bankrupt to file an amended statement. On the 15th March the bankrupt filed an amended statement; and on the 11th April the commissioner dismissed the bankrupt's petition with costs, thus annulling the bankruptcy.

The assignees now appealed.

Bacon, Q.C., and Reed, for the appellants.

De Gez, Q.C., and Nalder, for the opposing creditor, the respondent.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that if the respondent had proceeded with more diligence and more consistency, there might possibly have been some ground for granting the application; but so much time had elapsed as in equity to have precluded her title to impeach the bankruptcy, even if that title ever existed. He thought the bankruptcy ought to stand.

TURNER, L.J., said that he was of the same opinion. This was not a question upon the construction of the statute, but of the general orders made thereunder, and it was always within the power of the Court to hold that the circumstances might be such as to take a case out of those orders. In a case of fraud he should be very unwilling to interfere with the commissioner's discretion; but this was merely a question as to the form in which the bankrupt's account ought to be made out. He thought that, looking at section 93 and rule 4, if the value of the security held by the creditor exceeded the amount of his debt, prima facie such a debt need not be included in the statement. He could not see that any fraud could be imputed by reason of this omission, nor that any benefit could result to the creditors from the annulling of the bankruptcy.

The order of the commissioner must be discharged. There would be no costs of the appeal, but the respondent must pay the costs of the original application.

Practice—Bankruptcy—Making order of House of Lords an order of this court in bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY, F.—In a case where the House of Lords, upon an appeal held that a bankruptcy ought to be annulled, and remitted the matter to this court, the Court, upon motion, ordered that the order of the House of Lords be made an order of this Court in bankruptcy, that the bankruptcy be annulled, and that the proper advertisements be inserted in the London Gazette.

This case is reported on appeal before the House of Lords, [1866] E. R. A. 986, where the facts are fully stated. The House of Lords, reversing an order of Lord Westbury, held that the bankruptcy could not be supported, and remitted the matter to this Court.

Higgins, for Mr. Williams, now asked that the order of the House of Lords might be made an order of this Court, and that the bankruptcy might be annulled, and, if necessary, that the matter might be remitted to the commissioner in bankruptcy. He also asked that the deposit paid by the appellant in the appeal in this court might be repaid to him, it having been paid out to the respondent.

Roxburgh for Mr. Harding.

THE LORDS JUSTICES ordered that the order of the House of Lords should be made an order of this Court in bankruptcy; that the bankruptcy should be annulled; and that the necessary notices should be given in the London Gazette. The appellant to have his costs of this application.

Practice—Signature of Deputy-Speaker—Return of deposit.

PARLIAMENT.—The signature of the Deputy-Speaker is sufficient, in the absence of the Speaker, for the return of the Parliamentary deposit.

This was a petition for the return of the Parliamentary deposit, the bill for the construction of the railway having been withdrawn.

The signature of the Speaker is required, by Act of Parliament, to the certificate of a bill having been withdrawn for the purpose of the return of the deposit-money.

The Stockbridge Railway Bill was withdrawn during the illness of the Speaker, and the certificate was signed by Mr. Dodson, the Deputy-Speaker. The question was whether his signature was sufficient.

By the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, p. 91, the Deputy-Speaker is empowered to act for the Speaker in his absence.

Russell Roberts appeared for the company.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I have no doubt the certificate will do. It is only by taking cognisance of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons that I can know who the Speaker is. I can therefore recognise them so far as to notice the appointment of a Deputy-Speaker.

Re GENERAL EXCHANGE BANK.

14 W. R. 826; 14 L. T. 582; 12 Jur. N.S. 465.

Company—Winding-up—Creditor's petition—Bonâ fide dispute as to debt—Costs.

COMPANY. M.—A winding-up order will not be made on a creditor's petition where there is a bonâ fide dispute as to the petitioning creditor's debt. A creditor's petition for winding-up a company was dismissed with costs. Some of the shareholders appeared separately:—Held, that they could not have their costs, as their interests were fully represented by the company.

This was a creditor's petition for winding-up the General Exchange Bank.

The petitioners, Messrs. Clinch & Smith, claimed to be entitled to the winding-up order in respect of a sum of 4,704*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, alleged to be due to them upon a common deposit note, dated September, 1865, which was in the following terms:—

“Received of Messrs. Clinch & Co. 4,704*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, at not less than six months. Note.—This amount can be drawn by cheque at any time.”

This deposit note was part of a transaction by which the company endeavoured to purchase the business of a company at Alexandria and other places in the Mediterranean. Messrs. Scicluna & Borg negotiated the purchase, and Messrs. Clinch & Smith were their agents. The purchase-money was 10,000*l.*, which was to be paid partly in cash and partly in bills, and the balance by the deposit note in question. Two bills for 1,250*l.* each had been given to the petitioners, and afterwards discounted by the bank, and some transactions had taken place in reference to the cash; but it appeared that, in fact, only a small sum, which was due for interest, had actually been paid to the petitioners. After negotiating for some time, the Exchange Bank decided that the arrangement was not within the scope of their articles of association, and it was now at an end. The contention of the company was, that as the arrangement had fallen through, there was nothing due upon the note, and the petitioners were not entitled to the order.

Jessel, Q.C., and J. Napier Higgins, for the petitioners.—The note is a sufficient debt to entitle the petitioners to the order, unless the company can show that there is a bonâ fide dispute as to the debt. They really make no defence at all. It is clear that the debt is due independently of the failure of the negotiation. This is the case of an infant and struggling bank. They might have paid the money into court. The winding-up order is a matter of course upon the refusal to pay the deposit note. It is no use setting up the case of agency here. Our affidavits show that we were not agents at all. They quoted Bowes v. The Hope Life Insurance Company (11 H. L. Cas. 389); Re The Catholic Publishing and Bookselling Company (Limited) (12 W. R. 538; 2 D. J. S. 116).

Selwyn, Q.C., Roxburgh, and Cotterell, for the company.—The affidavits of the petitioners show that they were only the agents of Messrs. Scicluna & Borg, and there is nothing at all now due to them. Even if the transaction were now continuing they would not be entitled to anything, as they were only the agents of Messrs. Scicluna and Borg. But it has come to an end, and the payment was only conditional on the arrangement being carried out. The deposit note is therefore valueless. There never was any debt such as that alleged in the petition. There is no sufficient allegation of the insolvency of the company. It is not sufficient to prove that there is a debt due, you must also prove that the company is unable to pay it. They might have brought an action upon the deposit-note. The petition does not fairly state the facts. It says nothing about the agency of Messrs. Scicluna & Borg. The case of the Hope Life Insurance was that of a judgment debt.

Swanston appeared for the holders of 200 shares.

Caldecott for sixty-eight shareholders.

Jessel in reply.—We are entitled, even if we are the agents of Scicluna & Borg.

June 11.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—In my opinion this is not a case for a winding-up order. There is no evidence of insolvency. The petitioners apply upon the first part of section 80 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provides for the case of the refusal to pay a debt for twenty-one days. This provision was not intended to enforce payment where there is a bonâ fide dispute as to the existence of the debt. The remarks of Lord Justice Turner, in the case of the Catholic Bookselling and Publishing Company apply here. It must be shown that there was an inability to pay debts at the time the petition was presented, and that has not been done here. Here there was a bonâ fide dispute as to the debt, and the company was justified in refusing to pay the claim. There was a question whether the sum claimed was due at all.

There is an apparent inconsistency between the affidavits of the petitioners and that of Mr. Bradley the manager of the bank. The petitioners say that they believe there was no dispute at all as to the money being due, whether the agreement took effect or not. This is directly denied by the manager's affidavit, and, it is said, that to say that there was a dispute is equivalent to saying that the petitioners have committed perjury. In my opinion, this conclusion does not necessarily follow. I am not now in a position to decide whether there was or not nothing due in case of the failure of the agreement; but, in my opinion, there is a bond fide question as to whether anything was or not due. This can only be determined by a suit. The petitioners must pay the costs as against the company. I cannot give the shareholders who have appeared separately their costs. Their interests are fully represented by the company.

This was an application to have the deposition of a witness filed without the signature of the examiners, or to have a subpœna issued for a fresh examination.

The deposition had been taken before Mr. Kenyon Parker, and he died before it was signed. The signature of the examiner to the deposition of a witness is required by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 32 and 34.

Will—Construction—Trustee—Beneficiary.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where a testator bequeathed all his personal estate to A., his executors, administrators, and assigns, "subject to the payment of his debts, funeral, testamentary expenses, and legacies, and to the trusts thereafter mentioned," and then proceeded to declare trusts in the usual form, but which trusts did not exhaust the estate:—Held, that in the absence of anything in the context of the will showing a contrary intention, A., after the fulfilment of the trusts, took the residue of the estate beneficially.

This cause came before the Court on further consideration. The main question raised was whether the defendant, John Cook Hilton, the sole trustee, and one of four executors of the will of one John Cook, took the residue of the said testator's personal estate beneficially or otherwise.

The testator, by his will, bequeathed "all his personal" estate to which he should be entitled at his decease to his grandson, the defendant John Cook Hilton, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral, testamentary expenses, and legacies, and to the trusts thereafter contained." The testator then proceeded to declare trusts of the said "trust moneys" in favour of his two daughters and their children to the extent of 400*l.* per annum and a sum of 9,000*l.* in each case; a trust of the interest of a sum of 400*l.* to one Elizabeth Pickford for life, the corpus to be paid to her children (if any) living at her death, and failing such issue, the testator declared a trust of the said principal sum in favour of his said grandson John Cook Hilton absolutely. The testator, after creating another small annuity in favour of one Mary Ann Deane, directed his trustee or trustees, or trustee for the time being of his will, to set apart a sufficient sum for the purpose of meeting the various annuities, such sum to be charged with the said annuities in exoneration of his personal estate, and then proceeded to direct that "such sum shall, subject to the said annuities, form part of the ultimate surplus of my personal estate."

In creating the specific trusts the testator throughout the will used the words "upon trust."

There were four executors of the will, of whom the defendant was named one.

Bacon, Q.C., and Lewin, for the plaintiff, and Malins, Q.C., and G. O. Morgan, on behalf of those interested in making the defendant's position wholly fiduciary, argued that, no doubt, if a man gives all his estate to A. B. subject to his debts, the donee, after payment of debts, would take everything; but if he goes on to declare trusts, more particularly when the form is the usual one, that presumption is rebutted, and the Court will regard the donee as a mere trustee. The case here was stronger, for the testator had, in the gift of the 400*l.*, contingent on Elizabeth Pickford's death without issue, given the defendant a part of that which it was sought to maintain he was entitled to as a whole. This was imputing an unreasonable intention. Further, the direction that the sum set apart to meet the annuities should form part of the "ultimate surplus" of the testator's estate, led to the inference that the original gift was not a present and beneficial one to the defendant. The monies are also intitled "trust moneys"; and if all are intitled trust moneys, no part can be free from a trust, and when all the designated trusts fail there must be a resulting trust of the residue in favour of the next-of-kin. They cited Salmarsh v. Barrett (29 Beav. 474); Mapp v. Elcock (2 Phil. 793, and 3 H. L. Cas. 492); Barrs v. Fewkes (2 H. & M. 60).

Renshaw, for an executor of one of the next-of-kin in the same interest, took no part in the argument.

Greene, Q.C., and Little.—The whole tenor of the will is to give John Cook Hilton an immediate provision. The gift is to him, his executors, administrators, and assigns. The word assigns would not be used in the ordinary creation of a trust. The words "subject to" must be read as "charged with" and these words would clearly give the donee a beneficial interest in the residue. They cited Dawson v. Clarke (15 Ves. 409, on appeal 18 Ves. 247); Williams v. Roberts (8 Jur. N.S. 18).

Bacon, Q.C., in reply.

STUART, V.C.—This is a case belonging to a class which has exercised to the utmost degree the learning and ingenuity of lawyers, and that of some of the wisest judges that ever sat in court. In Dawson v. Clarke two such men as Lord Eldon and Sir William Grant entirely differed in opinion, and the latter continued to hold his own view after his attention had been drawn to Lord Eldon's opinion.

The difficulty is apparent. In the case of Denison v. King (1 Ves. & Beam. 260)—argued long and ably on the one side by Sir S. Romilly, and on the other by Mr. Leech—Lord Eldon entered at length into the distinction between gifts and devises by will upon trusts, and gift and devises by will subject to trusts, that is, by way of charge. And he uses this language: "If I give to A. and his heirs all my real estate charged with my debts, that is a devise to him for a particular purpose, but not for that purpose only. If the devise is upon trust to pay my debts, that is a devise for a particular purpose and nothing more, and the effect of these two modes admits just this difference—the former is a devise of an estate of inheritance for the purpose of giving the devisee a beneficial interest subject to a particular purpose; the latter is a devise for a particular purpose with no intention to give him a beneficial interest." Nothing can show more clearly the subtle refinements on which these cases have turned. Here, however, the testator has, in the plainest language, given "all his personal estate to John Cook Hilton, subject to debts and legacies, and to the trusts thereafter mentioned"; and afterwards, in mentioning these trusts, the words "upon trust" occur as a matter of course. If the property is given to J. C. Hilton subject to trusts hereinafter mentioned, it cannot, one would think, be subject to any other trusts; and if, after performing the trusts mentioned, no trust is found touching the surplus, that part necessarily remains subject to no trust, and there can be no resulting trust in favour of the next of kin. On the best consideration I can give the present case, it seems to me that it is impossible to find any trust to touch any ultimate surplus except those particularly declared. In Mapp v. Elcock, cited by Mr. Malins, no part of the property was uncovered by the trust, and there it was held that the donee took nothing but a dry legal estate. But even if the words were a gift to A. B. of all the testator's estate "upon trust," the context may supply words from which the Court will infer that it was only given "subject" to certain trusts. For example, in Dawson v. Clarke, also cited in the argument, where property was given upon trust, but chargeable with debts and legacies, the Court held that the trust was only to extend to the amount of those charges. That decision was of the highest authority. Sir W. Grant notices a case in "Chancery Precedents," p. 31, as also a remarkable case as showing how far the Court has gone in holding that a person named as trustee was to take beneficially. The case is Cunningham v. Mellish. Lord Hardwicke afterwards mentions it in Hill v. Bishop of London (1 Atk. 618), with approbation.

I will mention a case before Lord Cowper—Hobart v. Suffolk (2 Ver. 644)—as an illustration of the refinements which have been drawn on this subject. In that case lands were devised to three persons, and their heirs, to the use of them and their heirs, upon the trusts thereafter mentioned, and the testator gave directions to convey a life estate to A., and an estate tail to B., but gave no direction as to the remainder in fee. There the fact of there being three persons led the Court to the inference that there must have been a resulting trust intended, although two of the three trustees were related to the testator. But there is a clear principle governing all these cases. Where an estate is given to one, subject to trusts, there is no right in any one but the donee after those trusts are exhausted. But if the estate be given to a person in the character of a trustee, with nothing to show that any beneficial interest is intended in that case, there must be a resulting trust. Here the most serious ground of difficulty occurs in the use of the expression on trust to stand possessed of the said "trust moneys," to pay such and such persons. Doubtless, if all the moneys were trust moneys in the strict application of language, there would be no part of them free from the obligations of trusts. But we must take the whole context of the will and reconcile one expression with the other. There is, however, no real inaccuracy in talking of the whole fund as trust moneys, where there are certain trusts to be performed out of them. There is nothing to attach a trust to the ultimate surplus. My opinion is that the property goes absolutely to John Cook Hilton, subject to the trusts declared by the testator. The costs will be provided for out of the estate, which, under the circumstances of this case, is the same thing as directing John Cook Hilton to pay them.

STUART, V.C., June 9, 1866.

MARSHALL v. GILLIARD AND OTHERS.

14 W. R. 830; 14 L. T. 618; 12 Jur. N.S. 483.

Demurrer—Multifariousness—Want of Equity.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where a legatee filed a bill for an account against the trustees of the testator's will, making an alleged purchaser of a part of the testator's estate a party, the bill alleging alternatively "that the sale by the trustees was a colourable and fictitious sale," or "that if any such sale were made the defendant (one of the trustees) was himself the real purchaser, and that such purchase by him, being a trustee, could not be sustained."—Held, on a demurrer by the alleged purchaser for multifariousness and want of equity, that he was wrongly made a party.

This was a suit to administer the estate of one George Marshall, of Craike, in the county of York.

The bill was filed by the widow of the testator against the trustees of his will and an alleged fictitious purchaser of a portion of the property sold by the trustees under a trust for sale.

The alleged purchaser demurred for multifariousness and want of equity, and at the bar ore tenus for want of parties. The demurrer ore tenus was not argued. The statement of facts by the bill was as follows:—After setting out the testator's will, making a bequest of furniture, and a further bequest of all the testator's personal estate to two of the defendants, John Gilliard, of Welton, and Philip Gilliard, of Craike, on trust, to sell and to apply the proceeds of such sale to the benefit of the plaintiff for life, and after her decease to the benefit of her children, and a power to the said trustees to carry on the testator's farming and grazing business, if they should think fit to do so rather than sell the same—the bill alleged that the said John Gilliard, of Welton, and Philip Gilliard took possession of the said testator's farm a few years after his death, and carried it on until the year 1863, up to which time no proper accounts of the rents and profits of the same had been rendered; and (par. 10.) "that in the month of April, 1863, the said defendants put up the stock and crops in and upon the said farm for sale by public auction, and they were ostensibly purchased by the defendant John Gilliard, of Craike, a son of the defendant Philip Gilliard. The defendant John Gilliard, of Craike, at the time of the alleged sale, was only a labourer on the said farm, and he was possessed of no means whatever, and was wholly incapable of paying the purchase-money for the stock and crops, and at the time of the said sale no money was paid to the auctioneer, nor was any money paid to him after the said sale, nor has any money passed between the said defendant Philip Gilliard and his son the said John Gilliard, of Craike, since the said sale; that since the said sale or alleged sale the defendant Philip Gilliard remained in possession of the said stock and crops which were purported to be sold to his said son; and after the said sale or alleged sale he acted as if he had become the owner of the said farm, and turned the plaintiff and her family off the said farm." The plaintiff further charged, in par. 11, "that such sale of the said stock and crops was not a bonâ fide sale, but was only a colourable and fictitious sale, or that if any such sale was made the defendant Philip Gilliard was himself the real purchaser, and that such purchase by him, being a trustee of the said testator's will, could not be sustained and was void."

The bill prayed, inter alia—(1) That the trusts of the will of the said testator might be carried into execution under the direction of the Court; (2) that the said sale might be declared void; (3) that an account should be taken of the gains and profits made by the defendants John Gilliard, of Welton, and Philip Gilliard, in carrying on and working the said farm; (4) that the said defendants respectively might be fixed with an occupation rent during the time they respectively had been in occupation of the said homestead on the said farm; (6) that said defendants might be made to pay the costs of the suit.

Bacon, Q.C., and Crossley, for the demurrer, argued that there was no equity as against their client. The allegation of the bill was that he was a fictitious purchaser, and this must be taken to be true. The defendant therefore has nothing, and there could in such case be no possible equity as against him. The bill was multifarious, the plaintiff seeking relief in respect to matters separate and distinct: Salvidge v. Hyde (5 Madd. 138, on app. Jac. 153).

Malins, Q.C., and C. Herbert Smith, contra.—As to want of equity, the allegations in paragraph 10 make a clear case of fraud against the demurring defendant, and this is not displaced by anything inserted alternatively in the subsequent pleading. The utmost the defendant can do is to adopt against us which of the alternative allegations he pleases: Mit. on Plead. 5th ed. p. 48. A defendant against whom fraud is alleged may be made a defendant, although the object is only discovery and that he may be made liable for costs: Beadles v. Burch (10 Sim. 332). As to multifariousness, had Lord Eldon, in Salvidge v. Hyde, had the allegations in the bill properly put before him, he would not have allowed the demurrer. The observations of Lord Cottenham in The Attorney-General v. Cradock (3 My. & Cr. 96), confirm this. In the latter case, collusion being alleged, the purchaser from a trustee was held rightly joined as a defendant in a bill for an account against the trustee. The allegations here are equally strong.

STUART, V.C.—I think this bill is clearly multifarious, and insufficient to show a case of equity against this defendant. The facts alleged in the bill must be taken to be true. Here the allegation is that the trustees and executors of the will improperly took certain portions of the testator's estate and sold them, and at that sale this demurring defendant was the purchaser, but that the sale was a fictitious one, and the demurring defendant never entered into possession. Now, on the question of equity, if it is to be taken to be true that this was a fictitious sale, there was no sale at all. I have already intimated that this John Gilliard, of Craike, who was, as I think, improperly made a defendant, might very properly have been called as a witness; but it is clear to me that there is no equity against him. There are here no circumstances affecting him. There is nothing to discover, as was said in the case cited by Mr. Smith (Beadles v. Burch), although there is a general allegation that all defendants may pay costs, there are no charges to show that he is a proper party for the purpose of discovery, or that one in that character ought to be made to pay costs. His name is not mentioned in the prayer of the bill, although there are general words which, if he had any of the estate in his hands, might justify the argument found in the Attorney-General v. Cradock; but as there is nothing of the kind, I cannot see any case for bringing him before the Court. Then as to multifariousness, I consider that the case of Salvidge v. Hyde has established the great principle—that if there be a suit for the administration of the assets of a testator, and the bill allege that the trustees or executors have improperly entered into a contract for sale, under circumstances such as ought to afford grounds to set such sale aside, the question of the validity of that contract is a question entirely separate from the object of the suit, namely, the administration of the estate. In Salvidge v. Hyde, Lord Eldon says, "If an executor having a power to sell, agrees to sell to A. B., can a bill be filed against him, and also for a general administration of the estate? He may have made infinitely too good a bargain with the trustee to sell—one that this court would not allow to stand—but that is no ground for making him a party to the general administration. The case must depend on the charges of the bill. They may be such as to unite persons ordinarily disunited. If the allegations in the bill connect the other party with the purchaser by collusion, I do not dispute that he is properly joined; but here is a failure of that ground, because the bill does not allege any connection between the purchaser by Culliford and the purchase by Laying. The case must depend on the charges in the bill. They may be such as to unite the parties ordinarily disunited." That is the general doctrine, on the correctness of which I have not the slightest doubt. I admit I thought at one time that Lord Eldon had gone too far and omitted to give sufficient weight to the charges in the bill in Salvidge v. Hyde, but on a more mature consideration I am quite clear that Lord Eldon's judgment was correct as to every part of the bill. In the present case I am of opinion that the purchaser has been improperly made a party to this bill. The allegation in the bill is that he is a fictitious purchaser, and if so, there is no pretence for making him a party.

RIGG, Administratrix, v. THE MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 834; 12 Jur. N.S. 525.

Negligence—Railway—Dangerous structure—Opinion of witnesses.

CARRIERS. B.—A., a passenger, was running arm-in-arm with another man along a platform belonging to a railway company, and used as a footpath from the station to a steamboat pier. The platform was 4ft. 3in. broad, with a fence at the back, and a curb, 9in. high between it and the rails. A. fell on the rails and was run over by a train:—Held, in an action by A.'s administratrix, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the railway company to go to the jury, inasmuch as the platform was reasonably safe for persons using it in a reasonable manner, and that the mere opinion of witnesses that it was dangerous, unsupported by any reasons, should not be left to the jury.

The plaintiff sued as administratrix of John Rigg under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), and she sought to recover damages consequent upon her husband being killed, through the alleged negligence of the defendants, for the benefit of his family. At the trial before Keating, J., at Leeds, the following facts were proved:—

The defendants had a railway to New Holland, in Lincolnshire, where they had a station, and from this station the railway was continued to a pier on the Banks of the Humber, from which their steamboats started. The distance from the station to the pier was 330 yards, and a platform, which belonged to the defendants, ran parallel to, and 2ft. 2in. from the line of the rails from one point to the other. The platform was 4ft. 3in. broad, with a railing on the side furthest from the rails, and a curb, 9in. high, on the side nearest to them, and the platform itself was 9in. above the rails. There was also a notice-board warning passengers not to go too near the edge of the platform. The platform was used as a pathway from the station to the pier, and also for passengers to get in and out of the railway carriages; and it had been used in the same way for twenty years without accident. Trains passed along by the side of the platform at about seven miles an hour. The deceased and another man were passengers by one of the defendants' steam-boats, and were lawfully on the platform, on their way from the station to the pier, before dark, on the 13th of August, 1865. They had both been drinking, but it was said by the survivor, they could take care of themselves. Hearing the bell ringing for the train to start from the station to the pier, they ran arm-in-arm along the platform towards the steam-boat, when the deceased stumbled and fell on the rails, and was run over and killed by the passing train.

The jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiff for 200*l.*, a rule was obtained, pursuant to leave reserved, to enter it for the defendants, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

Wills showed cause.—The construction of the premises alone is evidence of negligence—first, on account of the narrowness of the platform; and, secondly, on account of the absence of protection between the platform and the rails. [WILLES, J.—Suppose there were a path of the same breadth along the bank of a river, and a man chooses to read the newspaper and so walks into the water, could he claim to have a fence put up?] This is not like the case of an ordinary footpath, where you can trespass extra viam to escape the danger.

The following cases were cited:—Bilbee v. The London, Brighton, and South-Coast Railway Company (13 W. R. 779; 34 L. J. C.P. 182); Crafter v. The Metropolitan Railway Company (14 W. R. 334; 1 L. R. C.P. 300); Longmore v. The Great Western Railway Company (19 C. B. N.S. 183).

Manisty, Q.C., and Kemplay, were not called on to support the rule.

ERLE, C.J.—This rule must be made absolute, because there is no evidence of want of due care on the part of the defendants in the performance of their duty. No doubt a person in a proper state, and with proper care, could walk safely along this platform. The complaint is that it was too narrow for two abreast. The facts are, that the two men were running along arm-in-arm, and that each of them was deprived of some part of his power and caution by drink; but there is no evidence of want of due care in the construction of the platform itself. It is idle to say that a man cannot walk on a platform 4ft. 3in. broad, and it is idle to say that a railway company is bound to provide one on which you can walk arm-in-arm. It might as well be said that there ought to be room for three abreast. Many witnesses said that the platform was, in their opinion, dangerous; but that simple expression is no evidence to go to the jury. They should say that it was dangerous because it was slippery, or for some other reason, and then that reason would be a fact for the jury. It is unnecessary to go into the question of contributory negligence.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It ought to have been shown that the platform was unsafe for use by a human being; or that in practice it had been found dangerous. On both those points the evidence is in favour of the defendants. It was not shown that it would make people giddy to walk along the platform, or anything of that sort; and the only evidence of its being dangerous was, that a child once got into a position of danger upon it, but that people who are grown up could take care of themselves. As to the opinions of witnesses that the place was dangerous, if that were made evidence it would be putting them in the place of the jury. On that point, I entirely concur with what was laid down by Smith, J., in Crafter v. The Metropolitan Railway Company.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not always very easy to say what amounts to evidence to go to the jury, but on the whole I now clearly think there was none in this case. The obligation on the company is to make a platform reasonably safe, and they do that, if people using it in a reasonable way can traverse it in perfect safety.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. As I said in Crafter v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, it is not merely evidence suggestive of improvement which will constitute evidence of negligence to go to the jury. The defendants were bound to provide a way which persons not using extraordinary but ordinary care could traverse in safety. There was here no secret danger, and the construction of the platform was perfectly obvious to every one who used it.

Rule absolute.

DIXON v. BATY AND ANOTHER.

14 W. R. 836; L. R. 1 Ex. 259; 12 Jur. N.S. 1024.

Ejectment—Landlord and tenant—Waste land—Adverse occupation—Twenty years' title.

LIMITATIONS (STATUTES OF).—The presumption of law that a tenant of a close occupying waste lands contiguous to his close does so for the benefit of his landlord, does not apply where the tenant is in occupation of the waste land before entering upon his tenancy.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover possession of a strip of land, lying between the plaintiff's close and the highway. It was tried at the Newcastle Spring Assizes, before Mellor, J., when a verdict was found for the defendants.

The facts, so far as they are material for the purposes of the present report were these—The locus in quo had been adversely occupied by Peter Elliott, predecessor of the defendants, who at that time lived in a house on the other side of the road, and he had erected thereon a garth, carpenters' shop, and saw-pit. Subsequently Peter Elliott became tenant of the close adjoining the locus in quo, then in the possession of Dixon, one of the predecessors in estate of the plaintiff. The defendants set up a twenty years' adverse possession of the land claimed, and in evidence showed that Peter Elliott had occupied it some eight or nine years before he became tenant of the plaintiff's close, which took place some seventy-one years ago. There was a great deal of contradictory evidence given. The learned Judge directed the jury that it was not necessary to prove twenty years' adverse possession before the tenancy of the plaintiff's close, but that if the occupation of the defendants had been adverse since, as well as before that event, they were entitled to a verdict. The jury found that the defendants' possession, and that of those from whom they claimed, was adverse throughout, and that they had never paid any rent for the locus in quo.

Temple, Q.C., moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. He also moved for a new trial on the ground of surprise. The defendants have set up as a defence to this action, an adverse possession of twenty years; and in point of fact they can only show such adverse possession for eight or nine years, as the moment they became tenants of the plaintiff's close, the presumption of adverse possession was at an end, and the defendants presumably occupied the locus in quo for the benefit of the plaintiff. [MARTIN, B.—The occupation of the defendants' adverse at first would continue so after the tenancy in the absence of evidence to the contrary.]

The fact of the defendants accepting a lease from the plaintiff is sufficient to show that he admitted the plaintiff's title. When a tenant encroaches upon waste land contiguous to his tenement, he is presumed to do so for the benefit of the tenement.

MARTIN, B.—You are not entitled to a rule on this point. You may take a rule on the ground of surprise.

POLLOCK, C.B., and PIGOTT, C., concurred.

Rule accordingly.

Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 53, 55—Ship—Transfer—Bill of sale.

SHIPPING. A.—A registered ship may cease to be a ship transferable only by bill of sale in other ways than those provided for by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 53. And whether a vessel has ceased to be a ship or not is a question of fact.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the Court without pleadings. The material facts of the case were the following:—

The defendants were a steam navigation company, and in 1853 carried mails, passengers, and goods between England and ports in the Indian Ocean and Australia. They had a coaling station at King George's Sound, Western Australia. In 1853 they purchased the Larkins, an old three-masted wooden vessel, till then used as a sailing vessel, and at that time duly registered as such. The defendants caused her to be newly registered, and immediately afterwards loaded her with coals and sent her out to King George's Sound, where she arrived 11th July, 1853, having made the voyage in the same manner as any ordinary sailing ship. Immediately upon her arrival all her masts, spars, and rigging (except the lower masts and standing rigging) were taken down, sent on shore, and warehoused; she was moored fore and aft by two anchors; and her officers and crew were all discharged except two men. From this time forward the Larkins remained in the same position, and was used as a coaling hulk and workshop, and had never since been used in any other way.

The plaintiffs' company was incorporated in 1856, and in the latter part of that year they undertook the service between England, the Indian Ocean, and Australia, in place of the defendants, who gave it up. At this time a written agreement was entered into between the two companies, by article 2 of which the plaintiffs agreed to purchase, and the defendants to sell, "the coal hulk Larkins," for 6,000*l.* The Larkins was then handed over to the plaintiffs. On the 7th May, 1857, an invoice was sent by the defendants to the plaintiffs, in which the Larkins was described as "the hulk Larkins." In October of the same year the plaintiffs accepted a bill for a sum which included the price of the Larkins, and this bill was never paid. The defendants, in May, 1859, regained possession of the Larkins without the consent of the plaintiffs, and refused to re-deliver her, but converted her to their own use. The Court was to draw inferences of fact.

The plaintiffs contended that the property in the Larkins had passed to and vested in them in May, 1859, and that the defendants were not entitled to resume possession.

The defendants contended that the property never passed to the plaintiffs, or else that the defendants were entitled to retake possession.

The question for the Court was whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Horace Lloyd (Maude with him), for the plaintiffs.—This is, in substance, a question between the general body of the plaintiffs' creditors, and the defendants, unpaid vendors. The question is whether the property in the Larkins passed by the sale to the plaintiffs or remained in the defendants. And this depends upon whether she was a ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 55, so as to be transferable only by bill of sale, or was a mere hulk capable of being transferred like any other chattel. This is a mere question of fact, and the Larkins had, in fact, for three years, been dismantled, ceased to be a ship, and become a mere floating hulk and workshop. According to the contention on the other side, if a ship were turned into a landing-stage, or even were brought on shore and used as a dwelling-house, it would still be a ship for the purpose of the Act. And the Act (section 2) confines the word ship to "vessels used in navigation."

Mellish, Q.C.—The true principle is that a registered ship remains a ship, for all the purposes of the Act, so long as she may sail the seas without any fresh registry. And here it is clear that no penalty would have been incurred if the Larkins had put to sea (which she was perfectly capable of doing) without a fresh registry. So that, according to the plaintiffs' argument, she was entitled to all the privileges of a British ship without any of the liabilities. The temporary use of a ship for some other purpose than navigation cannot change its character. [CHANNELL, B.—Here there was not a mere temporary suspension of the use of a ship as such, but a permanent abandonment of it.] Section 53 really governs the case. That section provides that "if any registered ship is actually or constructively totally lost, taken by the enemy, burnt or broken up, or if by reason of a transfer to any persons not qualified to be owners of British ships, or of any other matter or thing, any such ship as aforesaid ceases to be a British ship," notice is to be given, and the certificate of registry delivered up. This section clearly contemplates that when any of the contingencies mentioned occurs, the certificate shall be delivered up; and that, except as there provided for, the ship shall be a registered ship for all purposes, subject to the burdens, as well as enjoying the benefits, belonging to such ships.

Horace Lloyd replied.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think the Larkins had ceased to be a ship at the time of the sale.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the Larkins was what the parties described it to be—a hulk. It had once been a ship, but four years previously it had been prepared as a coaling hulk and workshop. Then it was sold as a hulk; and the invoice describes it in the same way. And there is no indication that the parties intended ever to use it in any other way. Section 55, which provides for the transfer by the bill of sale, applies only to "British ships." And the form of transfer (Form E) clearly shows that nothing is meant which is not to be propelled by steam or sails. At any rate, it is not open to the defendants, who sold this as a hulk, to contend that it was a ship.

CHANNELL, B.—Mr. Mellish argues that, as matter of law, a registered ship continues to be so, and to be transferable only by bill of sale, until it has ceased to be a registered ship in some of the ways provided by the 55th section. And we have to say whether that is so, or whether we are at liberty to treat the question as a question of fact. I think the question is one of fact, and that this was not a ship.

BAIN v. GREGORY.

14 W. R. 845; 14 L. T. 601.

Bill of exchange—Notice of dishonour.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. G.—A bill of exchange was accepted payable at the office of a person who, on the day upon which the bill became due, was the holder of it. Before the close of the day, the bill not having been taken up, he wrote to his indorser as follows:—"Yours and Packer's note of hand is now due, and your attention to same will oblige":—Held, that this letter was a sufficient notice of dishonour.

Action on a bill of exchange for 20l., drawn by the defendant upon Packer, accepted by him payable at the office of the plaintiff, and indorsed by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Second plea.—That the defendant had not had due notice of the dishonour of the bill. Issue thereon.

The cause of action not exceeding 50l., Blackburn, J., made an order in accordance with the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26, sending the cause to a county court for trial.

At the trial it appeared that the plaintiff was at his office, where the bill was made payable, during the whole of the day upon which it became due, and that some time before the close of that day he wrote a letter to the defendant in the following terms:—

"Sir,—Yours and Packer's note of hand is now due, and your attention to same will oblige.—Yours, &c."

No other notice of dishonour was given.

The verdict was in substance for the defendant, but the county court judge, with the return of the registrar certifying the result of the trial, sent up a special verdict which, upon the second plea, found that there was no due notice of dishonour.

A rule having been obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that the letter was a sufficient notice of dishonour,

Macnamara showed cause against it, and contended that the letter contained no statement that the bill had not been paid, and that no case had gone so far as to say that a notice not containing any such statement either expressly or by implication would be good. He cited Hartley v. Case (4 B. & C. 339) as an authority that a notice of dishonour must show that payment had not been made by the acceptor.

H. Matthews, in support of the rule.—Baily v. Porter (4 M. & W. 44) is conclusive in favour of the plaintiff, and has been cited with approval in Paul v. Joel (6 W. R. 632; 3 H. & N. 455; s. c. in Ex. Ch. 7 W. R. 287; 4 H. & N. 355); Hartley v. Case (4 B. & C. 339) is not in point, for in that case the defendant could not gather from the circumstances that the bill had not been paid as he could have done in the present case. Solarte v. Palmer (7 Bing. 530; 2 Cl. & Fin. 93) is the strongest case against the plaintiff, but that case has been much restricted by the later decisions: Caunt v. Thompson (7 C. B. 400).

LUSH, J.—I think that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff, on the ground that the letter was a sufficient notice of dishonour. The decision in Baily v. Porter is in accordance with common sense, and the principle which it lays down should be followed. I think that only such a notice is necessary as would show to men of business habits that the bill had not been paid. In the present case the defendant knew that the bill was payable at the plaintiff's office, and the terms of the letter were, in my opinion sufficient to show him that the bill had not been paid.

Rule absolute to enter the verdict for the plaintiff.

Re CHAUNCEY.

14 W. R. 849.

Trustee Act, 1850—Lunatic trustee—Vesting order.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Out of four trustees of a settlement one was a lunatic, so found by inquisition, and another was, through ill-health, unfit to act,

The Court appointed two new trustees in their room, and made an order that the real estates subject to the settlement should vest in the new trustees jointly with the two continuing old ones, and that the right to call for a transfer of some stock, also subject to the settlement, should vest in the same persons.

This was a petition in lunacy, and under the Trustee Act, for the appointment of new trustees of a settlement, and for a vesting order. There were four trustees in whom the trust property was vested. Of these one was a lunatic, who had been found so by inquisition, and another was in a state of health which rendered him unfit to act in the trust.

Graham Hastings, for the petitioners, cited Re Davies (3 M. & Gor. 278); Re Omerod (7 W. R. 71, 3 De G. & J. 249); Re Stewart (8 W. R. 297).

W. W. Karslake for a respondent.

The LORDS JUSTICES made the order prayed for, appointing the two persons proposed as new trustees, and vesting the real estate, subject to the settlement, and the right to call for a transfer of the stock subject thereto, in the new trustees jointly with the two continuing trustees.

ROMILLY, M.R., May 23, 1866.

ABINGTON v. GREEN.

14 W. R. 852.

Lost deed—Secondary evidence.

EVIDENCE. D.—Where a deed has been lost, it is not necessary to prove the actual fact of the loss.

A policy had been mortgaged to secure a debt, and the deed was missing after the death of the mortgagee, but had been in existence a short time before. The Court refused to assume that the mortgagee had cancelled the deed when in extremis, and allowed secondary evidence of its existence.

The plaintiff in this case was the executor of Joseph Mayor, who had employed the defendant as his agent. The defendant had deposited with the testator a policy granted, in 1818, originally for 2,000*l.*, but now of the value of at least 4,500*l.* The policy was endorsed "Pay contents to Joseph Mayor, Harley, Staffordshire." On the 12th of June, 1851, a deed was executed securing on the policy 2,500*l.* This deed was missing after the death of the testator, which happened in June, 1860. Secondary evidence was put in to prove the deed. The original draft and a copy were produced, and it was proved that, six months before the testator's death, he had sent the deed to be stamped, and had paid the penalty. He had also given notice of the charge to the insurance office. The bill prayed for accounts of what was owing upon the security, and to have the policy sold.

Southgate, Q.C., and White, for the plaintiff, contended that the facts were sufficient to rebut any presumption that the testator had destroyed the deed in his lifetime.

Walford, for the defendant, contended that there was no allegation of the deed having been actually lost, and that it was probable that the testator had only intended to keep the security on foot during his lifetime, and had it destroyed when he was in extremis, with the intention of cancelling the debt. He insisted that the servants in the testator's house at the time of his death ought to have been examined.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I think the plaintiff is entitled to the decree prayed for. It is not necessary to prove the actual fact of the loss. I am perfectly satisfied that if the servants had been examined they would not have given any evidence bearing upon the question. The decree will be for an account of what is due for principal, interests, and costs, and for a sale of the policy, with power to make an arrangement out of court.

It was stated that an arrangement would probably be made between the parties to avoid a sale.

Re ALEXANDRA PARK COMPANY, SHARON'S CLAIM.

14 W. R. 855; 12 Jur. N.S. 482.

Contract—Payment in shares—Subsequent winding-up.

WORK AND LABOUR.—A company stipulated with a contractor that he should accept part payment for his work, if and when required, in paid-up shares of the company:—Held, that they could not force him to accept shares in such part payment after a winding-up order had been made, as they had not exercised their option to do so previously to the winding-up.

Mr. Sharon had contracted for certain remuneration to make roads for the above-mentioned company.

The roads had been handed over to the company in September, 1864. Mr. Sharon claimed his remuneration. The company claimed to make a deduction on account of a clause in the contract, which provided that Mr. Sharon should "if and when required by the company" accept payment of two-thirds of the amount of his remuneration in fully paid-up shares of the company, equal in nominal value to the said two-thirds.

The company having now been wound up, the question arose whether Mr. Sharon was bound to receive any part of his payment in paid-up shares (which were much depreciated) under a notice to that effect served on him since the winding-up.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for Sharon the applicant, contended that the company could not pass off worthless shares on the contractor, such not having been the original intention of the agreement.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Stevens, for the official manager, contended that subsequent events could have no effect on the original contract: Gibson v. Goldsmid (3 W. R. 79; 5 D. M. G. 757).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R., held that as the shares were very much depreciated, and the company had not exercised their option to make part payment in shares previously to the winding-up, they could not now exercise such option, and give what was practically worthless in return for services for which they had contracted to pay value, and the contractor must be allowed to prove for the whole amount of his claim.

Winding-up—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 160)—G. O. under the Act, rr. 49, 50.

COMPANY. M.—The Court or judge in chambers has jurisdiction to rescind a compromise made with a contributory by the official liquidator under section 160, if obtained by misrepresentation.

This was a summons adjourned from chambers.

The Court had, under section 160 of the Act, sanctioned a compromise between the official liquidator and the contributory, which had been accordingly carried into effect. The official liquidator now sought to have the compromise set aside, alleging that it had been obtained by the misrepresentation of the contributory, who had underrated the value of his property.

Wickens, for the contributory, objected that the Court had no jurisdiction to set the compromise aside unless a bill had been filed. The jurisdiction here was not the ordinary equitable one, but statutory.

Glasse, Q.C., and Cotton, for the official liquidator, referred to Garstin's case (10 W. R. 457).

KINDERSLEY, V.C., thought that in matters which might be compromised without the sanction of the Court, the Court would have no jurisdiction to set aside a compromise in the manner now asked; but where, as in the present case, the sanction of the judge in chambers was necessary before the compromise could be made, he thought the judge had jurisdiction afterwards to set it aside. The fraud, if any, had brought the parties before the Court for its approval.

Practice—Exceptions to answer—Word mis-spelt in interrogatory—Costs.

DISCOVERY. B.—Where an interrogatory is too sweeping in its terms, an exception to the answer overruled on a mere technicality will be overruled with costs.

Exceptions to answer.

The bill was filed to restrain the defendant from infringing the patent, of which plaintiff was the assignee, for an invention for "improvements in preparing colouring matters for dyeing and printing."

One of the interrogatories was as follows:—"Has not the defendant within the last twelve months purchased some, and what quantities of rosaline,¹ roseine, magenta, iodine, &c. (here follow the names of other chemicals), and also some, and what quantity of iodine and bromide, or some, or one, and which, of such substances or ingredients? Let the defendant set forth the date upon which each portion of the said ingredients, or of any and what compound of them, or any of them was delivered on the defendant's premises. Let the defendant set forth the name and address of each person who sold, and each person who delivered each of the said substances, ingredients, and compounds, to or at the defendant's premises. Let the defendant set forth the sum paid by him, and any servant, clerk, or agent of his, and also the sum agreed to be paid by him and any servant, &c., of his in respect of each of the said substances, ingredients, and compounds. Let the defendant set forth the use which the defendant, his servants, &c., have made of each of the said substances, &c., and let him fully account for each packet and parcel of the same, and of the application, use, and disposal thereof. Let the defendant state what manufacture of colouring matter he has carried on during the last twelve months, and what are the ingredients used in manufacturing each article of colouring matter manufactured by him, and what number of articles he has manufactured, and what quantity of materials or ingredients (specifying the exact name and description) he has used in the manufacture of each article manufactured by him. Let the defendant set forth a full and true account of all the substances, ingredients, and materials used in the manufacture of dyes which the plaintiff now has upon his premises, and when, and under what circumstances and for what purpose he required the same."

To this interrogatory the defendant answered as to the quantities of iodine, and other chemicals, with the exception of the "rosaniline," and as to the dates of the delivery; but submitted that he ought not to be compelled to answer as to the names and addresses of any persons who sold or delivered any roseine, &c., or as to the sum paid by him, &c. The plaintiff therefore excepted to the answer for insufficiency. In the copy of the interrogatories served upon the defendant, the word "rosaniline" was mis-spelled "rosaline."

Giffard, Q.C., and Swanston, in support of the exceptions.—The answer carefully excludes the "rosaline," which is one of the most important substances.

Rolt, Q.C., and G. Waugh, for the defendant.—The exceptions are clearly wrong, as we were not required to answer as to "rosaniline," the word in the copy of the interrogatories served upon us being "rosaline," and not

(1) Sic.

"rosaniline." The exception is so very trumpery, that we are entitled to insist on this mere technicality. Rosaniline, roseine, and magenta are practically the same thing.

Giffard, Q.C., in reply.

Wood, V.C., said he must overrule the exceptions, as they were technically wrong, though, looking to the substance and merits of the case, it was important for the plaintiff to be informed about "rosaniline," which was different from roseine and the other substances. As to the costs, he could not conceive anything more oppressive than this interrogatory. [His Honour then read the interrogatory, commenting on its sweeping nature], and he must, therefore, overrule the exceptions with costs.

PARSONS v. HIND.

14 W. R. 860.

Fixtures—Hydraulic press—Mode of annexation—How much—Object and purpose of.

FIXTURES.—A hydraulic press was fixed by means of bricks and mortar to the floor of a factory. The press in question was not essential to the carrying on of the works at the factory, but merely a convenience:—Held, that such a press remained a chattel, and did not become a part of the freehold.

This was a rule nisi, obtained by O'Brien, Serjt., calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the damages given on the verdict obtained, should not be reduced by the sum of 50*l.*, pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that the property in the hydraulic press never vested in the plaintiff, but continued in the defendants until the time of the removal.

The declaration charged the defendants with breaking and entering the plaintiff's premises, and with the conversion of plaintiff's goods.

Verdict for the plaintiff: 3*l.* damages, for the breaking and entering; 50*l.* damages, for the conversion.

The facts of the case were as follows:—The plaintiff, the owner of a factory in Nottingham, on July 28, 1863, contracted to sell it to two persons, by name King & Ellis, respectively. King & Ellis entered into possession of the factory, but there was no conveyance and no payment of the purchase-money. On June 5, 1865, King & Ellis were adjudicated bankrupts. The assignees elected not to adopt the contract of King & Ellis to purchase the factory. The effects of King & Ellis were, by order of the assignees, sold by auction; but a hydraulic press, which is the subject of the present action, was not sold. Subsequently to the auction, Henry Hind, one of the defendants, bought the press of the auctioneers for 35*l.* The plaintiff refused to allow the press to be removed, on the ground that it was so fixed as to be a part of the freehold, and that the property in it had never vested in the assignees in bankruptcy. The three defendants thereupon broke into the factory, and removed the press.

Wills (Digby Seymour, Q.C., with him), now shewed cause. He cited Weeton v. Woodcock (7 M. & W. 14), Walmsley v. Milne (8 W. R. 138; 29 L. J. C.P. 97).

O'Brien, Serjt., and L. Cave, in support of rule, cited Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Ex. 295), Lancaster v. Eve (7 W. R. 260; 5 C.B. N.S. 717), Martin v. Roe (5 W. R. 263; 7 E. & B. 248).

BLACKBURN, J.—This rule must be made absolute. The rule is to reduce the damages by 50l., and it must be made absolute on the ground that the press never was a part of the freehold, but always a mere chattel. Whether or no a thing remains a chattel, or becomes a part of the freehold, is often difficult to decide, turning as it does on a question of more or less. We think, however, that the press in question was clearly a chattel. In the case of things built into the wall of the freehold, it is often doubtful whether or no they become a part of the freehold. It is certain, of course, that bricks and such like things, which are brought on a wall and there fixed, become a part of the freehold. It is equally certain that mere moveables which are fixed to the freehold for convenience do not become a part of the freehold. But there are also the intermediate cases, which are not so clear, and about which the distinction is often fine. There are generally three classes—first, those cases where a chattel still remains a chattel, being merely fixed for convenience, like the clock in court, which, though firmly fixed, and though, probably, it could not be moved without disturbing the plaster, yet no one could doubt that it remains a chattel, and does not become a part of the freehold. Then there is another class where chattels are fixed for the better enjoyment of the freehold, but subject to a right to remove them. These are what are generally called fixtures. Then there is a third class where chattels are fixed to the freehold, and which cannot be removed. The second class must be removed in a reasonable time; and unless we had thought that the press in question belonged to the first class, we should have had to have decided whether the reasonable time for removal had not elapsed, but we do think that the press remains a mere chattel. Hellawell v. Eastwood gives the two guiding points to determine whether or no the article remains a chattel. Nevertheless the question must always be one of more or less. The guiding points in Hellawell v. Eastwood are these—1. The mode of annexation, and how much; 2. The object and purpose of the annexation. Under the second point the question is whether the chattel is annexed perpetui usus causâ, for the improvement of the freehold, or whether the annexation is merely for the sake of the better enjoyment of the chattel? The second point is of almost as great importance as the first point, viz., the degree of fastening. I find that in the case of Lancaster v. Eve (7 W. R. 260; 5 C.B. N.S. 717), where certain piles had been fixed in a navigable river, Mr. Justice Williams says, “No doubt the maxim ‘Quicquid plantatur solo solo cedit,’ is well established, the only question is, What is meant by it? It is clear the mere putting a chattel into the soil by another cannot alter the ownership of the chattel. To apply the maxim there must be such a fixing to the soil as reasonably to lead to the inference that it was intended to be incorporated with the soil.” The language here would seem to shew (and the learned judge was always very accurate in the use of his language) that it is of very great importance, where a thing is planted in the soil so that it becomes part of it, to see what is the object with which the thing has been so attached to the soil. If it is attached to improve the soil, then even if there is a right to remove it, it becomes a part of the premises. So in Reg. v. Lee most of the things in question were necessary for the gas-works. The object was to improve the premises, and there was the intention to incorporate the things with the freehold. Again, in Martin v. Roe (5 W. R. 263; 7 E. & B. 248), Lord Campbell applies the same test of intention, he says, “When, however, the cases between executor of tenants for life and remaindermen are looked into, they will be found to turn each on its peculiar circumstances—the character, the use, the mode of attachment, the facility of severance, the injury to the freehold by severance. In regard to an ecclesiastical benefice, the character and object of the building to which the chattel is attached seem of very great consequence in determining whether there was any intention to separate it permanently and irrevocably from the personal estate. Here there is an erection in itself purely a matter of luxury and ornament, which the testator might have pulled down, but which he probably wished to enjoy as long as he lived, and therefore did not remove. To this, and for the purpose of completing that luxurious and ornamental creation, a chattel is so attached that it may be detached without injury to the freehold. We think that the inference is, that it never ceased to be a chattel during the testator's life, and that it continued to be so at the moment of his death, and therefore passed, as part of the personal estate, to the executors." Lord Campbell, therefore, in considering whether the mortar made the chattel a part of the freehold, looks at the object with which the chattel was fixed with mortar. Could one reasonably infer, as Williams, J., says in Lancaster v. Eve, an intention to incorporate the chattel with the freehold? Now, apply the rule laid down in these cases to the present case. It appears that there was some fixing with mortar, but not much. The press itself was great and bulky; hence, whether or no it was mortared down, the joists would have had to be removed in order to apply machinery sufficiently strong to move it, so the removal of the joists is not very important; and we have seen mere annexation is not enough; but after it has been seen how much annexation there is, we must see what is the object of the annexation. Now the object, it seems to us, was not to improve the premises, nor was the press in question essential to the carrying on of the factory-works, like most of the things in the gas-work case, Reg. v. Lee, nor was it a thing like a fireplace, but a machine brought into the factory for convenience, just like an ordinary table. Therefore we think the mortaring did not make the press a part of the factory. It was not a part of the freehold, therefore the property of the press was in the assignees, and the plaintiff can recover no damages for the seizure of the press, though he can for wrongful entry.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the press in question was a chattel, and not a part of the freehold. From the evidence given at the trial the press appears to have been just one of those chattels which require steadyding, and for that purpose are fixed to the freehold; and then on the facts it appears that the press, being so far attached for the purpose of steadyding it, was by the defendants removed, without doing any real damage to the inheritance. If one could see, as in the gas-works case, an intention that the chattel should remain fixed to the factory so long as the factory remained a factory, then we might think the press to be sufficiently fixed to become a part of the freehold, but here we see no such intention. The press here was a mere additional convenience brought into the factory for temporary uses, and not changing or affecting the character of the building. Therefore, although at one time I doubted, from the insufficient evidence before us, as to the nature of the factory, and the purposes for which the press was used, I am clearly of opinion that the press did not become a part of the freehold, but remained a chattel.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion, neither of the tests makes out that this press is a fixture. It was not brought in to add to the value of the inheritance; it was fixed for the more convenient use of it. It was a chattel, moreover, which could well be used in many other businesses than that carried on in the factory in question. The evidence shewed that such presses were constantly sold second-hand. It could be removed without damage to the freehold.

Rule absolute.

Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 34 Bye-law—Notice of intended building.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. D.—The Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 34, empowers every local board “to make bye-laws (inter alia) with respect to the structure of walls of new buildings;” “and further to provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein any such provision as they may think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to erect new buildings,” and certain other matters:—Held, that this section does not empower a local board by a bye-law to require persons to wait a month after the giving of notice and deposit of plans and sections before beginning to build.

This was a case stated by the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The material facts disclosed by the case were the following:—

At petty sessions holden for the division of Keighley, an information was preferred, on the 1st December, 1864, by the respondent, the clerk to the local board for the district of Keighley, against the appellants, under the twenty-fourth bye-law of the board, made the 19th July, and confirmed by the Secretary of State the 24th August, 1864.

The information charged the appellants that they, on the 4th October, 1865, at the parish of Keighley, before beginning to erect a certain new building situate at Mill Hill, in Keighley, &c., did neglect to leave with the clerk to the board a written notice of one month at least, at one of the monthly meetings of the board, accompanied by detail plans and sections of such building as required by bye-law 24, contrary to such bye-law, and contrary to the statute.

The appellants were convicted and fined five shillings.

The terms of the bye-law, so far as they are material, were as follows:—“Before beginning to dig or lay the foundation of or for any new house or building, or to re-erect any house or building, a written notice thereof of one month, at the least, shall be left with the clerk at one of the monthly meetings of the board, accompanied with detail plans and sections of every floor of such house or building, drawn to a scale of not less than an inch to every eight feet, shewing, &c., accompanied therewith shall also be a block plan drawn to a scale of not less than one inch to every thirty feet, shewing &c., and the said descriptions, plans and sections, when approved, or a correct copy or tracing thereof shall be left with the board.” “And whosoever shall neglect or refuse to give such said notice and description accompanied with the proper plans and sections, or to leave with the board such description and plans and sections, or correct tracings thereof, or shall erect or re-erect any house, building, or convenience otherwise than in accordance with the descriptions, plans, sections, and arrangements, approved, fixed, settled, and attested by the board, or in any other way offend against this bye-law, shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty not exceeding 5l., and to a further penalty of forty shillings for every day during which he, she, or they shall suffer such said house or building or convenience, built, rebuilt, or constructed contrary to the order of the board, so to continue, and the board may, if they think fit, cause such house, building, or convenience, so improperly constructed, to be altered, pulled down, or otherwise dealt with, as the case may require, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be repaid by the offending party, and be recoverable in a summary manner."

It was proved that on the 10th October, 1865, the surveyor of the local board received a notice and plans of building from the appellants, and laid them before the board at one of its meetings, which were held monthly. Afterwards, on the 21st October, the surveyor found on the site of the proposed building a temporary building in progress, consisting of pillars to support the roof, within the line of the intended walls, boarded round and fixed in foundations of stone. The plans were subsequently passed by the board on the 7th November, previously to the laying of the information.

It was contended by the appellants that the bye-law was unreasonable in requiring a month's notice, and in requiring it to be at a monthly meeting, and in fixing no time for the approval of the plans. The questions submitted to the Court were—1. Whether the bye-law was bad upon any of the above grounds. 2. Whether the erection was a building within the meaning of the bye-law. 3. Whether the board had condoned the offence, if any.

Kemplay, in support of the conviction.—The Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 34, enacts that "every local board may make bye-laws (inter alia) with respect to the structure of walls of new buildings, for securing stability and the prevention of fires. And they may further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein any such provision as they may think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings, as to inspection by the local board, and as to the power of the local board to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws." The bye-law under which this conviction took place is a provision as to the giving of notice and the deposit of plans and sections within the meaning of the section. And it is perfectly reasonable. As to the second point—this was clearly a building within the meaning of the bye-law; the pillars were of a permanent nature. As to the supposed condonation by the subsequent approval of the plans, that approval could have no such effect, for the offence consisted, not in building in an improper manner, but in beginning to build within a month after notice.

A. Wills, for the appellant, was not called upon.

Per Curiam.*—The conviction cannot be sustained. The Act empowers the local board to make bye-laws with respect to the structure of the walls of new buildings; and by way of enforcing their observance, to provide for the giving of notices and deposit of plans and sections. But it does not enable the board to control the liberty of persons building, to any further extent. The board cannot, therefore, compel any person to wait for a certain time after notice before beginning to build. Their proper remedy is by pulling down or altering what is built, if it be not in accordance with the bye-laws.

Judgment for the appellant.

THE "FAIRLINA."*

14 W. R. 869.

Salvage—Costs.

SHIPPING. E.—The costs of salvors, incurred in taking affidavits before issue joined, are allowed when the defendants have not unreservedly admitted the facts pleaded in the petition and supported by the affidavits.

This was a motion in a cause of salvage, instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steam-ship Newton Colville against the brig Fairlina, her cargo and freight.

The salvage services were rendered on the 17th October last, when the Fairlina, from Stockholm to Liverpool, with a cargo of iron, was descried in a state of great distress by the Newton Colville. On the Newton Colville approaching the Fairlina, a boat, with two or three men, appeared to be hanging on to her lee quarter, and there were two men on board her. Such boat and men belonged to the ship Southampton, which was hove to at a short distance. After much difficulty the Newton Colville got a tow-rope fast to the brig, and took her in tow. Part of the crew of the Fairlina were taken on board the Southampton, and the remainder were put on board the Newton Colville by a boat belonging to the Hermann, of Bremen, another ship which was hove to at a short distance. The Newton Colville then towed the brig into Weymouth Roads.

The 11th article of the plaintiff's petition stated that, by means of the services set forth, the steamer saved the Fairlina from loss.

The defendants, in their answer, admitted the general truth of the allegations in the petition, but said that article 11 must be taken with the qualification that two other ships named in the petition, the Southampton and Hermann, were near to render assistance to the Fairlina, and that the Southampton was actually engaged in rendering salvage services to her when the Newton Colville came up.

At the hearing of the cause a tender of 500*l.* was overruled, and the judge awarded 700*l.* for salvage and costs of suit, but of his own accord directed that the costs of plaintiff's affidavit should not be allowed, inasmuch as the facts stated in the petition were substantially admitted in the defendant's answer. Plaintiff's bill of costs was filed and taxed according to the directions of the Court, but after taxation the plaintiff's proctor presented, as out-port charges, an account of expenses amounting to 15*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*, incurred in engaging a tug, which assisted in rendering the salvage services. This the Registrar refused to allow, and the taxation was adjourned at the plaintiff's request, for the purpose of an application being made to the Court on the subject.

Deane, Dr., Q.C., now moved that the plaintiffs should be allowed the expenses incurred, and also the costs of, and incidental to, obtaining the affidavits filed in support of their claim.

C. P. Butt, for the defendants, contended that, as the depositions were taken by the plaintiffs before issue was joined, they were taken for their own benefit; that from the admission made by the defendants they had become unnecessary; and that it would be unjust to tax the defendants with the costs of them.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—I think the expenses incurred by the salvors should be allowed. With respect to the affidavits, it is usual for salvors to take beforehand such depositions of those who may be going out of the country as they think may be needed in support of their claim. If those depositions become needless, the salvors must pay the costs of them. In a former case I gave it as my opinion that such costs should be disallowed. This case, however, does not quite fall within the principle, because the facts pleaded are not unreservedly admitted; I therefore allow such costs of the affidavits as were incurred in meeting the qualifications of the defendants' answer. It was imprudent on the part of the advisers of the salvors to print so much of the affidavits. The costs of printing will not therefore be allowed, nor the costs of this motion.

Legacy duty, Ireland—Exemption—Charity—Secret trusts—56 Geo. 3, c. 56—5 & 6 Vict. c. 82, s. 38—8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4.

DEATH DUTIES.—A legacy, absolute on the face of the will, but bound by a secret trust for charity accepted by the legatee in the lifetime of the testatrix, and such as the Court of Chancery would enforce against the legatee, is not exempt from legacy duty as being a charitable legacy under the Acts regulating the payment of legacy duty in Ireland.

This was an appeal against a decree made by the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, by which the appellant, as administrator of the goods and chattels of Bridget Fitzgerald, deceased, which were left unadministered by her executors, was declared liable to pay legacy duty at the rate of 10l. per cent., in respect of the residue of personal property bequeathed by the will and codicils of the said Bridget Fitzgerald to the Rev. Patrick Joseph Doyle and the Most Reverend Daniel Murray.

The testatrix made her will on the 10th of February, 1829, and, after various other bequests, she gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of her real and personal property to Patrick Doyle and the Most Reverend Daniel Murray, and the survivor of them, his heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, and she also appointed them her executors. The testatrix made five several codicils to her will, which, however, left the above residuary bequest unaffected.

Contemporaneously with the execution of her will, the testatrix sent to Patrick Doyle and the Most Reverend Daniel Murray, respectively, three letters, in which she directed them to hold the property given to them by the residuary bequest in her will for certain charitable purposes therein mentioned. The executors in the lifetime of the testatrix fully accepted the trusts imposed on them by these letters.

The testatrix died on the 5th of May, 1850, without having revoked or altered the above residuary bequest. The Most Reverend Daniel Murray died in February, 1852, and Patrick Doyle died in December, 1852, having by his will appointed the appellant his executor. Administration of the unadministered personal estate of the testatrix was, on the 20th June, 1854, granted to the appellant by the Court of Prerogative in Ireland.

On the 14th of April, 1862, an information was filed by the Attorney-General for Ireland on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, which, after setting out the above facts, prayed that the appellant, as administrator de bonis non of the testatrix, and also as executor of Patrick Doyle, or in one or other of those capacities, might be decreed to pay legacy duty at the rate of 10*l.* per cent. in respect of the residue of personal estate bequeathed by the will of the testatrix.

The appellant filed his answer on the 13th of January, 1863, which, though admitting the facts stated in the information, submitted that, as a matter of law, no legacy duty was payable, on the ground that the bequest was for charitable purposes, and therefore entitled to exemption.

The cause was set down to be heard on information and answer, and on the 29th of June, 1863, the Court being of opinion that bequests given on secret trusts for charity in Ireland were not exempt from legacy duty, made the decree complained of in this appeal.

The question therefore to be decided was whether a legacy in Ireland, absolute upon the face of the will, but bound by a secret trust for charity such as the Court of Chancery would enforce against the legatee, is exempt from legacy duty, as being a legacy given for charitable purposes, and therefore entitled to exemption by virtue of the provisions of the Acts regulating legacy duty in Ireland, viz., 56 Geo. 3, c. 56; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 82, s. 38; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4.

Rolt, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the appellant.—In the schedule, part 3, annexed to 56 Geo. 3, c. 56, amongst other exceptions from legacy duty, are “legacies given for the education or maintenance of poor children in Ireland, or to be applied in support of any public charitable institution in Ireland, or for any purpose merely charitable.” By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 82, s. 38, extending 56 Geo. 3, c. 56, to Ireland, this exemption is continued. Had the trusts declared by the letters appeared on the face of the will, then without doubt no legacy duty would be payable, and whether a binding parol trust be imposed on the legatees or an express trust declared in the will itself is immaterial.

The Attorney-General for Ireland, and Barry, Serjt., (of the Irish bar), for the Crown.

LORD CRANWORTH, C.—This is a question which lies within the narrowest compass. This lady, Bridget Fitzgerald, by her will and several codicils, gave the residue of her property to two gentlemen, both of whom have died, and who are now represented by the appellant, the Most Reverend Archbishop Cullen. By her will she gave the property to these two persons simpliciter, but then it must be taken as an admitted fact that she gave it to them upon their having, in her lifetime, validly undertaken that they would hold it upon certain charitable trusts. Now, in that part of the Stamp Act relating to Ireland which refers to testamentary instruments, and the duty payable upon wills or administrations, there is an exemption which does not exist in England, namely, in favour of “any legacy given for the education or maintenance of poor children in Ireland, or to be applied in support of any charitable institution in Ireland, or for any purpose merely charitable.” There is no doubt that, if you are to couple that which was undertaken by these gentlemen with the legacy, this gift comes within the exemption; for it is admitted on all hands that it was a gift which, coupling the will with the undertaking of the legatees, amounted to a gift for purposes merely charitable. The question is, whether—inasmuch as the gift did not, on the face of it, purport to be a gift merely charitable, but was apparently a gift to the legatees themselves, for their own benefit, you can, for the purposes of legacy duty, couple that legacy with the fact that the legatees had undertaken to hold it for merely charitable purposes. I think it is extremely important that rule should be laid down on this subject; and, undoubtedly, the more convenient rule is that which has been adopted by the Court below, because it is a rule which imposes no difficulty upon executors (administrators are out of the question in this case) when they come to pay the duty, in knowing what the amount of duty is to be. I cannot disguise from myself that the rule, so laid down, is one which may enable parties (unless the Succession Duty Act alters it, and I am not sure how that may be) always to evade or rather to avoid the payment of any legacy duty. Because if the testator is a married man, he may leave the whole of his property to his wife, taking an undertaking from her which does not form part of his will, that she, at his death, will dispose of the property in such and such a way. He can probably trust her, and whether he can trust her or not, if he take measures to secure that it shall be forthcoming at his death, she will be bound to execute the trust, and therefore, no duty will be payable because ex facie of the will it is all given to her. I observe that one of the learned Judges—Baron Fitzgerald, I think—rather alludes to a case of that sort, and says he doubts whether, in such a case, the Court might not find the means of compelling the party beneficially interested to pay the full duty. I own I cannot follow that, and the Attorney-General for Ireland, to whom I put the question, did not contend for it. The rule, therefore, as laid down is open to the objection that it may, according to the present state of the law, lead to parties escaping from the payment of legacy duty altogether, or very nearly so, by a testator giving the property to his wife, in which case there is no duty payable, or to a child, in which case the duty is only one per cent., although it may really be intended to be given to strangers, the duty upon such a bequest being ten per cent. in England, and five or six per cent. in Ireland. That duty of ten per cent. or of five per cent., as the case may be, would therefore be avoided, and a duty of one per cent. only, or nothing at all, would be paid, according as the property was given on the face of the will to a child or a wife. No doubt there is considerable difficulty in that view of the question. Perhaps the only answer to it is that the statute has not contemplated such a case, and that is the real answer to the question which was put two or three times at the bar in the course of the argument. What is the meaning of the words “legacy given,” in the proviso? Do they mean given by will, or do they mean so given that coupling the gift to the legatee with the obligation which the law imposes upon it, the two together are to be taken as the legacy. I own that I have had considerable doubts upon the subject, but the rule laid down by the Court below is certainly the more convenient of the two, and as I know that both my noble and learned friends who have heard this case, consider the decision to be perfectly right, I do not feel it necessary to state any further the doubts which have arisen in my own mind. Under the circumstances I think the decision which has been come to by the Court below in the case of this will is right. I have, therefore, to move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The question to be decided is whether the gift of the residue by the will of Bridget Fitzgerald to the Rev. Mr. Doyle and Archbishop Murray is exempt from legacy duty by reason of its being made applicable to trusts for charitable purposes, by certain letters contemporaneous with the will, and which trusts were accepted by the legatees. Confining myself entirely to the words of the Acts of Parliament, I have little difficulty in coming to a conclusion in favour of the Crown. The definition of a legacy given by the 38th section of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 82, and the 4th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, is “a gift by any will or testamentary instrument of any deceased person which by virtue of any such will or testamentary instrument shall have effect or be satisfied out of the personal estate.” It is clear upon the definition that the gift can be a legacy only to the person named in the will, because he alone takes by virtue of the will. Bearing this in mind, in turning to the exemption in the 38th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 82, on which the question turns, the proper construction appears to me to be obvious. That exemption is, "that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to charge with duty in Ireland any legacy given for the education or maintenance of poor children in Ireland, or to be applied in support of any charitable institution in Ireland, or for any purpose merely charitable." What is the meaning of the words "any legacy?" It is a gift which, by virtue of the will, is to have effect out of the personal estate. Now the residue in this case is not by virtue of the will given for charitable purposes, but by virtue of the trust imposed by the letters contemporaneous with the will. The duty is chargeable upon a legacy given by will; the exemption applies to a legacy given, or to be applied for charitable purposes. From the comparison of the definition of a legacy with the terms of the exemption which I have made, I can come to no other conclusion than that the legacy for charitable purposes must be expressly so given by the will itself to exempt it from duty. Upon these grounds, therefore, I think the judgment of the Court below is perfectly right, and that it ought to be affirmed.

LORD WESTBURY.—My Lords, having regard to the argument upon this case, I think it very material to point out that where there is a secret trust, or where there is a right created by a personal confidence reposed by a testator in any individual, the breach of which confidence would amount to a fraud, the title of the party claiming under the secret trust, or claiming by virtue of that personal confidence is a title dehors the will, and cannot be correctly termed testamentary. The question then arises—What is the meaning of the words in the statute that has been referred to? The object of that portion of the statute is to charge testamentary gifts with certain rates of duty, according to the relation, or the absence of relation, between the testator and the donee. Now a gift by will, or a legacy by will, involves of necessity certain things—not only a description of the subject given, but also a nomination or description of the individual to take, or the purpose which is to be answered by the legacy. If there be therefore a gift to A., and if there be a collateral matter which renders A. bound to apply the subject of the gift to some purpose not to be found within the expression of the gift, and the obligation arises, not on the face of the will, or by virtue of the will, but arises from something aliunde, it follows of necessity that the person or the purpose to be benefited cannot with any correctness of language be dominated a legatee or a testamentary purpose. When therefore we are adverting, as we have here to advert, to the effect of the exemption out of legacies charged with duties, we find the words of the exemption to be "a legacy for a purpose merely charitable." If that be so, does it not of necessity follow that the purpose merely charitable being in reality the real donee of the legacy must, by every rule to be derived from the nature of the subject and from the language of the statute, be a purpose expressed on the face of the will. The exemption is intended to be applied only to testamentary bounty, and testamentary bounty to a charity; but you cannot say that this is bounty to a charity, when the charity has no place, and is not to be found either in anything that is expressed in the will, or in anything that is so referred to in the will, as by that reference to be made part of the will. The words unquestionably would not include a person taking by anything other than a testamentary title, otherwise there would be no limit. A legatee taking a sum of money by virtue of a will might declare a trust a day or a month after the death of the testator, and the whole of the reasoning that we have heard to-day would be equally applicable to a charitable purpose expressed in that trust, and it might be held equally to exempt the property so first given by will, and afterwards dedicated to charitable purposes, from being amenable to the duty. I think the conclusion arrived at by the Court below is quite a correct conclusion. In matters of this kind relating to the interpretation of fiscal Acts we are not at all to have regard to what the effect of the decision may be with reference to the fiscal duties. Our duty is limited only to this, to inquire whether the tax imposed does attach, or whether, when the tax is imposed with an exemption, the particular case comes within the fair, proper, and legal meaning of that exemption. Whatever may be the result upon other fiscal duties is not properly a subject of judicial reference upon the occasion of determining a question of this kind. I therefore undoubtedly concur in the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The costs follow as a matter of course.

Bagshawe.—Perhaps your Lordships would allow me to mention that the Lord Chief Baron thought it was a proper case to take before your Lordships; in fact he said he should desire that the decision should be reviewed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—I do not think that ought to have any effect in this case. The costs must follow the appeal.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Will—Construction.

VESTED, CONTINGENT AND FUTURE INTERESTS.—T., by his will, gave his residuary real and personal estate on trust for S. for life, and after her death equally among twelve nephews and nieces named, and he directed that if any of them should die before the period of distribution, the share of the person so dying should go to all and every the children by their first marriage of any of his said nephews and nieces who should have departed this life, equally between them at twenty-one. And he declared that if any of the said nephews and nieces should die before the period of distribution, leaving issue, and such issue should die before twenty-one, the share of the nephew or niece so dying should go equally among the surviving nephews and nieces:—Held (reversing Stuart, V.C.), that the issue of a nephew, who died in the testator's lifetime leaving issue, were entitled to share in the fund.

This was an appeal from an order made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart upon a petition, which involved a point of will construction. The case is reported on the hearing before the Vice-Chancellor (14 W. R. 124), where the facts are sufficiently stated.

Partnership—Dissolution by act of God—Costs.

PARTNERSHIP.—When a dissolution of partnership is caused by the act of God, the costs after the hearing will be paid out of the partnership property. The costs up to the hearing will be paid out of the partnership property, or by each party, according to circumstances.

This was a question as to the payment of the costs of a suit for the dissolution of a partnership on the ground of the lunacy of one of the partners.

The cause in an earlier stage was reported in 10 W. R. 186, 30 Beav. 302. The suits had now been wound up, and the only remaining question was who should pay the costs.

Selwyn, Q.C., and G. Colt, for Rowlands, the plaintiff in the first suit, contended that as he had substantially gained what he contended for he ought to be allowed his costs. There could be no rule as to the costs of a suit for the dissolution of a partnership, for the question must often depend upon the amount of assets.

Phear appeared for some of the defendants.

Southgate, Q.C., and King.—This is a case of a dissolution by the act of God, and the rules for the cases of dissolution where one or more of the parties are in the wrong do not apply. The costs ought to be paid out of the partnership estate. They quoted 1 Lindley on Partnership, 183.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The usual rule in dissolutions of partnership is that each party pays his own costs up to the hearing, and that the costs after the hearing come out of the partnership estate. I think I must follow that course here. The general rule in the case of dissolutions by the act of God is that all the costs are paid out of the partnership property. There are, however, peculiar circumstances here, and the proper rule will be for each party to pay his own costs up to the hearing, and after the hearing the costs to be paid out of the partnership property. Let the money be paid before the last seal.

Will—Construction—Words of description—Falsa demonstratio.

WILL.—Where A. purchased an estate called Arkley Hall Farm, situated in the parish of Ridge, and subsequently added thereto two pieces of land in the contiguous parishes of Shenley and Barnet respectively, occupying the whole as one farm, and then by his will devised all his freehold estates, consisting of Arkley Hall Farm in the parish of Ridge, upon certain trusts, with a devise of his residuary real and personal estate over:—Held, that only the lands in the parish of Ridge passed under the devise of Arkley Hall Farm.

By indentures of lease and release dated respectively the 24th and 25th November, 1802, one William Dodds became entitled to certain lands and hereditaments therein described as Aukley House, alias Arkley Hall, and several pieces of land, together amounting to 111 acres, all situate in the parish of Ridge, in the county of Herts. In the year 1813 the said William Dodds purchased in fee seven other pieces of land, amounting to about forty acres, situate in the parish of Shenley, in the said county of Herts; and in the year 1815 he purchased a further piece of freehold waste land, in the parish of Barnet, amounting to about four acres. The lands purchased in Shenley and Barnet were contiguous to the lands in the parish of Ridge, and the whole was occupied by the said William Dodds as one farm. In the year 1817 the said William Dodds, by his will dated the 12th August, devised as follows:—"As to, for, and concerning all and singular my freehold estates, consisting of Arkley Hall Farm, in the parish of Ridge, in the county of Hertford, a farm called Aldridges, in the parish of Fryerning, in the county of Essex, with the marshland near Barking, in Eastbury Level, a messuage and premises, No. 19, Little Shire Lane, Carey Street, in the county of Middlesex, a messuage and premises, No. 22, College Hill, London, and also my copyhold and customary houses and cottages at Great Ilford, the corner of Barking Lane, in the said county of Essex, and all and singular other my said real estates whatsoever and wheresoever, and also all the rest, residue, and remainder of my personal estate, money, stock, funds, securities for money, and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, not hereinbefore disposed of, together with all such property and effects as shall fall into my residuary estate and effects by virtue of this my will, upon the death of my said wife, and of my said grandson, and granddaughter, and every of them respectively," unto trustees upon trusts thereafter declared, "that is to say, as to, for, and concerning my said farm called Arkley Hall Farm, upon trust to permit my son Thomas William Dodds to receive and take the rents and profits thereof during the minority of my grandson William Dodds, and from and immediately after my said grandson William Dodds and his assigns shall attain the age of twenty-one years, then upon trust for my said grandson William Dodds and his assigns, for and during the term of his natural life," and after his death with limitations over in favour of the said grandson's children. There were trusts of the residuary estate in favour of the other children of Thomas William Dodds. The said lands in the parishes of Ridge, Shenley, and Barnet, were occupied together by one tenant as one farm, and the testator's son and grandson, for a period of forty years, received the rents and profits of the whole of the lands. On the death of the grandson intestate in 1851, an administration suit was instituted, and subsequently questions arose between the residuary devisees, the trustees in whom the lands were vested, and the personal representative of the grandson William Dodds, as to the legality of the payments to the said William Dodds of the rents and profits of the lands not situate in the parish of Ridge. Bills were filed by the remaining trustees and the residuary devisees respectively, for the administration of the trusts of the will of the testator, under the direction of the Court.

Druce opened the case for the plaintiff (the surviving trustee of the testator's will) in Pedley v. Dodds.

Bacon, Q.C., and Hanson, for the representatives of William Dodds the grandson, argued that it was clear from the facts of the case that the whole of the lands were intended to pass under the devise. The lands in the three parishes were let to one tenant at one entire rent. If the testator had devised all his Arkley Hall Farm without the words "in the parish of Ridge," the case was clear. These latter words were mere words of additional description, and as such were a false description merely. They cited Goodtitle d. Radford

v. Southern (1 M. & S. 299); Doe d. Beach v. Lord Jersey (1 B. & Ald. 550); Down v. Down (7 Taunt. 348); Harrison v. Hyde (4 H. & N. 805); Cunningham v. Butler (3 Giff. 37).

Malins, Q.C., and Surrage, in the same interest, cited Welby v. Welby, (2 Ves. & B. 187); Oxenforth v. Cawkwell (2 Sim. & St. 558); Webber v. Stanley (16 C. B. N.S. 698).

STUART, V.C.—The rule seems to me very clear. It is that words of description are not to be limited by mere words of suggestion. That is what I understand the principle in Doe v. Lord Jersey to go to.

Greene, Q.C., Joshua Williams, Q.C., and Blackmore, for those interested under the residuary devise, cited West v. Lawday (11 H. L. Cas. 375); Ricketts v. Turquand (1 Cl. & Fin. 491); Doe d. Oxenden v. Chichester (4 Dow. 65, 90, and 96); Bacon's Maxims, xiii. Ed. of 1737, p. 76. Webber v. Stanley is a case in our favour. The description here limits the lands devised to those in the parish of Ridge. The rule of law is clear, that where the words are clear, capable of full effect, and there is no repugnancy in other parts of the will, they pass only that described by them. This is so here. The evidence as to occupation is not enough to take the case out of the rule.

Bacon, Q.C., in reply.

STUART, V.C.—I cannot say that I have any doubt about this case, because I think the facts are clear, and where this is so there is not much doubt about the law. The facts are these:—That in 1802 this testator bought a farm and lands in the parish of Ridge, which farm and lands were called Aukley House or Arkley Hall, and known by description as in the parish of Ridge, and no other parish; and before the year 1813 could have included no lands but those in the parish of Ridge. It happened that this testator occasioned this question by purchasing, about the year 1813, two years before he made his will, certain lands in the parish of Shenley. These he added to Arkley Hall Farm only by farming them with it. The same observation applies to the lands subsequently acquired in the parish of Barnet. By his will he devises "Arkley Hall Farm in the parish of Ridge," and it is said that when he so describes it there is a false demonstration. He did not mean Arkley Hall Farm proper, but Arkley Hall Farm, not only in the parish of Ridge, but with the additions he had made to it in the parishes of Shenley and Barnet. Is this a mere mistaken description? Lord Justice Erle, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Webber v. Stanley, states the law in words which were not exactly those used by other judges, but are to the same effect. He says, "as to the case where there is property in respect of which all the facts of description are found to be true, so that the property exactly fits the description, the whole of that property and nothing more passes. As to the case where there is property in respect of which none of the facts of description are true, no property passes. Where the inquiry results in the third alternative, viz., where there is property in respect of which some of the facts of description are true and some not, there the Court must inquire whether the part of the description which applies to the property is a complete definition of a subject of devise, so that the misdescribing part may be justly regarded as a mistake, and rejected as a false demonstration in order to prevent a total failure of the devise. If this latter inquiry results in an affirmative answer, the property which is so found to be completely defined passes, notwithstanding a partial failure of the applicability of the whole of the description. It is in the case of this third alternative that the doctrine relating to the rejection of false demonstration is brought into use, but it never can be properly applied where there is a property which every part of the description fits, and on which every word thereof has full effect." Now what the testator has given is Arkley Hall Farm, in the parish of Ridge. That describes a subject certainly known, and the addition of lands in another parish is no reason, upon any principle of construction that I know, to say that he meant lands added to that farm but situated in other parishes. Where property is found which exactly fits the description in the will, nothing more passes than the property which so fits the description. Lord Bacon's Maxims have been referred to, and he says, with reference to that one—non accipi debent verba in demonstrationem falsam quæ competunt in limitationem veram—"the law will never intend error or falsehood;" but the whole argument here is to impute error or falsehood. He says further, "If the parish of Hurst do extend into the counties of Wiltshire and Berkshire, and I grant my close called Callis, situate and lying in the parish of Hurst, in the county of Wiltshire, and the truth is that the whole close lieth in the county of Berkshire, yet the law is that it passeth well enough, because there is a certainty sufficient that I have given it a proper name which the false reference does not destroy, but in the principal case, if the close called Callis had extended part into Wiltshire and part into Berkshire then only that part had passed which lay in Wiltshire." That is this very case and you cannot make any distinction. Now the whole of the efforts of counsel were directed to extend the words of the testator beyond their precise meaning, but I think they entirely fail in showing that there is anything false or mistaken in the way he has used the words "in the parish of Ridge." And as the law is, this Court cannot infer that he made any mistake or that he gave more than he expressly said he intended to give. There is no warrant for saying that a single acre or rood of land passed by this will out of the parish of Ridge. Declare therefore that the lands in Shenley and Barnet pass by the residuary clauses.

OSBORN v. DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.

14 W. R. 886; 14 L. T. 789; 12 Jur. N.S. 559.

Specific performance—Lease by tenant in tail not under seal—32 Hen. 8, c. 28—5 Anne, c. 3.

ESTATE. LANDLORD AND TENANT.—Where A., a tenant in tail male in possession of lands, the subject of a settlement by a special Act of Parliament, made a lease by an agreement not under seal, the power of leasing given by the Act requiring leases of the kind to be made under the provisions of the 32 Hen. 8, c. 28:—Held, that such agreement had no power to bind the issue in tail, notwithstanding certain acts of acquiescence and confirmation on his part, and that the lessee was not entitled to any equitable relief.

This bill was filed by a tenant of the defendant to compel him to grant him a lease in conformity with the terms of an agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant's predecessor, the late Duke of Marlborough.

The facts of the case were briefly as follows:—

The late Duke of Marlborough was, by virtue of a certain Act of Parliament passed in the reign of her Majesty Queen Anne, entitled as tenant in tail male in possession of the Blenheim Estates, without power of barring the entail, but with certain powers of leasing, to be executed in compliance with the terms of the Act.

The power of leasing was as follows:—

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that the Duke of Marlborough, and after his decease the said Duchess of Marlborough, shall have full power and authority by deed indented to make any lease or leases in possession of all or any of the said manors, hundred, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments aforesaid (other than and except the house called Blenheim and the park of Woodstock), for any number of years not exceeding twenty-one years, or for any number of years determinable upon one, two, or three lives, reserving the best and most improved rent that can then be had for the same without taking any fine, provided that neither the said Duke of Marlborough, or the heirs male of his body, nor any of his daughters, or the heirs male of their bodies, or any other person to whom the premises shall come and descend by virtue of the limitations aforesaid, shall have any power by fine or recovery, or any other act, assurance, or conveyance in the law to hinder, bar, or disinherit any the person or persons to or upon whom the said manor house, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or premises, are hereby vested or limited from holding or enjoying the same according to the limitations before in this Act mentioned, other than and except such leases as the said Duke and Duchess may make by virtue of the powers hereinbefore mentioned and such other leases as the tenants in tail may and are enabled to make by virtue of the statute made in the thirty-second year of Henry 8th, and grants of lands or tenements held by copy of court roll according to the customs of the respective manors aforesaid but all such fines, recoveries, acts, assurances, and conveyances, other than such leases and grants by copy aforesaid, shall be and are hereby declared and enacted to be void."

On the 16th November, 1855, the plaintiff and the late Duke executed an agreement, whereby inter alia it was stipulated that the defendant should hold his farm for a term of fourteen years from the 29th day of September then last. On the death of the late Duke in 1857, the present Duke came into possession as tenant in tail male. Quarrels arising between the parties with reference to the destruction of the rabbits, and as to the nature of certain team work to be done by the plaintiff, an action of ejectment for a breach of covenant in respect of the team work was brought by the Duke, in which, however, he was defeated. Subsequently a notice to quit was served on the plaintiff, on the footing of his being a tenant from year to year only. He refused, however, to comply with it. Upon a second action of ejectment being brought by the Duke, the plaintiff obtained an injunction to stay execution until the question of his right to a lease was decided. There had been an acceptance of rent by the defendant from the plaintiff for many years, and the correspondence showed that previous to questions arising between the parties, the plaintiff had been treated on the footing of a lessee for years. The questions raised were (1) whether the agreement by the late Duke, not being by deed, could bind his issue in tail, and (2) whether the acts of the defendant had not so confirmed the acts of his predecessor as to make them binding upon him.

Wickens for the plaintiff.—The position of the defendant was that of a tenant in tail under the act of 32 Hen. 8, c. 28, and although the agreement was not a lease strictly within the provisions of such Act so as to bind the issue in tail, yet a Court of Equity might execute it. But where there had been acquiescences and confirmation by successive tenants in tail, such acts of acquiescence and confirmation would at least bind them. Here the defendant confirmed the agreement by successive receipts of rents, brought an action on an alleged covenant, thus treating the agreement on the footing of a lease by deed. This is such a confirmation of agreement as will entitle a plaintiff in equity to a specific performance: Doe v. Jenkins (3 Moo. & P. 59); Ross v. Ross (1 Chan. Cas. 171). He has been a good tenant, and the Court will exercise its jurisdiction in his favour.

Bacon, Q.C., Malins, Q.C., and Cotton, for the defendant, were not called on.

STUART, V.C.—It is much to be regretted that disputes between landlord and tenant lead to litigation, but this case seems to me very clear. The plaintiff files his bill for the specific performance of an agreement to lease him a farm for fourteen years, signed by the late Duke of Marlborough. The late Duke of Marlborough was tenant in tail in possession under that particular Act of Parliament which regulates the succession to his estates. The Act of Henry VIII. is perfectly clear as to what is to be done in order to bind tenants in tail, their issue, and remaindermen. Here is an agreement not under seal, and it is said, in the face of this statute, that that agreement binds the present defendant and gives the plaintiff a right to a lease. It is not necessary to enter into the question of confirmation beyond this, that there seems to be great ground for considering that as between issue in tail and ancestor in tail, this agreement not being under seal, is not capable of confirmation. No doubt the decision in Doe v. Jenkins, as the law is laid down in that case, is that, as against issue in tail, an agreement of this kind is only voidable and not void, and being only voidable is capable of confirmation. With that case I am not inclined to agree, but if I were the Acts of confirmation are too equivocal, and this Court could not give them such effect as to bind the defendant. The jurisdiction of this Court is of a discretionary kind, and I do not think I should be exercising the discretion of the Court in a proper way if I gave the plaintiff the relief he seeks. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

Marriage settlement—Assignment by wife of all her present and future property—Covenant by husband to settle after-acquired property—Gift to wife, after the marriage, of separate estate by an instrument taking notice of the settlement.

SETTLEMENT.—By an ante-nuptial settlement the intended wife assigned to trustees all her then present personalty, "and all other the personal estate to which she might at any time thereafter become entitled in any way howsoever," upon the usual trusts, and the intended husband covenanted to settle all her after-acquired property. After the marriage, a testatrix, by her will, left the wife a sum of money. By a first codicil the testatrix desired that the money given to the wife by the will should be paid over to the trustees of the settlement, and that no part thereof, except the interest, should be paid to the wife or husband, and that the principal should forthwith be assured by the husband in pursuance of his covenant. By a second codicil the testatrix authorised her executors, before paying over the principal to the trustees, to pay such part thereof to the wife as she might require for her separate use.

After the testatrix's death the wife required a portion of the principal to be paid to her for her separate use. The acting executor paid the required portion into court, and, on a petition by the wife for payment to her for her separate use, the prayer of the petition was granted.

This was a petition presented by Emma E. Mainwaring, the wife of Arthur Mainwaring, asking for the payment to her of a sum of money which had been brought into Court under the Trustee Relief Act.

The facts were as follows:—By an ante-nuptial settlement, dated July 11th, 1843, and made between the petitioner, then Emma E. Warren, spinster, of the first part, her then intended husband of the second part, and trustees of the third part, after reciting that the petitioner was entitled to the personalty specified in the schedules thereto either in expectancy or in possession, and that it had been agreed that she should, in consideration of the then intended marriage, transfer and assign the same to the trustees thereof, the petitioner accordingly assigned, and Arthur Mainwaring confirmed unto the trustees the said specified personalty, "and all other the personal estate to which the said E. E. Warren now is entitled in possession, remainder, contingency or otherwise howsoever, or to which she may at any time hereafter become entitled, in any way howsoever, and all the estate, right, title, interest, property, possibility, benefit, claim, and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity of her the said Emma E. Warren of, in, and to the same and every part thereof respectively," upon trust for the petitioner absolutely until the marriage, and afterwards, upon certain trusts for the petitioner, her husband, and children. The settlement also contained a covenant by Arthur Mainwaring, to settle all the property which might be acquired by the petitioner after her marriage, upon the trusts of the settlement. The marriage took place shortly after the date of the settlement. There was no issue of the marriage.

The petitioner's mother, Penelope Warren, by her will, dated December 24th, 1860, bequeathed 2,700*l.* to the petitioner. By a codicil, dated June 5th, 1863, Penelope Warren desired that all the money given to the petitioner by her will, should be paid over to the trustees of her marriage settlement upon the trusts thereof, and that no part thereof, except the interest, should be paid to the petitioner or her husband; and she desired that the principal moneys should be forthwith assured by the petitioner's husband in pursuance of his covenant in the settlement. By another, and undated, codicil to her will, the petitioner's mother authorised her executors, before paying over the principal moneys given by her to the petitioner to the trustees of her marriage settlement, as directed by the first codicil, to pay such part of the same to the petitioner as the petitioner might require for her separate use, independent of her said husband, and to be free in all respects from his debts, control, and engagements.

The testatrix died November 22nd, 1865, and on April 7th, 1866, her executor appropriated the sum of 3,085*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* 3*l.* per cent. Consols, to answer the legacy of 2,700*l.* sterling to the petitioner. After such appropriation, and before any part of the Consols had been transferred to the trustees of the settlement, the petitioner required that the sum of 2,308*l.* 16*s.* Consols, part of the said sum of 3,085*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* Consols should be sold, and the proceeds paid to her for her separate use. The executor, doubting whether he ought to comply with the petitioner's requirement, transferred the required sum of Consols into court, and the present petition was presented.

Little, for the petitioner, pointed out that the settlement contained no recital of an agreement to settle after-acquired property, and contended that looking at the whole instrument, the assignment by the petitioner of "all other the personal estate, &c.," ought to be read as an assignment of what the petitioner might become entitled to in the interval between the execution of the settlement and the marriage. For, if all the after-acquired property of the petitioner fell within the assignment, there would be nothing for the husband's covenant to operate upon. The husband's covenant alone would not bind the fund in question, for it was certain that a covenant by a husband to settle after-acquired property, only referred to the marital right. The Court, moreover, would look at the words of donation used by the testatrix, which clearly show an intention that the petitioner should be at liberty to withdraw a portion of her legacy from the operation of the settlement. He cited Re Stephenson's Trusts (3 D. M. G. 969); Douglas v. Congreve (1 Keen, 410); Travers v. Travers (2 Beav. 179); Ramsden v. Smith (2 Drew, 298; 2 W. R. 435); Grey v. Stuart (2 Giff. 398); and Thornton v. Bright (2 Myl. & Cr. 254).

F. Bacon, for the petitioner's husband, was stopped by the Court.

Wolstenholme, for the trustees of the settlement, said that the settlement would, beyond all question bind this fund were it not for the words of the will. Now those who claimed under the settlement had nothing whatever to do with the words of the will. The legacy once given to the petitioner must be subject to all her contracts. One could not give a gift to a person absolutely, and at the same time freed from that person's engagements. [Wood, V.C.—Suppose the testatrix had said "I am aware of my daughter's marriage settlement, and I do not wish what I give her to be subject to it. If I give her anything it must be on condition that it is not settled." In that case would the gift still be subject to the settlement?] Yes.

Wood, V.C., said that the words of the settlement were, no doubt, wide enough to embrace everything to which the petitioner might at any time after the marriage become entitled. The husband's covenant was useful in case of legal interests, the wife's assignment being merely a contract. As regarded the testatrix's intention, however, it was clear that she gave the legacy to the petitioner upon the express condition that the latter should be able to free any portion she liked from the effect of the settlements. The question, therefore, was whether the Court should consider a gift of that sort as bound by the settlement. He was of opinion that the true rule was that, if from a comparison of the settlement and the instrument under which the married woman took, it was plain that the subject of the gift was not of the nature of the property to which the settlement was intended to apply, the Court would not apply the settlement to the gift. The argument was just that property could not be given to any one free from his engagements. But here, in holding that the petitioner was entitled to have the sum in Court paid to her for her separate use, as he thought he was bound to do, the Court would proceed merely on the ground that the engagement entered into by the petitioner in the settlement was not applicable to the sort of gift of which the sum in Court was part. The costs of the petition would be paid out of the fund, and the residue handed to the petitioner as prayed by the petition.

SURR v. WALMSLEY.

Practice—Examination ex parte previous to the hearing—Examiner's objections to questions.

EVIDENCE. H.—Although, by the order of the Court on evidence, dated February 5, 1861, the examination, before an examiner, of a witness called ex parte in order that his evidence may be used at the hearing of a cause, is to be deemed an affidavit, the examiner is not on that account bound to take down the answers to improper or irrelevant questions. He should not, however, refuse to take down answers, except when it is clearly evident that such answers could not possibly be evidence.

This was a motion made on behalf of the plaintiff that the examiner might be ordered to proceed with the examination of a witness called ex parte by the plaintiff in order that his evidence might be used at the hearing of the cause.

The chief point in question in the suit was as to the solvency or insolvency of the late firm of John and James Walmsley at the time when the partnership ended. Of the two partners John was now dead. The plaintiff contended that the firm was at that time insolvent, and called as a witness the person who had made out the amount of the stock of the late firm, and who had refused to make an affidavit. John was the partner who had given the witness his instructions to draw up this account. On the face of the account the firm was solvent. The plaintiff's case was that this account was erroneous, and known to be so by the witness and the partners. On the examination, the witness was asked what instructions were given to him by the partners as to the making out of the impeached account, and particularly whether John told him that he was going to show it to James, and what John told him that James had said on seeing it. The examiner had refused to take down the witness's answers to these questions, on the ground that they could not possibly be evidence, and the present motion was made.

De Gex, Q.C., and Roxburgh, in support of the motion, referred to Rule 6 of the Order of the Court on Evidence (February 5th, 1861), and made in pursuance of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 128 (see Morgan's Chancery Acts and Orders, p. 181), whereby it was ordered that every examination taken ex parte for the purpose of being used at the hearing should be deemed to be an affidavit. The force of an affidavit was not affected by containing some things that might not be evidence; and the examiner should consider himself, when taking examinations of this kind, as in fact drawing an affidavit. Surplus matter in an affidavit was only a matter of costs, and if the examining party chose to risk the expense, it was not an affair for the examiner. [Wood, V.C., said that he could not hold that an officer of the court would be acting properly if he loaded the records of the court with what he knew could not be evidence. As to superfluous matter in affidavits, he had frequently had occasion to animadvert in severe terms on the impropriety of a solicitor putting into affidavits what was not evidence, and he had on many occasions felt himself bound to make the solicitor pay the costs occasioned by the insertion of such matter.] In the present case it was important to show the impression of the witness's mind when he set about making the account, and that was our object in asking him the questions objected to by the examiner. At Nisi Prius the Court would, in many cases, give you time to show the materiality of the evidence after the examination of the witness had been taken. It would be most inconvenient if, where evidence was taken before the examiner, every question put to the witness was to be a subject of discussion with the examiner, who knew nothing of the issues in the cause. And serious expense might be occasioned by his making a mistake, as in the present case, where the witness was brought from Macclesfield at an expense of 15*l*.

Wood, V.C., said that considering the circumstances of the case, it was possible that the first two questions were proper to be put to the witness; because the plaintiff's case being that the account was erroneous, and known to be erroneous, it might be of importance to ascertain the principle on which it was made out. As to the third question, however, he was clearly of opinion that what John, in James's absence, said that James had said, could not by any possibility be evidence. He should therefore direct the examiner to proceed on the first two questions; and of course the plaintiff could, subject to the examiner's objections, proceed generally with the examination. He should be sorry to lay down a rule that the examiner was bound to take down answers to every sort and kind of question; but still there should be no possible doubt on the propriety of a question before the examiner objected to it.

MYERS v. GIBSON.

Will—Attesting witnesses denying signatures—Evidence of attorney who was present and others proving its genuineness—Conflict of evidence.

WILL.—Where two persons' names appeared as attesting witnesses to a will, and the attorney who drew the will, and who was present during its execution, swore that these persons had duly signed the will as attesting witnesses, and other persons who knew their handwriting swore that the writing was theirs, but they themselves, though admitting a striking resemblance between the signatures to the will and other signatures of theirs produced, denied having signed the will, and swore that the signatures to it were forgeries.

The Court, being satisfied that the signatures were genuine, notwithstanding the denial of the witnesses, admitted the will to probate.

The testator, William Broclebank, made a will, dated the 8th of January, 1858, under the following circumstances, which are related in the evidence of the plaintiff. He had been long acquainted with the plaintiff, Mr. John Postlethwait Myers, an attorney at Broughton-on-Furness. Towards the end of the year 1857 the testator first spoke to him about making his will, and, shortly afterwards gave him verbal instructions for this purpose. He (Mr. Myers) dictated these instructions to his clerk, who prepared a draft will in accordance with them, and this draft was afterwards copied. On the 8th of January, 1858 (the date of the will) the testator and Mr. Myers met by appointment at a place called Lylecroft, at or near which the testator resided. They both went to a private room in the Albert Hotel at that place; and there the will produced (being the copy made by the clerk) was distinctly read over by Mr. Myers to the testator, and thereon the bell was rung, and the landlord of the hotel, a Mr. Henry Myers, and his daughter Mary Myers (no relatives of the plaintiff) were requested to witness his signature. They complied, and he signed it in their presence, and they then attested his signature. Several witnesses, who swore that they were acquainted with the signatures of the attesting witnesses, deposed as to their belief that the signatures to the will were genuine.

Spinks, Dr., for the plaintiff, having intimated that it was not his intention to call the attesting witnesses, as he understood they were hostile to the plaintiff.

Sir J. P. WILDE said that where the attesting witnesses were living, and could be brought forward, it was incumbent on whoever propounded a will, which was opposed on the ground of want of due execution, to put them into the box.

Henry Myers was then called, and swore that on the 8th of January, 1858 (the date of the execution of the will) he was absent from home from an early hour in the morning till late at night; that the signature to the will could not under those circumstances be his, but that it was very like his writing. He could not remember where he had been on the 8th of January.

Mary Myers examined, swore that the signature of her name was not written by her but was forged. She admitted a strong resemblance between the signature to the will and her signature to her marriage certificate, but persisted that the former was not her writing. She admitted that the plaintiff Mr. Myers and the testator had been at her father's house on the 8th of January, 1858, and had gone to the private room together as mentioned in the evidence of the plaintiff.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—This is the first case which has come before me where the attesting witnesses deny the genuineness of their own signatures. The law, no doubt, is that the attesting witnesses are the first sources of information, and those to whom the Court first turns for proof of the execution. But they are not the only sources, and when they deny having signed, it is in the power of the Court to investigate the truth in such a case just in the same way it does in any other. The framers of the statute intended that the signatures of attesting witnesses should be for the protection of testators, but not that the solemn acts of testators should be at the mercy of attesting witnesses in such manner that they, after the testator's death, may have it in their power by mere denial, either from prejudice or self-interest, to set at nought the testator's intentions. The evidence of the two attesting witnesses amount to a charge of forgery against the executor, the plaintiff, who takes no interest whatever under the will, while the total amount of the property is only about 300*l.* Viewing the whole evidence, and taking into account the probabilities of the case, I must say I am entirely convinced of the perfect truth of the plaintiff's evidence and that that of the attesting witnesses is wilfully untrue. I will therefore grant probate of the will to the plaintiff as executor.

COLONY. C.—Special leave to appeal will not be granted except where it appears from a full statement of facts in the petition, duly verified by affidavit, that there is a substantial case on the merits, and a point of law proper to be determined on appeal.

This was a petition to set aside an order of the High Court of Fort William, in Bengal, refusing leave to appeal to this board. It appears from the statements contained in the petition, that the petitioners complained of certain irregular proceedings which had been taken on a judgment obtained in 1837, in the Zillah Court; and that the High Court of Fort William refused leave to appeal against a decision pronounced in the cause by that Court. There was also a general allegation of the facts, and of the effect of the judgment in the Court below.

E. P. Wood (Sir R. Palmer, A.G., with him) for the petitioner, now asked the committee for leave to appeal.

Judgment.—The Committee were of opinion that the statements, both of law and fact, contained in the petition, were too general to warrant their Lordships in granting special leave to appeal; and that the petition must either be dismissed with liberty to present another petition, or amended, all the facts to be properly verified by affidavit.

COMPANY. M.—A company had passed a resolution in favour of a voluntary winding-up. A petition for a compulsory winding-up order was afterwards presented by a person alleging himself to be a creditor of the company. The alleged debt arose upon some promissory notes of the company, which had, after they were overdue, been indorsed to the petitioner for value. The validity of these notes was disputed by the liquidator under the voluntary winding-up:—Held, that the petition ought to stand over, with liberty to the petitioner to bring an action at law on the notes. All the costs to be reserved.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Master of the Rolls, dismissing with costs a petition which sought to have this company compulsorily wound up. The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the report, 14 W. R. 705.

Practice—Chancery Court of Lancaster—Statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82, s. 7.

COURT.—An injunction was granted by the Lords Justices, as the Court of Appeal from the Chancery Court of Lancaster, against a person out of the jurisdiction of that Chancery Court.

This was an application to the Court, as the Court of Appeal of the Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, to restrain a creditor of Jane Parsonage, deceased, from prosecuting an action, which he had commenced in the Queen's Bench, against her executors. A decree had been made for administration of her estate in the Chancery Court of Lancaster. The creditor in question being out of the jurisdiction of the Lancaster Court, it became necessary to make the present application to the Lords Justices, as the Court of Appeal of the Lancaster Court, under the provisions of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82, s. 7.

Bardswell, for the executors, now applied accordingly.

F. North, for the creditor.

Their LORDSHIPS made the order asked for.

14 W. R. 907; 14 L. T. 749.

Winding-up petition—Joint-stock companies—Amalgamation.

COMPANY. I.—Two companies, A. and B., were carrying on business. A. had power by its articles of association to buy up other companies. An arrangement was effected for amalgamating the two companies:—Held, that even if the arrangement were not binding on a dissentient shareholder of B., he was not entitled to a winding-up order on the ground that since the amalgamation B. had ceased to carry on business. His remedy was by bill.

This was a petition for winding up the company, on the ground that it had ceased to carry on business.

The company was formed with a capital of 500,000*l.* in shares of 20*l.* There was a power in the articles of association to buy up other concerns and pay for them by cash or shares, or partly by one and partly by the other. The Oriental Commercial Company was a company with a capital of 500,000*l.* in 10,000 50*l.* shares. Resolutions were passed at a meeting of the shareholders of the Financial Company with a view to form a new company, to be called the Oriental Commercial Bank, by amalgamating the two old ones. The capital of the new company was to be 3,000,000*l.* in 20*l.* shares. 5*l.* had been paid upon the shares in the Oriental Company, and it was part of the arrangement that the value of the shares in the Financial Company should be taken at 5*l.* The arrangement was to be conditional on carrying out the transfer.

The petitioner held shares in the Oriental Company, and objected to the transfer. He now applied for a winding-up order on the ground that the company had ceased to carry on business.

Baggallay, Q.C., and W. F. Robinson, for the petitioner.—The business which the Oriental Company was started to carry on has in fact ceased through the arrangement, and the petitioner is thereby entitled to the winding-up order. He is entitled to know what is the state of the property in which his money has been invested. Re Imperial Bank of China, &c. (14 W. R. 594; 1 L. R. Ap. 339).

Selwyn, Q.C., and Swanston, for the company, were not called upon.

Brooksbank appeared for some other parties.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—This is a petition for winding up, presented for the purpose of enabling a shareholder to determine his position in reference to the concern. The case does not come within the act. The company either does not exist at all, or it has been carrying on business since April in last year. If the company has suspended business, it has become part of another concern, and the winding-up order will not be made for the purpose of enabling the petitioner to ascertain his position. The proper remedy of the petitioner is by bill, and he may file any bill he is advised. I assume, for this purpose, that the arrangement for amalgamation of these two companies will not bind dissentient shareholders.

RICH v. WHITFIELD.

14 W. R. 907; L. R. 2 Eq. 583.

Will—Codicil—Realty—Personalty—Power to convert—Charge of legacies on real estate.

CONVERSION AND RECONVERSION. WILL.—A will contained a power to sell some real estate, and a power to re-invest in real estates, to be settled in a particular way. Personalty to belong absolutely to the first tenant in tail. The property was personalty during the whole of the life of the first tenant in tail:—Held, that it went to her personal representative at her death. A codicil directed that legacies given by the will should be paid in proportion, and according to the deficiencies in the testator's real and personal estate.—Held, that they became charged upon the real estate.

There were two questions of construction in this suit on further consideration.

Thomas Whitfield, by his will, dated the 22nd of July, 1779, specifically devised certain real estate in strict settlement upon his daughter, Sarah Whitfield, and the person she might marry for successive life estates, with remainder to her first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to all her daughters in tail, with remainders over. He directed that the interest and proceeds of any personalty which might remain in certain events should be paid by his trustees unto the same person or persons who, for the time being, should be entitled in possession to an immediate freehold estate of and in his freehold hereditaments and premises; and that the principal money of such personalty should ultimately become the absolute property of such person or persons as should be entitled to an estate tail or become seized in fee simple of his freehold estates. Amongst the testator's real property was a moiety of some cotton mills and a corn mill, which the testator gave his trustees power to sell. The will also contained a power to invest personalty in real estates in Cheshire and Staffordshire to be settled to the same uses. The testator died on the 25th of December, 1779. In the year 1805 the trustees sold the mill property, and invested the proceeds in 3,570*l.* New Three per Cents. The testator's daughter Sarah married in 1809, and died in 1863. She had one daughter born in 1810, who only lived a few days. Her husband had predeceased her. The question was whether the effect of the trust for investment was to make the property descend as real estate to the heir-at-law of the infant, or whether her personal representative was entitled to it.

The second question was on a codicil to the will of John Whitfield, dated the 22nd of July, 1808, whereby he directed that the several legacies and bequests by his will given and bequeathed should be paid by his executors in proportion and according to the deficiencies, if any, that might happen to be in his real and personal property, and that each of his said legatees should respectively bear a proportionable share in such deficiency, and he confirmed his will in all other respects. The question was whether this codicil constituted the legacies given by the will a charge upon the testator's real estate.

Selwyn, Q.C., Cole, Q.C., Southgate, Q.C., E. F. Smith, Q.C., Lewin, Chitty, A. T. Watson, and Rowcliffe, appeared for the various parties.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R., as to the first question said—The conversion of the property took place in 1805. The infant was not born till 1810, and became entitled on her birth to the 3,570*l.* Three per Cents. She died a few days afterwards while the property still remained in the condition of personalty. The trustees had no power after her death to re-convert it. It belonged to the personal representative of the infant. There must be a declaration that in the events which have happened the infant became entitled to it as personal estate. On the second question his Lordship said—In my opinion this is a charge on the real estate of all the legacies. The codicil amounts to a declaration of the testator's intention to have the legacies paid proportionately out of his real and personal estate.

Practice—Costs as between solicitor and client—Priority of costs—Creditor and devisee.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where, in a creditor's suit, the estate is insufficient to pay the debts and the costs of suit, the Crown, as between a creditor plaintiff and defendant devisee, will only give costs as between party and party, and the plaintiff is not entitled to his costs in priority to the defendants, but he is entitled to costs as between solicitor and client against the other creditors.

This case came on upon further consideration, and the only questions were whether the plaintiffs were entitled to their costs as between solicitor and client, and in priority to the defendants.

The suit was instituted in April, 1853, by summons to administer the personal estate of James Dodds, who was a shareholder in the North of England Banking Company, and died in October, 1837, possessed of shares in the company. By his will, dated in September previous, Dodds left certain real estate to his sister and other persons, and charged the same as therein mentioned. His executors continued to hold his shares, and the bank, having ceased to carry on business in March, 1847, was ordered to be wound up in November, 1848, and the plaintiffs were appointed official managers. Various calls to a large amount were made, and the administration summons being taken out, the whole personal estate was exhausted in payment of such calls; and the winding up being in the Rolls Court, orders were made declaring the real estate liable to such calls, whereupon this bill was filed by the plaintiffs as official managers, for a mortgage or sale of the real estate, and for a receiver, and praying that, so far as might be necessary or proper, this bill might be taken as a bill of the plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves, and all others the creditors of James Dodds who should come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit and of the proceedings under the summons, and the devisees and executors were made defendants. It appeared by the Chief Clerk's certificate that the plaintiffs were the only creditors, and that their debt was about 1,200*l.*, and the total estate about 1,800*l.*

Osborne, Q.C., and Field, for the plaintiffs, contended on the authority of Tipping v. Power (1 Hare, 408), that they were entitled to their costs in priority to the defendants, the devisees. The suit had been a very expensive one, by reason that the defendants to it had thrown every obstruction in the way: some of the defendants were in Australia, and every possible technical objection had been taken. They also contended that in the case of an estate being deficient to pay a debt the plaintiffs were always entitled to their costs between solicitor and client as a debt, as a sort of make-weight for the loss they sustained: Thomas v. Jones (8 W. R. 328; 1 Dr. & Sm. 184).

Toller, Q.C., and Dickinson, for the heir of the devisee, submitted that Tipping v. Power was a case of a mortgagee, and of course he got his costs in priority: Grant v. Taylor (2 Hare, 413). There was no difference between the case of a devisee and that of the heir: Wetenhall v. Dennis (12 W. R. 66; 33 Beav. 285).

Rasch, for two devisees, took the same line of argument, insisting that pro hac vice they were trustees, and entitled to their costs in priority to the plaintiffs.

Field, in reply, contended that, although there were some words in the judgment in Tipping v. Power inconsistent with the marginal note, the decree, which was set out fully, showed that the marginal note was correct. That case was identical with this with reference to the application of the general assets.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Looking at the judgment and the decree in Tipping v. Power (suprà) it appears that that was not merely a mortgagee's suit, but a suit for administration, and, moreover, was by an equitable mortgagee, whose only remedy was to come to the Court and have the estate sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of his principal, interest, and costs, and, if there was any deficiency, out of the general assets. In applying the mortgaged property, supposing it not enough, there must first be payment of the mortgagee's costs of suit and the interest, and then of the principal, so that, if there is an insufficient estate, and the deficiency remains unsatisfied, it would not be costs or interest, but so much of the principal which was unsatisfied, and thus the costs of suit were treated as costs which the mortgagee had a right to be paid as mortgagee. Wetenhall v. Dennis was a legatees' suit which resulted in an administration of the estate, not a case for payment of debts, but legacies. The Master of the Rolls seems to have proceeded on the footing which is a reasonable one, that where you are administering an estate, all the persons properly before the Court ought to stand pari passu, therefore it appears to me what ought to be done here is, the plaintiffs, as creditors, should have their costs taxed as between party and party, and also as between solicitor and client; the defendant's costs should be taxed as between party and party; the costs of all parties paid out of the fund as between party and party pari passu, and if anything is left of the fund that will belong to the plaintiffs, if not more than sufficient to pay this debt, and they will be entitled to payment thereof of the difference of the amounts of their costs as taxed as between party and party and solicitor and client as they would have been as against other creditors there had been any.

TRAVIS v. TAYLOR.

14 W. R. 909; 12 Jur. N.S. 791.

Will—Construction—Period of division—Statute of Distributions.

WILL.—E. T. gave all her realty and personalty to trustees, to pay the income to H. for life, and then to sell and pay three annuities, and pay the residue of the income to C. T. for life, and after her decease, in trust for all the children she should leave at her decease equally (subject to the annuities); and in case she should leave only one, to such one. And in case she should die without leaving issue, then the whole of the estate to go to and belong to such persons as should then be her (the testatrix's) next-of-kin in a course of administration, according to the Statute of Distributions. C. T. never had a child, though she married:—Held, that the period of distribution was the death of C. T.

The question in this suit turned upon the construction of the will of Elizabeth Taylor, dated 20th March, 1840. The testatrix, after directing payment of her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, out of her personal estate, and, if insufficient, charging her real estate therewith, gave all her real and personal estate, and all the residue and remainder thereof, to Isaac Faulkner, Isaac Hudson, and Helen Taylor, on trust to place the surplus of her personalty out at interest in Government or real security, and call in and vary the investment at their discretion, and pay the income to Helen Taylor (his sister) for life, and after her decease sell and convert his real and personal estate and invest, with power to vary securities, and out of the income pay 10*l.* a year to each of her three nephews, and during the life of her niece Catharine Taylor pay the residue of the income to her during her life, including such of the annuities as should fall in. And after the decease of her said niece, the will continued, "in trust for and for the benefit of all and every the several children which my said niece Catharine Taylor shall leave at the time of her decease, share and share alike (subject, nevertheless, to the payment of the several annuities hereinbefore by me directed to be paid to my said nephews during their natural lives as aforesaid), and if my said niece shall leave only one such child, then to such an only child, his or her heirs, executors, or administrators; and if my said niece shall happen to die without leaving lawful issue, as aforesaid, that then the whole of my said estate and effects so directed to be placed out at interest or real or Government security as aforesaid, shall go and belong to such person or persons as shall then be my next-of-kin in a course of administration according to the statute for the distribution of intestates' personal effects." The testatrix then declared that the life interest of Catharine Taylor should be for her sole use, and that her interest and the annuities should be forfeited if anticipated or alienated, and appointed her trustees executors. There was then a codicil postponing the annuities and the gift to Catharine Taylor until six months after the death of Helen Taylor.

The testatrix died 9th of April, 1842, and left Helen Taylor, Catharine Taylor, and the annuitants, surviving; which annuitants died respectively in 1849, 1851, and 1860. Helen Taylor died in May, 1854, devising her trust real estate to Catharine Taylor and George Taylor, and George Kinsey. Catharine Taylor married Benjamin Brooke and died 15th May, 1863, without ever having had a child, and the debts of the testatrix having been paid, questions arose under the last clause in the will as to the period of distribution, and the plaintiff, as one of her next-of-kin, and also of Helen Taylor, filed this bill.

Baily, Q.C., and F. O. Haynes, for the plaintiff, contended that the words of the will must receive their natural signification, and that the period of division was the death of Catharine Taylor.

Osborne, Q.C., and Eddis, for the trustees, took no part in the argument.

Bazalgette, Q.C., and Rowcliffe, for the next-of-kin living at the death of Helen Taylor.

Glasse, Q.C., and Everitt, for next-of-kin living at the death of the testatrix.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. (after referring to the clauses in the will and the different cases cited)—Upon all these authorities, and having regard to the special words of this will, I am of opinion that there is a clear expression of the intention of the testatrix that the next-of-kin should be ascertained and the property divided at the time different from that of her own death, viz., the death of the tenant for life, Catharine Taylor, and therefore that the general rule does not apply. The persons, therefore, who would have been the next-of-kin at the period in question, supposing the testatrix had then died, are intended, and are entitled to take it among them.

Feme covert—Will—Power.

POWERS.—A feme covert having a testamentary power of appointment over personalty, made her will in December, 1822, whereby, without referring to her power or to the property subject to it, she gave "and bequeathed unto her dear husband, James Attfield, all her property and estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or quality soever the same might be":—Held, in the absence of any evidence of there being other property to which the will could apply, that the power was well executed.

By an indenture of settlement dated 2nd May, 1817, Harriet Watson, on her marriage with James Attfield, transferred the sum of 3,100*l.* to trustees, in trust that the interest and dividends thereof should be paid to her during her life for her sole and separate use, and in case of her decease before the death of the said James Attfield, then to the said James Attfield for his life, and with certain trusts in favour of the issue of the marriage. In default of issue, and in the case of the death of the said Harriet Watson in the lifetime of her said husband, the said interests and dividends were settled in trust for such persons and for such purposes as the said Harriet Watson should "by her last will and testament or any codicil or codicils thereto or any writing in the nature of or purporting to be her last will and testament or codicil to be respectively signed, and published by her in the presence of two or more credible witnesses direct or appoint," and in default of appointment upon the usual trust for the next of kin under the Statutes of Distribution.

There was no issue of the marriage, and Harriet Watson died, leaving her husband James Attfield surviving, having previously made her will dated 15th December, 1822, and attested by two witnesses in the following words:—"I give and bequeath unto my dear husband James Attfield, all my property and estate, whatsoever, and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, quality, soever the same may be. I do hereby give and bequeath the same unto the said James Attfield, his executors, administrators, and assigns to and for his and their own use and benefit absolutely. And I hereby make, ordain, constitute, and appoint my said husband James Attfield, to be executor of this my last will and testament."

The question now raised by the next-of-kin of Harriet Watson was whether the said will was a valid execution of the power contained in the said indenture of settlement or not. There was no allegation in the bill to the effect that the testatrix had not other property other than that settled on her marriage.

E. F. Smith, Q.C., and L. Yate Lee, for an executor of James Attfield, were not called upon.

STUART, V.C.—I think the last authority cited is the only one in point. Wherever there are no means of satisfying the words of a will except by considering it an execution of a power, the Court has in no case decided otherwise. The cases of Evans v. Evans, and Shelford v. Acland, before the Master of the Rolls, are cases where the Court laid hold of some very small words referring to other property and was induced to hold that the will did not, in these cases, operate as an execution of the power. But I observe that Lord St. Leonards notices these two cases in the last edition of his book on powers, and expresses his opinion that it would be no violation of principle if the Court had decided them just the other way. The case in the note to Curteis v. Kendrick is decided on sound and intelligible principles, and this case if of the same kind. If the will does not operate as a power it has no operation. The bill must be dismissed, but without costs.

Mortgage of ship and general assignment of freight—Subsequent assignment of particular freight—Notice.

SHIPPING. A. IX.—The assignee of the freight of a particular voyage, who has given notice of his security to the charterers, has a better equity than a prior registered mortgagee of the ship, who has taken a general assignment of the freight as additional security, but has omitted to give notice thereof

Semble.—This is so notwithstanding the mortgage deed contains a recital of the general assignment.

This bill was filed to ascertain the respective rights of the plaintiff and defendant to certain freight earned by a vessel called the Pharamond, under the following circumstances:—

The owner, John Hall, being indebted to the defendant Tanner in a sum of 2,000l., executed a mortgage of the vessel to him, dated the 25th September, 1862, which was duly registered on the following day in the form required by the Mercantile Shipping Acts.

By an indenture of the same date, which indenture was recited in the said statutory mortgage, the said John Hall executed a general assignment to the defendants of all policies effected on the said vessel, and all freight earned or to be earned by her, as a further security for the payment of the said mortgage moneys.

By a charter-party, dated the 27th November, 1863, the Pharamond was chartered from Hall by Messrs. Philips, King, & Co., to proceed from Algoa Bay or the Mauritius, in pursuance of which she loaded at one or both of the said ports, and arrived in London on the 1st of September, 1864. Anterior, however, to her arrival, viz., on the 20th May, 1864, a deed of assignment of that date was executed by Hall, by which he assigned all the freight and earnings of the said vessel for the said voyage to the plaintiff Brown, as security for money owing upon certain overdue bills of exchange.

On the 16th July, 1864, Brown's solicitors gave a written notice of the assignment to Philips, King, & Co., the charterers. The defendant Tanner had not given notice of his separate security, he, as alleged, having, under the circumstances, no possible opportunity of doing so.

On the arrival of the vessel in London, but not until her cargo had been partially discharged, Tanner entered into possession.

The freight in the hands of the charterers being claimed by both parties, the plaintiff filed the present bill, praying that his charge on the said freight might be declared to be in priority over that of the defendant.

Malins, Q.C., and Druce, for the plaintiff.—(1.) The defendant has clearly no lien on the freight unless he takes possession on the completion of the vessel's voyage. This is generally held to be at some time previous to breaking bulk: Gardner v. Cazenove (5 W. R. 196; 1 H. & N. 423); Cato v. Irving (5 De G. & Sm. 225); Kerswill v. Bishop (2 C. & J. 529). (2.) The plaintiff is an assignee of freight without notice of any prior charge, and having given notice of his incumbrance to the charterers, he has a better title than the defendant, a previous assignee who has given no notice. The only security of the defendant, of which the plaintiff had notice, was the registered statutory mortgage. This had reference to the ship only, and not to the freight. The assignment of freight of even date was not registered, and the plaintiff knew nothing of it.

E. K. Karlake for the defendant.—The circumstance of my taking possession or not before breaking bulk is immaterial. I have a separate security over the freight. [STUART, V.C.—You need not trouble yourself about that question. Your difficulty is as to your having omitted to give notice of your separate security.] I am safe as to that upon three grounds—(1.) It was impossible to give notice at the time of taking that security, for there was no one to whom notice could be given. The defendant could not tell when the vessel might be chartered or otherwise, without keeping an agent always on board, which would have been out of the question. But (2) the plaintiff had constructive notice of the defendant's assignment, inasmuch as it was recited in the statutory mortgage of the ship; and one having notice of a deed is held by the rule of this Court to have notice of all to which it refers: Hall v. Smith (14 Ves. 426); Peto v. Hammond (30 Beav. 495). (3) Notice was not required, for until freight is actually earned, there is only a bare possibility of there being anything upon which notice can operate. Even if it is morally certain that there will be money in the hands of an agent in a few days, there is still, however, nothing upon which notice can operate until the money is actually in the agent's hands: Holt v. Dewell (4 Hare, 446); Buller v. Plunkett (9 W. R. 190; 1 J. & H. 441); Webster v. Webster (10 W. R. 503; 31 Beav. 393); Somerset v. Cox (33 Beav. 634).

Cotton, for the charterers, took no part in the argument.

STUART, V.C., without calling for a reply.—I think that the right of the mortgagee as against the right claimed by the plaintiff as assignee of the freight of this particular voyage cannot prevail. That freight to be earned by a particular voyage can be assigned, although there is a mortgage covering the whole of the ship and freight generally, is beyond a doubt. It was so decided in Lindsay v. Gibbs (4 W. R. 788; 22 Beav. 522). It is of no force to say that notice of the existing mortgage of the defendant effects the assignee of this particular freight in any degree. The collateral assignment was an assignment to Tanner of all freights to be earned after 1862. It is impossible to say that such an assignment can prevail against the assignee of the freight of a particular voyage, when notice of that assignment was given before the mortgagee exercised his right to take possession. If a mortgagee does not choose to exercise his rights as mortgagee, or as assignee of all the freight, until after an assignment of the freight of a particular voyage has been made, his right cannot prevail against an assignee who has given notice. The decree must be for the plaintiffs with costs. The charterers will also get their costs from the plaintiff, who will recover them from the defendant. The charterers will pay over the freight after deducting all proper disbursements.

HUDSON v. BENNETT.

Costs—Infringement of trade mark—Offer by defendant before the hearing.

COSTS. TRADE MARK.—Where the plaintiff, after obtaining an interim injunction, refused an offer of the defendants to accede to an injunction in the terms of the prayer of the bill, and to pay the costs of the suit, requiring to be paid the expenses of apologetic advertisements:—Held that, on prosecuting the suit to a hearing, they were not entitled to their costs.

The bill in this case was filed by the plaintiffs, carrying on business as bottle beer merchants, under the title of Dawkes & Co., against the defendant, to restrain the infringement of their trade mark, and for an account of the profits, &c., in the usual form. An interim injunction, dated 9th November, 1865, had been granted by Vice-Chancellor Wood, and the defendant, without absolutely admitting his trade mark to be an infringement of the plaintiffs, but, as he alleged, to terminate the litigation, offered to consent to a decree granting an injunction in the terms of the plaintiffs' prayer to the bill, and to pay the costs of the suit as between solicitor and client. This offer did not wholly meet the plaintiffs' demands, who required an apologetic advertisement to be inserted in the newspapers at the defendant's expense. To this the defendant would not accede, and the plaintiffs now brought the case on for hearing. Under these circumstances the case virtually came on a question of costs.

Malins, Q.C., and Mackeson, for plaintiffs, argued that they were entitled to pursue their case to a hearing, the negotiations for a compromise having gone off. They cited Burgess v. Hately (26 Beav. 249).

Bacon, Q.C., and J. E. Woodroffe, for defendant, were not called on.

STUART, V.C.—In this case the proposal of the defendant ought, in my judgment, to have been agreed to. There seems to me no excuse for the refusal of the defendant's offer, and therefore each party must bear their own costs.

Wood, V.C., June 22, 1866.

SMITH v. GREENHILL.

14 W. R. 912.

Will—Construction—Trust and trustee—Trusts by reference.

WILL.—A testatrix, having by her will directed her trustees to stand possessed of a fifth of her residuary estate upon trust for a woman for life, and after her death upon trust for her children, directed them to stand possessed of three other fifth parts upon such trusts for three other women respectively as should correspond with the trusts thereinbefore declared concerning the fifth part or share of the first-mentioned woman:—Held, that the three women took only life interests, with remainder to their respective children, in the same manner as the first-mentioned woman and her children took.

This was a common administration suit, and it came on now on further consideration.

The testatrix in the cause, Elizabeth H. Eykyn, by her will dated 13th March, 1863, devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to trustees in trust to sell and invest, and to stand possessed of the investments, as to one-fifth part thereof to pay the interest, &c., to Susan Bishop for her separate use for life, and after her death to stand possessed of the said fifth part upon certain trusts in favour of her children. As to another fifth part, the testatrix directed her trustees to stand possessed thereof "upon such trusts for Elizabeth Greenhill as should correspond with the trusts thereinbefore declared concerning the fifth part or share of the said Susan Bishop." Similar trusts were declared concerning two other fifth parts in favour of Charlotte Bennett and Annie Falls.

The question before the Court was as to the extent of the interest of Elizabeth Greenhill, Charlotte Bennett, and Annie Falls, in the fifths in which they were respectively interested; that is to say, whether (1) each of them took a fifth absolutely, or (2) merely a life interest for her separate use, with remainder to her children upon the trusts declared in favour of Susan Bishop's children.

Hinde Palmer, Q.C., and Lewin, in support of the latter view, cited the following cases: Milsom v. Awdry (5 Ves. 465); Ross v. Ross (2 Coll. 269); Goodman v. Goodman (1 D. & S. 695).

Rolt, Q.C., Willcock, Q.C., W. M. James, Q.C., Surrage, Bedwell, Begg, and Simmons, also appeared.

Wood, V.C., said that if authority was necessary in support of the view that these ladies were entitled only to life estates, and that their children would receive the same benefits under the will as were given to Mrs. Bishop's children, the cases cited were amply sufficient. Even without authority, however, he should have taken that view.

The following declaration would be made:—Declare that, according to the true construction of the testatrix's will, the several parts or shares which are given by her upon such trusts for Elizabeth Greenhill, Charlotte Bennett, and Annie Falls respectively as shall correspond with the trusts by the will declared of the fifth part or share of Susan Bishop, are subject to the same limitations for their respective benefit for life, and for that of their children in remainder, as are declared of the said share of the said Susan Bishop.

SABLICICH v. RUSSELL.

14 W. R. 913; L. R. 2 Eq. 441.

Interpleader—Proceedings against ship—Captain.

INTERPLEADER.—Where proceedings have been commenced by different persons against a ship, a court of equity will not interfere at the suit of the captain. Proceedings against the ship affect the owners, and not the captain.

This was an interpleader suit. The plaintiff was captain of a vessel which had brought over consignments of oil cake in barrels. Some of the distinguishing marks or labels having been lost, 270 of these barrels were claimed by both defendants. Plaintiffs had parted with some of them to each of the defendants, but asserted that they were obtained from him by fraud. The ship had been arrested by order of the Admiralty Court, at the suits of the two present defendants, and had since been released on bail. The bill asked that the defendants might interplead, alleging that the defendants threatened and intended further proceedings against the plaintiff.

C. Hall, for the plaintiff, moved to restrain further proceedings against him.

Rolt, Q.C., and E. K. Karlake, for the defendant Gilbert.—This is not a case for interpleader. The suit in the Admiralty Court is in rem against the ship, not against the captain, who cannot be damned. The plaintiff has caused the embarrassment. He will not be bis vexatus.

Dickinson, for defendant Russell, also contended that this was not a case for interpleader. The plaintiff had voluntarily parted with a portion of the goods.

C. Hall in reply.—Although the suit in the Admiralty Court is against the ship, still, where is a dispute between third parties, the proper proceeding is to file a bill of interpleader. These proceedings in the Admiralty will not determine the rights between the parties. I am a stakeholder and innocent, and therefore entitled to be protected.

Wood, V.C., said that he had no right to interfere with the proceedings in the Admiralty Court. As far as they have gone at present they were only against the ship, not against the master; the real defendants were the owners. The proceeds, the value, of the ship were liable, therefore the loss would fall on the owners, not on the captain. It would seem that the whole right could be tried in the Admiralty Court, and very advantageously. However, he did not pursue that inquiry further, as the present proceedings were against the ship. Mr. Hall asked to be protected against the possibility of an action against the captain himself. The difficulty was whether this was a case for interpleader. It could not be said to be a clear and neat case of accident. The captain had allowed one party to have forty casks, and the other to have nine. This was a sort of acknowledgment of title. Russell might say the mistake in the marks was the captain's fault, for the captain ought to have taken more care. He might be liable to damages for non-delivery. His Honour doubted whether at the hearing this might not turn out to be no case of interpleader. The motion must be refused with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Tenant-right—Estate at will—Building lease—Parol representations of landlord—Expenditure by tenant—Usage of the estate.

WAIVER AND ACQUIESCENCE.—In 1844 J. T. wished to build a house, &c., upon a piece of land then belonging to Sir J. R., the grandfather of the appellant, in fee. The land was allotted to him, and a certain ground-rent was agreed upon, but no lease or agreement for a lease was executed, according to a usage which prevailed in the R. estates, by which persons, without having leases granted to them, but upon an understanding that leases for sixty years, renewable every twenty years, would be granted to such persons whenever they should require such leases, were allowed to build on the said estates. Relying on this usage, and the assurances and promises of the duly authorised agents of the R. estates that he could have such lease whenever he pleased, and that so long as he paid his ground-rent he was as safe without a lease as with one, as he would never be disturbed in his possession, J. T., under the superintendence of these agents, expended large sums of money in erecting buildings on the land allotted to him, and continued to pay the annual ground-rent, as agreed upon:—Held (LORD KINGSDOWN dissentiente), reversing the decision of the Court below, that J. T. was not entitled to such lease, and that the tenancy so created was at most a tenancy from year to year, which might be determined in the usual way.

Per the LORD CHANCELLOR.—If a stranger begins to build on my land supposing it to be his own, and I, perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a court of equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land on which he had expended money on the supposition that the land was his own. But to raise such an equity two things are required—first, that the person expending the money should suppose himself to be building on his own land; and, secondly, that the real owner, at the time of the expenditure, knows that the land belongs to him, and not to the person expending the money in the belief that he is owner. For if a stranger builds on my land knowing it to be mine, there is no principle of equity which would prevent my claiming the land, with the benefit of all the expenditure made on it. It follows, as a corollary from these principles—or perhaps it would be more accurate to say it forms part of them—that if my tenant builds on land which he holds under me, he does not thereby, in the absence of special circumstances, acquire any right to prevent me from taking possession of the land and buildings when the tenancy has determined. He knew the extent of his interest, and it was his folly to expend money upon a title which he knew would or might soon come to an end.

If any one makes an assurance to another, with or without consideration, that he will do, or will abstain from doing, a particular act, but refuses to bind himself, and says that for the performance of what he has promised the person to whom the promise has been made must rely on the honour of the person who has made it; this excludes the jurisdiction of courts of equity no less than that of courts of law.

This was an appeal from a decree made in a cause of Thornton v. Ramsden by his Honour Vice-Chancellor Sir J. Stuart, dated the 2nd March, 1864, upon a question as to the right of Joseph Thornton, the plaintiff in that suit, as against the appellants, the defendants in that suit, to have a lease granted to him of two several properties, part of the Ramsden estates, being a dwelling-house and outbuildings, &c., at Paddock, in the parish of Huddersfield, for a term of sixty years, renewable every twenty years, according to the system of tenure called and known as "tenant-right tenure," or "at will" for many years past established, and known in Huddersfield and the neighbourhood, being a system of erecting buildings upon the Ramsden estates by person without having leases granted to them, but upon the understanding that leases for sixty years, renewable every twenty years, would be granted to such persons when they required such leases. Promises and assurances were made to Joseph Thornton by the agents of the Ramsden estates that he could have such a lease as above described whenever he required it, and on the faith of those statements Thornton erected buildings, &c., under the superintendence of those agents. The learned Vice-Chancellor made a decree declaring that Thornton was entitled to have such a lease granted to him, and against this decree the present appeal was brought.

On the 19th of May, 1864, after the said decree, Thornton was duly adjudged a bankrupt, and the respondents, John Buckley and James Bates were duly appointed assignees of his estate and effects on the 8th of June, 1864. The respondent Lee Dyson was a mortgagee of the two properties under Thornton.

The facts of the case, together with the arguments of counsel, and the authorities cited on both sides, are fully stated in the report of the case of Thornton v. Ramsden, in the Court below (12 W. R. 850), and are besides carefully embodied in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Sir R. Palmer, A.G., Bacon, Q.C., and Chapman Barber for the appellants.

Malins, Q.C., Daniell, Q.C., and Malden for the respondents.

May 11.—LORD CRANWORTH, C.—This was an appeal from a decree of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, bearing date the 2nd of March, 1864, whereby it was declared that the plaintiff Joseph Thornton, was entitled to have a lease or leases granted to him of two properties at Paddock, in the pleadings of the cause mentioned at a ground-rent or ground-rents double the amount of the rent then payable for the same respectively, renewable at the times and on the terms therein mentioned, and it was ordered that the appellant Sir John William Ramsden, should grant to the said plaintiff such lease or leases accordingly.

The bill, which was filed by Joseph Thornton and by the respondent Dyson claiming as an incumbrancer under him, stated the circumstances in which Thornton had become possessed of the land in question, and which they contended entitled them on general principles of equity to claim from the appellant, Sir John William Ramsden, a lease or leases, the particular terms of which I will not at present refer to. The plaintiffs did not allege that there was any contract written or verbal for granting any such lease, nor was relief asked or given on the ground of specific performance of a contract. But His Honour thought that though there was no contract, and so that no case was made for specific performance, yet on general principles of equity the plaintiff's were entitled to the relief which they asked, and he made a decree accordingly.

The property in question consists of a house and out-buildings, forming part of the town of Huddersfield, or its suburbs. The late Sir John Ramsden, the grandfather of the appellant Sir John William Ramsden, was in, and prior to, the year 1780, seised in fee-simple of a large tract of land, which has since that time been built upon, and which now forms a large part of the town of Huddersfield.

John Charles Ramsden, the eldest son of Sir John, died in his father's lifetime, leaving the appellant, Sir John William Ramsden, his only son and heir-at-law, and Sir John himself died in 1839, leaving the said appellant, his grandson, then only eight years of age.

Sir John, by his will dated in 1838, and made after the death of his son, John Charles Ramsden, devised all his estates, except certain estates which had been settled on the marriage of his said son, but which excepted estates do not include any part of the property in question in this cause, to the use (subject to several charges and trust terms) of his grandson the appellant for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. There were leasing powers in the will to which I need not at present advert. Sir John resided at Byram, about thirty miles from Huddersfield, which latter place he rarely visited. He confided the management of that property to his steward or agent Mr. John Bower, who resided at or near Byram, but who was accustomed to visit Huddersfield twice a-year at audits, for the purpose of receiving the rents and looking over the property.

The mode in which this Huddersfield property was managed was peculiar. A book or roll was kept of the tenants, and as the town became extended, any person desiring to take land for the purpose of building a house used to apply to the agents of Sir John for the land he wanted. This was then marked out for him, he erected his buildings, the ground rent was fixed, and his name was afterwards entered on the roll as a tenant, and he paid his rent at the usual day or days of audit. If he wished to sell his house he and the purchaser used to attend on the agent and surrender, or purport to surrender, his property into the hands of Sir John, and the name of the purchaser was substituted for that of the original tenant. The same course was followed on a mortgage, only that in that case both names, that of the mortgagor and mortgagee, were entered as tenants on the tenants on the tenant roll. In the event of death the name of the legatee or next of kin was substituted for that of the deceased. Persons thus holding land were popularly described as holding by tenant-right. But besides these tenants by tenant-right there were other tenants who obtained regular leases, and the universal, or nearly universal, form of lease was a lease for sixty years, renewable for ever at the end of every twenty or forty years, on payment of a stipulated fine. These tenants holding by lease were entered on the same tenant roll as the tenants by tenant-right, but a memorandum was made against their names, signifying that they held by lease, and the rent at which they held was always at a considerably higher rate than that at which the other tenants held.

The plaintiff Thornton took the two pieces of land, the subject of this suit, on the tenant-right tenure, the one in the year 1837, in the lifetime of Sir John, the other in the year 1845, after his death. The circumstances connected with his taking the land in 1837 are thus stated by him in the bill. He says that in the year 1837, being desirous of erecting a dwelling-house on a piece of high ground at Paddock, part of the Huddersfield property, devised by the will of Sir John, he applied to Mr. Joseph Brook (whom he describes as one of the duly authorized agents of Sir John, with respect to the management and letting of the Ramsden estates, and as transacting all the business relating thereto in the absence of Mr. Bower), and stated to him his desire to become tenant of the piece of ground in question, as he wished to erect a dwelling-house thereon for himself. Brook, he says, informed Bower of what had thus passed, and Bower, having afterwards come over to Huddersfield to an audit, went with Thornton to Paddock, accompanied by Thomas Brook, a son of Joseph Brook, who was then about nineteen years of age, and who acted for his father. The bill then states that Thornton pointed out to Bower the land he wished to have for his house, and that Bower assented to the application, saying that he would leave to Joseph Brook the staking out of the exact quantity of land to be taken. The precise quantity of land was afterwards agreed on between Thornton and Joseph Brook, and the ground rent was fixed by Brook at an annual sum of 4*l.* Thornton then built his house, and has ever since paid the reserved rent of 4*l.* per annum.

The bill then alleges that while the building of the house was in progress, and when it was nearly completed, Joseph Brook, accompanied by Thornton and his father, came on to the land, and on that occasion Thornton consulted Joseph Brook as to the prudence of his taking a lease of the land and buildings, when Joseph Brook stated it would be folly in him to take a lease, that he was equally safe without one, and that he could get a lease whenever he wanted it, the lease referred to being, as Thornton alleges, a lease for sixty years, renewable every twenty years, on payment of two years' ground-rent as a fine, no other lease then existing or being then known on the Ramsden estates, at Huddersfield. No paper or document was signed by Thornton, and he alleges that he took the land relying on what had been said by Joseph Brook, and on the belief universally entertained at Huddersfield, and encouraged by Sir John and his agents that he could have a lease of it for sixty years, renewable every twenty years, whenever he might think fit, and that he would never be disturbed so long as he paid his 4*l.* ground-rent, and in the knowledge that very many other persons who had taken plots of land and built on them on the same belief and assurance had, on application, had leases granted to them for sixty years, renewable every twenty years.

The book or roll of the tenants of the Huddersfield property was kept at Longley Hall, an old mansion-house, situate on part of the property; and the bill alleges that, after Thornton had taken the piece of land in question, he was entered in that book as the tenant thereof, at a yearly ground-rent of 4*l.*

Mr. Bower died in the month of May, 1844, and on his death the trustees of the will of Sir John appointed Mr. George Loch, now one of Her Majesty's counsel, to succeed him as auditor and manager of the estates, and as he resided at a distance he appointed Mr. Alexander Hathorn to be the resident agent, subject to his control and superintendence. Alexander Hathorn resided at Longley Hall.

In this state of things the bill alleges that Thornton, finding himself, in the year 1845, inconvenienced for want of out-door offices, applied to Hathorn for a further piece of ground, and that the same was accordingly measured out for him by two persons acting under the said Thomas Brook, who had survived his father Joseph Brook, and was then one of the authorized surveyors of the Ramsden estates; that he, Thornton, then erected thereon, under the superintendence of Hathorn, the additional buildings which he wanted, and that after he had done so he received from Hathorn a letter, partly printed and partly written, fixing the ground rent for this additional land at 1*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per annum, which additional rent has been ever since regularly paid. The bill alleges that the money expended in building on the two pieces of land amounted to at least 1,850*l.*

On occasion of the first hiring, in 1837, no paper was signed by Thornton, but on applying at Longley Hall, for the second piece of land, a paper containing a form of application was put before him for his signature as follows:—

“ Huddersfield, 16th June, 1845.

“ Gentlemen,—I beg to make application to you for a plot of ground, situate at Paddock, Huddersfield, on which I am desirous of building a mistal and other outbuildings, and which I am willing to hold under you as tenant-at-will, at such rent as you may think proper to fix.

“ I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

“ To the trustees and guardians of Sir John William Ramsden, Baronet.”

This he signed, but, as he says, without considering its purport or effect, without being furnished with a copy, and without having had it explained to him, in the belief that it was a mere matter of course, and in the firm persuasion that he was to hold this second piece of land on precisely the same terms as to not being disturbed in the possession, and as to a sixty years' lease as those on which he held the other land.

These are the circumstances in which Thornton alleges that he became a tenant, first of Sir John Ramsden and afterwards of his devisees; and there can be no doubt that he thereby became at law a mere tenant from year to year. As to the first piece of land, on which he erected the principal buildings, he took it from Bower, as agent of Sir John Ramsden, at an agreed annual rent of 4*l.*, but without any stipulation as to the term for which he was to hold it. As to the second, he took it on written application that it might be demised to him as tenant at will. He paid for several years the rent of both pieces of land, and so had, at least, a tenancy from year to year. Notices to determine these tenancies were given by the appellant, Sir John William Ramsden, and ejectments were brought to recover possession. There being no legal defence to these actions, the present bill was filed by Thornton and by Dyson, who claimed as mortgagee under him, on the ground that Thornton, though at law a mere tenant at will, had an equitable right to a lease for sixty years, with a covenant for perpetual renewal on payment of certain periodical fines. Whether he has established this right is the question raised in the cause. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that he has, and so decreed accordingly.

It will be convenient to consider the case first as to the land taken in 1837, in the lifetime of Sir John. The decree proceeds on the ground that it would have been a fraud in Sir John to have refused to grant the lease demanded, and so that his grandson, the appellant, deriving title only as a volunteer through his will, is bound to do what it would have been a fraud in his grandfather not to have done.

It may be well to consider shortly what the principles of equity on this subject are. If a stranger begins to build on my land, supposing it to be his own, and I, perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a Court of Equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land on which he had expended money on the supposition that the land was his own. It considers that when I saw the mistake into which he had fallen, it was my duty to be active, and to state my adverse title, and that it would be dishonest in me to remain wilfully passive on such an occasion, in order afterwards to profit by the mistake which I might have prevented. But it will be observed that to raise such an equity two things are required—first, that the person expending the money should suppose himself to be building on his own land, and, secondly, that the real owner at the time of the expenditure should know that the land belongs to him, and not to the person expending the money in the belief that he is the owner. For if a stranger builds on my land, knowing it to be mine, there is no principle of equity which would prevent my claiming the land, with the benefit of all the expenditure made on it. There would be nothing in my conduct active or passive, making it inequitable in me to assert my legal rights. It follows as a corollary from these, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say it forms part of them, that if my tenant builds on land which he holds under me, he does not thereby, in the absence of special circumstances, acquire any right to prevent me from taking possession of the lands and buildings when the tenancy has determined. He knew the extent of his interest and it was his folly to expend money upon a title which he knew would, or might, soon come to an end.

The appellants contend that it is within this principle that Thornton is brought. He acquired, they say, possession of the land in question as mere tenant at will, or from year to year, to Sir John, and if on that infirm title he thought fit to expend a large sum in building, there is no principle of equity which prevents Sir John or his devisees from asserting their legal rights by determining the tenancy, and so obtaining the benefit of his expenditure.

The present bill was filed, not controverting this general principle, but contending that there were special circumstances raising an equity in favour of the tenant, arising out of a long uniform course of dealing adopted on the Huddersfield estates, whereby persons taking land, though only as legal tenants at will, or from year to year, were led by Sir John to suppose, and did suppose, that they acquired a right when they had built on the land to hold it for an indefinite time without disturbance, and to become at any time they might think fit lessees for sixty years, with a right to perpetual renewal at the expiration of every twenty or forty years, on certain well-understood terms.

His Honour the Vice-Chancellor thought that such a state of facts was established; that Thornton, when he laid out his money in building his house, did so in the belief created or encouraged by Sir John, that he was at any time entitled to call for such a lease as he claimed, and that Sir John knew that he believed this to be his right, but nevertheless allowed him to proceed. His Honour, I presume, considered this to be in principle the same thing as when the owner of land sees another building on it in the mistaken belief that it is his own. If in that case equity would not allow the owner to lie by and profit by expenditure made by another in the erroneous supposition that the land on which it was made was his own, so neither would it be just to allow a landlord, knowing that his tenant was building, on the notion, however mistaken, that he had rights beyond those of a mere tenant from year to year, to profit by expenditure made in consequence of that mistake. There is great force in this reasoning; and if I had come to the conclusion that Thornton, when he erected his buildings in 1837, did so in the belief that he had against Sir John an absolute right to the lease he claims, and that Sir John knew that he was proceeding on that mistaken notion, and did not interfere to set him right, I should have been much disposed to say that he was entitled to the relief he sought. But a full consideration of the evidence has not led me to any such conclusion. It has failed to satisfy me, first, that Thornton supposed that he had against Sir John any absolute right beyond that of a tenant from year to year; or, secondly, that Sir John knew or believed that Thornton was expending his money in the mistaken belief that he possessed such a right.

The case made by the bill is, that Sir John Ramsden, by his agents, and, since his death, his trustees, in order to induce persons to build on what was called the tenant-right tenure, informed applicants for building plots that they would be equally safe, and that the rents would be less in amount, without a lease than with it; and further, that they could have a lease whenever they required it; and that by means of this course of dealing entire confidence was created in the tenant-right system, as conferring a good title to hold the land so taken for ever, provided only they paid their rent; and further, that they acquired a right to call for a sixty years' renewable lease whenever it might be desired.

The appellant, Sir J. W. Ramsden, by his answer admits the existence of a large class of tenants holding by what is called the tenant-right tenure; but he denies that it was an incident of that tenure that persons holding under it were more than tenants from year to year, or were entitled to call for a lease. On the contrary, he says that such tenants never had any title, except as tenants at will, or tenants from year to year, and that in consequence of their holding by this precarious tenure, they had their land at a rent very much less than another class of tenants, who took land on sixty years' leases, renewable for ever, at the end of twenty or forty years, on certain terms stipulated in each particular case.

The parties in the cause being thus at issue the question is, what is the fair result of the evidence? Does it establish that which the plaintiffs were bound to establish? Does it shew that when Thornton erected his buildings in 1837 (with which case alone we are now dealing) he did so in the belief that, although he was only at law a tenant at will, yet he had a right to hold his land to him and his personal representatives for ever, so long as he duly paid his rent; and, further, that he had a right to call for a sixty years' lease, renewable for ever, whenever he should be minded so to do? And does it shew further that Sir John knew that he was laying out his money in that belief?

In support of their case the plaintiffs offered, in the first place, the evidence of about 250 persons holding land in Huddersfield by the tenant-right tenure, and they say that the bill correctly represents the tenant-right tenure as established at Huddersfield by Sir John and his representatives, on the faith of which they acquire and hold their properties, and that they never heard it questioned before the proceedings were set on foot by the appellant, which has given rise to this present suit.

None of these witnesses state when it was that they became tenants under what they call the tenant-right tenure. It would have been material that they should have done so, for as the only question on which this evidence bears on this part of the case, is that relating to what was the belief of Thornton, when he built his house in 1837, it would have been important for him to shew that the general belief to which the witnesses refer, existed at that time. It is consistent with the evidence of these witnesses, that they all acquired their interests after the death of Sir John, and that no such general reputation or belief as that to which they refer existed in his lifetime. I am the more led to advert to this distinction, because I observe that they speak of the tenant-right tenure as having been established by Sir John and his representatives, and the question as relates to what was done in the time of his representatives, will I think be found to be open to some observations, not applicable to what was done in his lifetime.

It must further be observed that these numerous deponents were all, or almost all, in stations of life, so far as we collect from their descriptions, making it improbable that they would be able well to scan and consider the precise nature of the reputation to which they depose. About thirty of them appear to have been unable to sign their names, and it is no harsh estimate of the weight due to their testimony to say that they were very likely to have been led by an involuntary bias, to give colour to the general belief and reputation in question, to which a little closer examination by persons in a different sphere of life, might have shewn it was not intitled. With these few remarks I shall leave this part of the evidence, to which it is but fair to say that no great weight was attributed at the bar.

What was mainly relied upon was the evidence offered in support of the allegation that Sir John and his agents, by their words, acts, and deeds, and by every means in their power, encouraged persons to erect buildings on the tenant-right tenure, and stated that there was no occasion for leases, that such persons would be as safe without as with leases, and that they might have leases whenever they might require them, and that they should never be disturbed in their possession.

In support of these allegations evidence was given of statements made by Joseph Brook, whom I will assume to have been the principal local agent of Sir John living at Huddersfield, and acting there for him under Mr. Bower. William Brook, the surviving brother, and John Brook, a son of Joseph Brook, were both examined as witnesses, and they both say that Joseph Brook was in the constant habit of assuring all persons who, on applying for land, consulted him as to the expediency of taking a lease, that they would be as safe without a lease as with one, that so long as they paid their rent they would never be disturbed, and that they might have a lease whenever they thought fit to apply for it. The language then attributed to Joseph Brook relates to two propositions—First, that persons taking land without a lease would never be disturbed so long as they paid their rent; secondly, that persons taking land without a lease might have a lease whenever they chose to call for it. As to so much of this evidence as relates to the first proposition I give full credit to the accuracy of the witnesses, but I cannot say the same as to the second. I think for reasons to which I will presently advert, their recollection on that point cannot be safely trusted. Assuming, however, that he did make the statements attributed to him by these witnesses, it becomes important to consider what is the fair import of the language used by him, supposing it to be correctly given by the witnesses who speak to having heard it.

And first as to the statement that there would be no advantage in a lease. for that so long as the rent was paid the parties taking the land would never be disturbed. The respondents say it amounted to a statement that persons taking land at a yearly rent, and building on it, would have a right to hold that land to them and their personal representatives for ever, provided the rent was paid. The appellants say it must be interpreted as meaning only that though the right conferred was that of a mere tenant-at-will, or tenant from year to year, yet so long as the ground-rent was duly paid there was no intention to disturb the tenants in their possession, and that they might thus safely allow the matter to rest in the honour of the Ramsden family. If this latter be the true construction it is clear that even if such statements as are attributed to Joseph Brook had been made by Sir John himself, the persons taking the land would have acquired no right legal or equitable beyond that of a mere tenant from year to year.

If any one makes an assurance to another with or without consideration that he will do or will abstain from doing a particular act, but he refuses to bind himself, and says that for the performance of what he has promised, the person to whom the promise has been made must rely on the honour of the person who has made it; this excludes the jurisdiction of Courts of Equity no less than of Courts of Law. The important question, therefore, is which of these two constructions is the correct one? I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion that of the appellant is the true construction.

In the first place, even taking the language to be exactly that attributed to Joseph Brook by his brother and his son, it is hardly that which he would have used if he had meant to represent to those who consulted him that after they had taken land at a rent and so become tenants, there would be no power in their landlord to disturb them so long as they paid the rent. What he is represented to have said to them is that so long as they paid their ground rents neither they nor their children after them would be molested; not that they could not, but that they would not be molested. The same observation may be made as to the evidence of the witnesses who speak to their conversations with Joseph Brook when they took their land for building. What they represent him to have said when they asked him as to the expediency of taking a lease, is that so long as they paid their ground-rent they would never be disturbed, not that they could never be disturbed, and to one of them, Joe Moore, he added, "Nor will your present rent ever be raised."

This distinction appears to me to be not unimportant when the question is whether it was intended to represent to the persons taking the land that they had a right to retain it for ever, or only that there was no intention on the part of the landlord to disturb them, and that they might rely on the honour of the family that no such step as evicting them from their holdings ever would be taken so long as they paid their rent. The language is at least as consistent with the latter view of the case as with the former, and must, I think, be interpreted in connection with the evidence of Thornton's solicitor, Frederick Robert Jones, who says that for many years prior to 1858 the investment of money on the tenant-right tenure was made without hesitation, because of the confidence which the people reposed in the honour of the Ramsden family—and many other witnesses speak to the same effect.

Thus interpreted, the language attributed to Joseph Brook would not, either at law or in equity, enlarge the interest which every tenant took as tenant at will becoming afterwards tenant from year to year. But the more important question yet remains to be considered, namely, whether there is evidence to shew that Sir John Ramsden knew, or even suspected, that representations were made which might fairly be supposed to lead his tenants at will, or for years, to expend money in building in the belief that by building they acquired a title which he could never disturb. On this point the evidence of the respondents wholly fails.

There are only two occasions on which Sir John is alleged to have been present when anything passed countenancing the notion that the tenants by what is called tenant-right had any rights beyond that of tenants from year to year. The obvious meaning of Sir John, in both cases, was not that he could not, but that he would not, dispossess the persons holding the land. No such assurance was made to Thornton, and the very foundation of his case is, that it was unnecessary; for that the right to possession for ever was created without any special contract by the mere fact of building on land held on what was called tenant-right tenure.

I have thought it right to consider to what relief, if any, Thornton would be entitled with respect to the first branch of the alleged rights of the holders by tenant-right—viz., the right to hold for ever, so long as they paid their rent. But it is not on this branch of the alleged rights that relief is given by the decree, though perhaps it is its necessary foundation. The relief given proceeds on the other branch of the privileges said to attach to the holders of land held on tenant-right, namely, their right to call at pleasure for a sixty years' lease, renewable every twenty years, and what Thornton was bound to establish was that he built, and that Sir John knew that he built, in the belief that he had such a right.

The first observation I will make here is, that though there is a great deal of evidence that such a right was generally believed to exist, and though William Brook and John Brook say generally that Joseph Brook used constantly to tell persons taking land for building that they could have leases whenever they desired, yet none of the witnesses who actually took leases from Joseph Brook in the lifetime of Sir John say that he ever made any such statement to them. Several such witnesses were examined, and say that Joseph Brook told them that so long as they paid their rent they would never be disturbed; but none of them say that anything like a statement that they could have a lease was ever made. On the contrary, Matthew Riley says that when he asked if he could have a lease, Joseph Brook said, "No, we don't grant leases." I mention this because I think it extremely doubtful whether any such statements as those spoken to by William and John Brook as to the right to a lease ever were made.

Without attributing to those witnesses the intention to say what they knew to be false, I must yet observe that as no such statements were made by the only witnesses examined who actually took land from Joseph Brook in the lifetime of Sir John, it is by no means improbable that after a lapse of many years William Brook and John Brook may have confounded in their minds what they heard Joseph say with what since the present dispute has arisen has become the subject of general discourse. But it is no part of the appellants' case to contend that leases would not in general be granted by Sir John to persons applying for land, provided only that they were willing to pay a much higher rent; and nothing is more probable than that what Joseph Brook said to persons applying for land had reference, not to leases to be granted at a future time, but to a lease to be made in the first instance when the tenancy commenced.

Assuming, however, that the facts are as deposed to by William and John Brook and that Joseph was in the habit of telling people when they took land that they could have leases when they thought fit to call for them, the question is, how does that affect Sir John? Where any such statement was made to a person taking land, a question might arise between such persons and Sir John, whether what so passed amounted to a contract by Joseph Brook binding on Sir John. No such question is raised or could be raised as to Thornton, for it is not alleged that any such statement was made when he took his land from Bower. As to Thornton the statements said to have been made by Joseph Brook to persons taking land are only material so far as they tend to make it probable that they were known to him, and so had led him to believe when he took his land from Bower, that he had thereby acquired a right to call for a lease whenever he should think fit.

What was the belief of anyone as to his rights on any particular subject is a matter not admitting of direct evidence. The reasonable explanation of the conversation which Thornton had with Joseph Brook, when his house was nearly completed, seems to me to be that he was considering whether it was prudent to trust to what is considered the honour of the Ramsden family, or whether he ought not to bind them by a lease, not that he supposed he could compel them to grant a lease as a matter of right. But even supposing Thornton to have built in the firm belief that he was entitled to a lease, the important question still remains, did Sir John know that he was building in that belief?

On this point the onus of proof is on the respondent, and he has wholly failed to satisfy me.

In the first place, what was the lease on the faith of a right to which it is argued that Sir John knew Thornton was building? Thornton says that it was a lease for sixty years renewable every twenty years on payment of two years' ground-rent as a fine, and that no other lease was at that time known at Huddersfield. This is not the nature of the lease to which the decree has declared him intitled, nor is it consistent with the term of the leases then usually granted on the Ramsden estates, when leases were granted, the fine on renewal being generally one year's improved value, not two years' ground-rent.

But a much more important observation has reference to the rent. What can be the meaning of a person having a right to call for a lease at a rent to be agreed upon between him and his lessor? Suppose they do not agree?

It is endeavoured to meet this by saying that the rent could not exceed double the amount of that at which the person applying had been holding as tenant from year to year. But the evidence of the plaintiff fails to establish any such limit. It is differently given by different witnesses; but I think it is fair to take it from the witness Frederick Jones, who had the best opportunity of knowing the general opinion of the place, as he had formerly been one of the solicitors of Sir John, and at the time of his examination was the solicitor of Thornton. He says, "It was part of the said system, and I have known of many instances that tenant-right holders, or holders at will, as they have been variously termed, might have, and have had, sixty years' leases, renewable every twenty years, for ever, upon such terms with regard to rent as they could bargain for with the agents of the estate, but it was generally understood that such rent would be double the tenant-right unless the agents either had agreed or would agree for a less rent." Now, supposing all this to have been known to Sir John, I do not think it can be treated as amounting to knowledge on his part that his tenants at will were laying out their money in the belief that they had a right to call for a lease perpetually renewable whenever they might think fit. The mere circumstance that the amount of rent remained to be settled by agreement between the lessor and the lessee excludes the notion of there being a right to compel the grant for a lease.

The statement by Jones that it was generally understood that the rent would be double that which had been paid by the lessee as tenant from year to year unless a lower rate was agreed upon is far too vague to be the foundation of anything like a claim of right. He does not even say that it was generally understood that the landlord could not insist on a higher, but only that he would not; the same distinction to which I have already adverted in dealing with the alleged right to hold for ever so long as the ground-rent was duly paid. If there were nothing else, this absolute uncertainty as to rent seems to me to make it impossible that Sir John could have supposed his tenants-at-will were building in the belief that they had a right to compel their landlord to grant them a lease.

But another important observation on this part of the case is that the supposed right is one in which there was no reciprocity. It is not alleged, indeed it is denied, that there was any right in the landlord to compel his tenant from year to year to accept a lease, and yet it is supposed that the landlord was continually making demises from year to year, with the knowledge that those who thus became his tenants supposed they acquired rights against him, without his acquiring any corresponding rights against them.

The only evidence which could have satisfied me that Sir John knew or even suspected that such a belief was entertained, would have been a uniform practice of granting such leases as represented to have been the right of the tenant-at-will whenever they were called for, but on this point the evidence totally fails. There is no evidence that even a single lease was granted in the lifetime of Sir John to any person holding by tenant-right, though he was in enjoyment of the property for at least fifty-nine years. During that long period of time he granted 296 leases, of which 227 were granted before, and sixty-nine after, the year 1816. Of the 227 five were not renewable leases, but the remaining 222 contained a covenant by Sir John to renew at the end of every twenty years on payment of a stipulated fine, or if no renewal was then made, then, at the end of forty years, on payment of a larger fine. The nature and the amount of the fine varied. In seventeen of the 222 the fine was one year's improved value if the lease was renewed at the end of twenty years, or ten years' value if renewed at the end of forty years. In 174 the fines were two years' rent if renewed at the end of twenty years, or ten years' rent if renewed at the end of forty years. In the remaining thirty-one the fines were fixed sums not depending either on the rent or value of the land. The sixty-nine leases granted after 1816 were all renewable leases like the others. Thirty-one of them were renewals of former leases, and the remaining thirty-eight were all made renewable on payment of one year's value at the end of forty years. It seems to me impossible in the face of this evidence to believe that Sir John knew that persons taking land on the tenant-right tenure had built or were building their houses in the belief that they were entitled, whenever they thought fit, to call for a sixty years' lease, renewable at the end of every twenty years, either according to what Thornton says was his belief, namely, on payment of two years' rent, or according to the relief given by the decree, on payment of one year's improved value.

Sir John could not have understood that any such belief prevailed, knowing, as he must, that though he had many hundred tenant-right tenants he had never granted a lease to any one of them; and further, that in the cases in which he had granted leases to persons taking land on lease instead of by tenant-right, he had from time to time changed the terms of renewal according to his pleasure. It does not seem to me important that, after the death of Sir John, leases were in many cases granted to tenants holding by tenant-right.

The circumstances under which they were granted do not lead to the inference that Sir John knew that buildings were erected in the belief that the persons building could claim a lease as of right, which is the point we are now considering. It is no part of the appellant's case that land was not frequently taken for building on the faith that when the buildings were erected a lease would be granted. In all such cases leases were granted. The conversations spoken to by the plaintiffs' witnesses invariably shew that it was in general optional with those who took land to take it either with or without a lease. The substance of what Joseph Brook is reputed to have said is almost invariably that the applicant might have a lease; but that he would be throwing away his money, that it would cause him expenses and materially increase his rent, and that he would be perfectly safe without a lease. Still it is certain that many persons preferred even at higher rent the ordinary security of a lease, which, however, was never granted till the buildings had been completed or nearly completed.

The mode of dealing with this property being such as I have stated, it was almost certain that at the death of Sir John there would be, as in fact there were, many persons who had taken land on the faith that, according to the usual practice, they might, when the buildings were completed, have a lease in the form then ordinarily adopted. The will, however, was thought by counsel not to contain power sufficiently ample to enable his devisees to grant leases in these cases. To obviate all difficulties on this head an Act of Parliament was passed in the year 1844 giving to the tenant for life, and to the trustees of the will during his minority, leasing powers, which it was thought had not been effectively created by the will.

The Act, after reciting the will of Sir John, and his death, proceeds to state that the system of managing the Huddersfield estates had been that no person desirous of taking land on lease for building purposes obtained any written agreement for a lease, but was permitted, after a piece of land had been appropriated to him, to build upon it upon the understanding that after he had built a lease would be granted to him, perpetually renewable according to the form set forth in the schedule, and that many persons, relying on this system, had in the lifetime of Sir John erected houses on faith of leases being granted to them, but no such leases had been granted; and further, that since the death of Sir John, difficulties had arisen concerning the renewal of leases in pursuance of his covenant for renewal. It is enacted that it should be lawful for the trustees of the will, during the minority of the appellant, Sir J. W. Ramsden, and for him after he should attain his majority, to demise and lease to any person who in the lifetime of Sir John took land, being part of the estate devised by the will of Sir John, on the faith of a lease being granted to him according to the system aforesaid, and who had erected buildings thereon, by a lease of the same according to the form mentioned in the schedule. This form was a lease of sixty years renewable at the end of every twenty years, on payment of one year's improved value, or, at the end of every forty years on payment of ten years' improved value. The Sir John would have been bound by his covenants to grant; and the third second section of the Act authorized the granting of renewed leases, which and subsequent sections enable the trustees during the minority, and Sir John himself after attaining his majority, to grant building leases of any of the devised lands, with covenants for perpetual renewal, on terms to be agreed upon. No leases were granted after the death of Sir John until after the passing of this Act, but Mr. Hathorn, who, on the death of Mr. Bower in 1844, had become the resident local agent of the appellant at Huddersfield, informs us that after the passing of the Act, and during the minority of the appellant, thirty leases were granted to persons who were, at the times of the grant, holding by tenant-right tenure. He adds, however, that in the case of fourteen out of these thirty the parties were entitled to a lease, as they had built on an agreement that they should have a lease when the buildings were completed. All the other sixteen were granted on rents which were materially raised, and not on any claim of right by the parties who had obtained them.

What was done after the death of Sir John can only be material upon this part of the case, so far as it may throw light backwards on what was the practice in his lifetime, and it seems to me impossible to deduce from what was thus done in and after the year 1845, under the powers of this Act, anything as to what Sir John supposed to be the opinion of those who took land from him without any agreement for a lease. As to many of them it is clear that they were entitled against Sir John to claim a lease. As to the others the lease was granted as a matter of favour or contract, not as a matter of right; and it has not, therefore, any tendency to support the views of the respondents. But there were some other leases granted to tenant-right holders besides the thirty thus referred to, namely, those granted to persons whose tenant-right lands were compulsorily taken by railway companies. The facts as to these persons were as follows:—Some houses in Huddersfield, held by persons on the tenant-right tenure, were, in the year 1845 and 1846, necessary for enabling the Huddersfield and Sheffield Railway Company to make their line. Notices for taking their houses were served on the occupants; but as they were, in the eye of the law, at least, mere tenants-at-will, a difficulty arose as to the mode in which, and the persons to whom, the purchase-money was to be paid. If the company was to treat them as mere tenants from year to year, the purchase-money, except so much of it as would represent the very small interest of such a tenant, would be payable to the devisees of Sir John. But it had always been the practice to recognize these tenants, though at law mere tenants from year to year, yet, as holding under an engagement of honour, that so long as they paid their rents they would never be disturbed. This was felt by the trustees to give the tenants a title in honour to receive such compensation as they would have been entitled to if they had derived from Sir John a legal title and not a title depending merely on the honour of the family. It would not, however, have been just to give to them a legal title enabling them to hold for ever at the rents at which they held as tenants from year to year. For in those cases in which a legal title was granted to persons when they took land for building it had always been done by means of a lease perpetually renewable, at a rent much greater than that at which it would have been granted to them if they had taken it as tenants from year to year. The course, therefore, followed by the trustees was to treat these tenants as persons who had built on the faith of having leases, and to fix the rent at the sum at which, if that had been the case, the leases would have been granted. Leases were accordingly granted on that principle, and so the landlords and the tenants became entitled to the purchase-money between them, according to the value of their respective interests. Sixteen such leases were granted in the year 1846, and Hathorn, who was then the local agent at Huddersfield, states in his evidence that none of them were granted on the application of the tenants or as a matter of right; and, further, that these leases were entirely exceptional, and all the arrangements connected with them were carried out by Mr. Fenton, since deceased, and Frederick R. Jones, then the solicitors of the trustees. Frederick R. Jones afterwards became the solicitor of the plaintiffs, and was examined after, and in reply to Hathorn, but he does not contradict him, and, on the contrary, states that the scheme of granting these leases originated with the trustees. I am aware that two of the lessees, Pass and Tattersfield, stated, when examined in chief, that their leases had been granted to them on a claim of right. No other witness confirms this statement, which is wholly inconsistent with what was afterwards sworn, not only by Hathorn, but also by Frederick R. Jones, the plaintiff's solicitor, and I find it impossible not to believe that the account given by Hathorn is strictly accurate.

Even assuming, therefore, that what was done after the death of Sir John could be relied on as tending to show either what was the belief under which persons taking land in his lifetime acted, or what Sir John supposed it to be, I do not think that these leases granted on the occasion of the making of the railway throw any light on the subject.

For the same reasons I attach no weight to the fact that on other occasions when damage was done to houses held on tenant-right by working mines or otherwise, the compensation was, with the knowledge and approbation of Sir John and his agents, paid to the tenants. So again, local taxes for drainage and other improvements were charged on and paid by the tenants. All this was the necessary consequence of their being treated by Sir John as persons whom he felt bound in honour to consider as tenants never to be disturbed, and do not, as it appears to me, tend to support the case of the plaintiffs.

So far, therefore, as relates to the piece of land taken by Thornton in the lifetime of Sir John, I do not think it necessary to say more, except only as to a part of the argument at the bar, by which I understood counsel to suggest that it was not necessary to prove actual knowledge in Sir John to shew that he knew that Thornton built on the faith that he was entitled to a lease whenever he should think fit to call for it; but that if that was known to Joseph Brook, Sir John would be bound as if it had been known to himself. I think this is a mistake as to the principles of the law of agency. Even if Joseph Brook was what he is not shown to have been, and what, on the evidence, I do not think he was, a local agent authorised to create tenancies without referring to Bower, still that would not enable him to bind his principal as to matters de hors the contract. If he had made it part of the contract with any person whom he had accepted as tenant-at-will that he (the tenant) should be at liberty to call for a lease at his pleasure, then would arise the question whether this part of the contract was within the scope of the agent's authority. But it is not suggested that any such contract was made with Thornton. His case is, that Mr. Bower, being a person authorised by Sir John to let his land to persons taking it as tenants-at-will, had let to him, as tenant-at-will, the land on which he built his house in 1837, and that he had taken it without requiring a lease, fully believing, from what Joseph Brook stated to him, and had stated on numerous other occasions to other persons, and what had thereby and otherwise become the common reputation of the place, that all persons so taking land were entitled to a lease whenever they should call for it. Supposing such statements to have been made, however constantly and openly, they would not be binding on Sir John unless he had authorised Joseph Brook to make them, or else knew that he made them, and that persons taking land acted on the faith of them.

If, indeed, the principal knows that persons dealing with his agents have so dealt in consequence of their believing that all statements made by him had been warranted by the principal, and knowing this, allows the person so dealing to expend money in the belief that the agent had an authority which, in fact, he had not, it may be that, in such a case, a Court of Equity would not allow the principal afterwards to set up want of authority in the agent. But this equity, whenever it exists, depends absolutely on the fact that the knowledge on which it rests can be brought home to the principal. Here the contract was made by Mr. Bower on the part of Sir John, and by him only. I do not think there is any principle of law or equity which can enable the tenant to say that the rights under that contract against Sir John could be affected by statements made by a local agent, without the knowledge of or authority from either Sir John himself or Mr. Bower.

I have gone now through the whole of the case, so far as relates to the land taken for building in the lifetime of Sir John, and I have stated my reasons for thinking that Thornton had no title, legal, or equitable, beyond that of a tenant from year to year, that his claim to continue to hold so long as he paid his rent, as well as his claim to have a lease rested entirely on the pleasure of Sir John, and on what he and those who derive title through him may think proper to concede. It remains only that I should consider the claim so far as it relates to the tenancy created after the death of Sir John, as to which I need not detain your Lordships long. The observations I have made on the tenancy created in the lifetime of Sir John are all applicable to this second taking, besides which, there are other reasons which, as it appears to me, show that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief given by the decree, or to any relief at all. The undisputed facts as to this part of the case are as follows:—In the month of June, 1845, Thornton being desirous of obtaining more ground for the purpose of adding some outbuildings to his house, applied for that purpose to Mr. Hathorn, who on the death of Mr. Bower in 1844, had been appointed a resident agent for managing the property under Mr. Loch, who had succeeded Mr. Bower. Previously to this time a very proper system had been introduced in the management of this property, under which every person applying for land to be held by him not on lease, was required to make his application in writing, stating expressly that he applied for it to be holden by him as tenant-at-will, and printed forms for this purpose were kept at Longley Hall, where the business of the estate was managed. When Thornton applied to Hathorn for the additional land, one of these forms, properly filled up, was put into his hands for his signature, and he signed the same. I have already mentioned its exact form and contents. Hathorn having obtained the consent and approbation of Mr. Loch, sent to Thornton a letter of advice as follows:—

“ Longley Hall, Huddersfield, 24th July, 1845.

“ Sir,—I beg to inform you that the plan of the ground on which you propose to erect a mistal, stable, &c., at Paddock, to be held at will, has been approved of and signed by Mr. Loch. The quantity of ground to be occupied by you will be 165 square yards, which at the rate of 1½d. per yard will make the amount of the annual ground rent payable by you to the trustees of Sir J. Wm. Ramsden, Baronet, 11. 0s. 7d. The first half-year's rent will be payable at November rent-day, 1846. As soon as your building has been completed, I will thank you to come here for the purpose of having your name regularly entered in the rental of this estate.—Your obedient servant,

“ ALEX. HATHORN.”

The ground was properly staked out, Thornton erected his new buildings, and was entered on the rental at Longley Hall, and he afterwards duly paid his rent from time to time as it became due. That he thereby became at law tenant to the trustees from year to year, and for no greater interest is clear. But he insists on the same equity as on his first tenancy, namely, that he was entitled to treat this tenancy-at-will as giving him against Sir John and the trustees an absolute right to call for a sixty years' lease perpetually renewable. The decree of the Vice-Chancellor proceeds on the ground that he was so entitled, but I am quite unable to understand the principle on which this relief was given.

Even if contrary to the opinion I have formed, the facts had warranted the conclusion that Sir John was bound to consider all persons entered as tenants-at-will, or from year to year on his rent-roll, as being entitled to call for such a lease as Thornton required; still I cannot comprehend how any such equity can affect the appellant Sir J. W. Ramsden with respect to the tenancies-at-will created by his guardians after the death of Sir John. Every precaution was taken to show to persons who took land after the death of Sir John that they were tenants-at-will. They were always required to sign an application for land to be held by them as tenants-at-will, and Hathorn says that the words “tenant-at-will” were printed in large conspicuous text-character, so that they could not be overlooked. Thornton indeed says that though he signed the application, he had no opportunity of making a copy of it. He does not suggest that he did not read and perfectly understand it, and Hathorn says he might have had a copy if he wished for it. Add to which that in the answer which he retained, or might have retained, he was expressly told that he was to hold as tenant-at-will at a rent then fixed by the lessors.

I consider it, therefore, to be established beyond doubt that he knew that his title was merely that of a tenant from year to year, though I also firmly believe that he thought in regard to this second hiring as in regard to the former, that he might safely rely on what was called the honour of the Ramsden family, for the evidence shows that this feeling prevailed after the death of Sir John no less than during his life. I will not repeat what I have already said, namely, that no Court can take cognizance of claims founded only on what is considered an engagement of honour. On these grounds I think that the claim of Thornton to a lease of this second piece of ground is at least as untenable as that relating to the former. I will only add that the conduct of Thornton when, in 1859, he surrendered the property to the appellant, Sir J. W. Ramsden, for the purpose of the mortgage to Dyson, and caused the names of himself and Dyson to be entered as tenants at will, strongly confirms the view I have taken of the case.

The decree of the Vice-Chancellor declares the plaintiff Thornton entitled to a sixty years' lease, renewable every twenty years on payment of the fines mentioned in the schedule to the Act of Parliament, i.e., a fine of one year's improved value. Even if all other difficulties were removed, I cannot understand how the plaintiff could be entitled to a lease on these terms, when his case as made by the bill is, that he was entitled in equity to a sixty years' lease renewable every twenty years on payment by way of fine, not of one year's improved value, but of two years' ground-rent. The mere circumstance of the uncertainty as to what the terms of renewal were to be affords cogent evidence against any claim of right whatever. The plaintiffs, in my opinion, have wholly failed; and I shall here dismiss the case, with one observation, however, as to the claim based on the reliance placed on the honour of the Ramsden family. It is not my intention to step out of the line of my duty by expressing, or even forming, an opinion, as to how far this claim is well founded. Probably the system was originally adopted in the motion that it would give to an humble and not generally wealthy body of dependent tenants an easy and cheap mode of holding and disposing of their houses. It was impressed on them that by means of the register kept in the books at Longley Hall, they could sell, mortgage, or dispose of the property, so far as they had property in their houses by will, at an expense of 2s. 6d. instead of many pounds. Now whatever obligations of honour the mode in which this property was managed may have created on the Ramsden family, I confess that this case has satisfied me that it was absolutely necessary, for the interest of all parties, that some mode should be adopted for putting an end to it. It was an attempt to create a new and cheap mode of conveyancing, which was certain, sooner or later, to involve in difficulties those who had relied on it. The supposed transfers were altogether ineffectual; and it is a subject of wonder to me that litigation was not long ago occasioned by it. The present appellant endeavoured to do what he thought fair and just by obtaining powers to grant leases for ninety-nine years. Whether that was more or less than his tenants-at-will had a right to look for from what they call the honour of the family is a point on which I give no opinion; but that some arrangement should be adopted which should put an end to the system hitherto pursued seems to me absolutely indispensable.

In my opinion the plaintiff did not establish a title to any relief, so that his bill ought to have been dismissed.

In the particular circumstances of this case, and not at all relying upon the fact that I know that the opinions of your Lordships are not unanimous, which I think is no ground for influencing your Lordships' judgment on the question of costs; but in consideration of the circumstances that this system has gone on so long, and that the parties might have been thereby misled as to what they supposed to be their rights, I shall advise your Lordships to remit the cause to the Court of Chancery, with a declaration that the bill ought to have been dismissed, without saying anything as to costs.

I ought to have said that I have had more than one communication on the subject of this case with Lord Brougham, who was present at the hearing, and is unable to attend here to-day; but he has desired me to say that having communicated with me and my noble and learned friends on the subject, he entirely concurs in the views which I have expressed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The bill in this suit was filed by the respondent against the appellants on the 12th April, 1862, and the case was fully argued before the Vice-Chancellor Stuart. His Honour pronounced the decree in favour of the respondents, not on the ground that this was a case of a claim for specific performance, nor did the bill pray relief on that ground, but that it proceeded upon a recognised equity much higher and more positive than the discretionary and ordinary equitable jurisdiction for specific performance, his Honour thinking that in the case of the permission to build the house given by the acknowledged agent of Sir John Ramsden, in the year 1837, and by the trustees and guardians in the case of building the mistal in 1845, a lease ought in equity to be given to indemnify the tenants. His Honour seems to have thought that it would be a sort of breach of faith and a fraud on the part of the owners if they did not grant leases, and he thought they ought to do so, and that he was warranted in ordering a lease for sixty years, at double the rent then payable. Whether the decree of the respondents can be supported upon the grounds stated by the Vice-Chancellor is the important question in this case.

The case is of some interest with regard to the principle it involves, and of great importance as it affects a very large and valuable property in the district of Huddersfield, with respect to which very similar questions may no doubt arise. It was argued for several days in your Lordships' House, by very able and learned counsel on both sides. The minutest parts of the case have been investigated with great care, and the long lapse of time since the argument has enabled us to consider the whole case very carefully. I have satisfied myself that the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack which he has just delivered that the bill ought to be dismissed, is perfectly correct. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs cannot support their case, either at law or in equity.

To consider the case without for the present adverting to the ground of the Vice-Chancellor's decision, it is perfectly clear that the respondents could not succeed, on the ground of a manorial custom, affecting the tenure of those lands analogous to a copyhold custom. The alleged practice is comparatively quite modern, nor has that view of the case very properly ever been brought forward on the part of the defendants in error. Nor has any express or implied contract been made out on the part of the landlord by the evidence. Certainly there was no contract in writing by the landlord or an agent, competent to bind him either express or implied, so as to bind the landlord at law. Nor was there I clearly think, any evidence of an express or implied parol contract which being afterwards partly performed, would be binding notwithstanding the provisions of the Statute of Frauds.

On the part of the respondents, it was contended that Thornton took under what is termed the "tenant-right" system in the manor, which existed only or arose in the time of Sir John Ramsden, and is alleged to have been, that the person who took land to build upon, and did build to the satisfaction of the lord or his steward, was entitled to hold at a certain rent, and also whenever he pleased to call for it to have a lease from the lord of the manor for sixty years, at the rent fixed for a lease, at the time of the being allowed to build by the lord or his steward, or if not then fixed, was to be afterwards fixed, and the lease to be renewable at stated periods upon the payment of a fixed fine. It does not appear that any lease was ever given, as far as I can collect, to any person claiming on the ground of this tenant-right, and as being entitled thereby by Sir John Ramsden in himself or in his time.

To my mind there would be very great difficulty in making out that any such implied contract could be construed to have arisen on the part of the landlord. Sir John Ramsden, the proprietor, in whose time the usage originated, does not appear to have granted any leases under this usage. But even if there had been a practice of granting leases prevailing for a very long period of time by the landlord, who was owner in fee, and might grant any leases of any description that he pleased to any person he pleased, with any terms, it would be very difficult indeed to convert that practice into an obligatory custom or usage, especially in those cases in which the alleged custom itself contemplates a future important matter which was left open to future agreement, namely, the amount of rent to be paid, and other matters to be fixed under the lease to be granted. A thousand instances of the grant of leases, all of which may be referred to kind feeling on the part of the landlord, which will explain every part of this case (and which I sincerely hope will, whatever the result of this suit may be, continue still) will prove nothing.

It appears to me to be perfectly out of the question to hold that there was a contract to grant a lease, the most important terms of which—the amount and time of payment of the rent to be paid—were not stipulated, and which would be naturally the subject of a fresh agreement. If a verbal statement to the like effect had been made by Sir John Ramsden himself to Thornton, before he began to build, the precise terms being clearly in the power of Sir John Ramsden to fix, all that could be said would be, that the rent and precise terms would, in such case, be left to the honourable feelings of Sir John Ramsden, and not create a legal obligation. I cannot see how he could be considered to have made any complete contract at all; still less is there any ground to imply, on the part of the landlord, an agreement that, until the lease was granted, the tenant was to hold as an irremovable tenant for ever at the lower rent at which he held the property as tenant-at-will, which was suggested in the course of the argument.

To me the evidence is quite satisfactory that Thornton took both takes as tenant at will, both in point of law and in equity, and every claim beyond that can only be on the honourable feelings of the appellant. On giving up the first take to the Commercial Club on the 30th September, 1857, he then acknowledged himself to be tenant at will in distinct terms, and at such rent as he, the landlord, would think proper. At the second take of the mistal, on the 26th June, 1848, he takes it expressly as tenant at will from the trustees and guardians. Afterwards, on the 16th October, 1856, Thornton writes to Mr. Hathorn, to know the conditions on which Sir J. W. Ramsden then granted leases, and how much per yard he should be charged for a house, if leased, as he thought of having a lease, which shows distinctly and decidedly that he did not then consider that he was in the condition of a leasehold tenant, or tenant having a right to a lease; and, therefore, there certainly was no mistake in stating himself to be tenant at will of the land in the first take, in transferring it to the Commercial Club in 1857.

These circumstances form a very strong case against the plaintiff which is, in my mind, entirely unanswerable at law. The words "tenant-at-will," were undoubtedly meant by the landlord to be understood in their proper legal sense, and must be taken to have been understood by the tenant to mean what they imported. There cannot be, I think, the slightest doubt upon this part of the case.

Before advertng to the most important question, it remains shortly to notice an argument brought forward on the part of the respondent before proceeding to the most important part of the case. It appeared that in 1845 the trustees of the Ramsden Estate permitted some tenants whose holdings were required by some railway companies, and who held under the tenant-right system to receive compensation for the buildings from such companies who occupied them, on the footing of being entitled to leases thereof. And the guardians of the appellant granted leases to them under the Act of 1844 for the purpose of enabling them to claim such compensation. This was purely as a matter of favour to the individuals to whom it was granted, and not an acknowledgment of liability on the part of the trustees and guardians. I am quite satisfied that there was no contract, express or implied.

But the most material and more doubtful question remains to be considered, viz., whether the ground on which the learned Vice-Chancellor has proceeded can be supported—whether there is sufficient proof of that species of fraud committed by Sir John Ramsden or the other appellants, on which his Honour relies. This fraud is in the nature of a personal fraud in Sir John Ramsden as to the transaction in 1837, and in the devisees and guardians in that of the year 1845, and a doubt has certainly passed through my mind whether that fraud, if it was a fraud, was not merely personal, and could in any way effect the estate in respect of which it was committed in the hands of one to whom it was afterwards transferred, though a mere volunteer. But this point has not been argued, and I will assume that my doubt is unfounded, and that if Sir John Ramsden was guilty of the personal fraud alleged, the loss occasioned by that fraud might be satisfied out of the estate itself of the person guilty of the fraud against the appellant, who is not a purchaser for a valuable consideration, but a mere volunteer. But I still feel a difficulty how the personal fraud of the trustees and guardians who were not absolute owners can affect the right of the appellant, Sir John W. Ramsden, who does not claim under them.

But it is not necessary to consider this point, for I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, that personal fraud of this nature on the part of Sir John Ramsden, or his trustees, and guardians on the respondents, cannot be made out in this case.

If a stranger build on my land supposing it to be his own, and I, knowing it to be mine, do not interfere, and leave him to go on, equity considers it to be dishonest in me to remain passive, and afterwards to interfere and take the profit. But if a stranger build knowingly upon my land, there is no principle of equity which prevents me from insisting on having back my land, with all the additional value which the occupier has imprudently added to it. If a tenant of mine does the same thing, he cannot insist on refusing to give up the estate at the end of his term. It was his own folly to build.

In this case the respondent had most clearly, and to his own knowledge nothing but an estate at will in both the first and second take, charged afterwards by the payment of annual rent for tenancies in both takes from year to year. He had been most distinctly and clearly told that he was to be tenant-at-will, and he most clearly understood so. I have already stated that there was no agreement with the landlord for any further estate, or interest, but if it could have been shewn on the part of the respondent that the landlord, Sir John Ramsden, with respect to the first take, and the trustees and guardians in the second take, believing the tenant to be ignorant of his rights, had purposely advised him to go on, the case might fall within the same principle as a case of fraud. But no such case has been made out to my satisfaction. There is no expression, encouragement, or conduct on the part of Sir John Ramsden himself, which ought to raise that suspicion. Those on the part of Mr. Hathorn which have been given in evidence, are all explained by his confidence in the honour and kind feeling of Sir John Ramsden and his family. Mr. Hathorn was only a sub-agent, and declarations made by him could not affect Sir John Ramsden, or the proprietors, as those of an agent who had full power to manage the estate, and sell, or demise it of his own authority, whose acts would be the same as those of Sir John Ramsden himself would be. He was clearly subordinate to Mr. Loch, if

Mr. Loch indeed had any such power, which I much doubt. Those made by Mr. J. Brook are open to the same observation. He was not an agent with full power to manage the estate, to sell and demise it of his own authority, so as to make his statements equal to those of Sir John Ramsden himself, and Brook's observations, made at the time of the first take, were only an expression of the agent of his confidence in the kind and liberal disposition of Sir John and his family. As to the statements and declarations made by Sir John Ramsden himself bearing on this part of the case, they are only two—one was what passed in the presence of a person named Mortimer, and the other spoken to by one Mr. Brier, when Sir John said the tenant should never be disturbed. These related to different transactions than those in question, and were strictly inapplicable to it, as Sir John Ramsden might have reasons for approving of one demise, and not another, and even if they applied to Thornton's take, they amounted to no more than the expression of kind feeling on the part of the landlord, of his own liberal intention, and were not obligatory on him in point of law or equity as a promise. If a man expressly promise upon his honour, his promise does not create an obligation in point of law. If what he says must be so understood by those to whom it is addressed, it cannot amount to more, and creates no obligation in point of law. The assurance of agents in their confidence in the honour of their principals and their family cannot carry the case any further.

I have satisfied myself that this is the true view of the case, and that no liability has been proved on the appellant in any way at law, or in equity, which is all that we in the course of our duty have to decide. What the appellant, Sir John William Ramsden, may choose to do if he succeeds in this suit, is entirely for himself to decide, his obligation (if any) being one binding only in honour.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—I regret that in a case of so much importance as this is there should be any difference of opinion amongst us as to the proper decision of it, and I should have been glad if the practice of your Lordships' House allowed me to withhold the expression of my dissent from the order proposed by the Lord Chancellor. But having submitted in writing very fully to your Lordships the grounds of my opinion without any success, it is unnecessary, and I think it would be useless, that I should do more on the present occasion than state in a very few words what I understand to be the law upon the subject, and the effect generally which the evidence has produced on my mind.

The rule of law applicable to the case appears to me to be this—If a man under a verbal agreement with a landlord for a certain interest in land, or, what amounts to the same thing, under an expectation created or encouraged by the landlord that he shall have a certain interest, takes possession of such land with the consent of the landlord, and upon the faith of such promise or expectation lays out money upon the land with the knowledge of the landlord and without objection by him, a court of equity will compel the landlord to give effect of such promise or expectation. This was the principle of the decision in Gregory v. Mighell (18 Ves. 328) and as I conceive is open to no doubt. If, at the hearing of the cause there appears to be such uncertainty as to the particular terms of the contract as might prevent a court of equity from giving relief, if the contract had been in writing, but there had been no expenditure, a court of equity will, nevertheless, in the case which is above stated interfere in order to prevent fraud, though there has been a difference of opinion amongst great judges as to the nature of the relief to be granted. Lord Thurlow seems to have thought that the Court would ascertain the terms by reference to the Master, and if they could not be ascertained would itself fix reasonable terms. Lord Alvanley and Lord Redesdale, and perhaps Lord Eldon, thought this was going too far; but I do not understand any doubt to have been entertained by any of them that, either in the form of a specific interest in the land or in the shape of compensation for the expenditure, a Court of Equity would give relief and protect in the meantime the possession of the tenant. If on the other hand, a tenant being in possession of land and knowing the nature and extent of his interest, lays out money upon it in the hope or expectation of an extended term or an allowance for expenditure, then, if such hope or expectation has not been created or encouraged by the landlord, the tenant has no claim which any Court of Law or Equity can enforce. This was the principle of the decision in Pilling v. Armitage (12 Ves. 85), and like the decision in Gregory v. Mighell, seems founded on plain rules of reason and justice.

The whole question, I think, in this case is within which class does the present claim fall, a point which of course depends entirely on the effect of the evidence. The evidence in my opinion, shews that it falls under the former. The course adopted by Sir John Ramsden on letting his land was this. He lived himself at some distance, about thirty miles from Huddersfield. He had a principal agent or steward, Mr. Bower, who lived near him, and sub-agents or persons in his employ, who resided at Huddersfield. If any person desired to take a plot of land for building, he applied to the steward or one of the sub-agents; and if the application was approved, the piece of ground required was measured and staked out, and the rent fixed. The applicant then took possession, and built his house, on the completion of which, and not before, he was charged with rent, and was entered as a tenant on the rent-books of the landlord.

Thus far there is no controversy between the parties on this record. The question is, what were the terms held out on behalf of the landlord, and on the faith of which the tenants invested their money? The appellant insists that the persons thus taking land and building were of two classes, those who originally contracted for the leases, and those who preferred to hold at lower rents without lease. He admits that the former class were entitled to leases renewable for ever on certain terms; but he insists that those who did not originally contract for leases, were not entitled at any time afterwards to have such leases granted to them—that they were mere tenants-at-will in the ordinary legal acceptation of the term, had no right whatever, legal or equitable, against their landlord, but might, as soon as they had completed their buildings, be turned out of them without any compensation or allowance for their expenditure.

The respondents, on the other hand, maintain that there was no such distinction as is alleged in the original contracts for land—that those who built and entered on their land without leases at lower rents did so on the assurance that they might have leases whenever they required them, and that, in the meantime, they should not be disturbed in their possession, or, at all events, not without full compensation. There is contradictory testimony upon these points, but it appears to me that the preponderance is in favour of the respondents.

I am unable to reconcile with the appellant's hypothesis of distinct contracts for leases, what was done under the Act of 1844—the grant of renewable leases in 1846 to twenty or thirty persons, as to whom there is no evidence that any of them had specially contracted for leases; or the language held by Mr. Loch in 1851, when the tenants were alarmed by the apprehension that they would be required to take leases—unless the tenants-at-will were entitled to leases, there was no power to grant them under the Act. With respect to the letter signed by Thornton, on the application for the two takes on the 16th June, 1845, more reliance was placed upon it in the argument at the bar than I think it was entitled to. The whole force of the observation consists in the use of the words “to hold as tenant-at-will,” which it is said must mean what the words in their legal sense import. The respondents contend that those words were used just as they are used in copyholds—Tenant-at-will of the lord, according to the custom of the manor; that the lands though not copyhold were dealt with very much in the manner in which copyholds are dealt with; that the tenant's title consisted in an entry of the name of the taker as tenant in the books of the lord, and that the transfer was made by a similar entry in the same books, and that the term "tenant-at-will" was used merely to distinguish those who had no leases from those who had leases. I confess that a reference to the rentals in evidence, appears to me strongly to confirm this view.

It was argued that whatever might have been the original position of the parties, the papers which were signed in 1859, on the occasion of the loan made by the Commercial Inn Money Club, had the effect of clearly making Thornton a tenant-at-will. Having regard to the circumstances under which they were signed, I can attribute no weight to these papers. No notice was given to the respondents that any change whatever was intended to be effected in their position by these papers, and it seems to me that no such change could be effected by the hypothesis. These gentlemen, the one as tenant and the other as mortgagee, were entitled to a substantial interest in the property, and yet, without any consideration whatever of any kind, they are supposed to have voluntarily converted themselves into tenants-at-will, in the strict sense of the term, liable not only to have their rents raised from time to time, as the landlord might think fit, but to be turned out of possession whenever he pleased. It seems to me that the right of the parties in this case must be decided in just the same way as if these two papers had never been signed.

I have thus slightly indicated the reasons which induced me to think that the respondents have made out a case for relief of some kind in a Court of Equity; whether it should be of the kind given by the decree complained of, or in a different form, would, if it were material to consider it, be a very difficult question. But the opinion of the majority of your Lordships makes any consideration of that question unnecessary. Much as I regret that opinion, and the consequences which must flow from it, I am of course quite satisfied that it is much more likely to be right than any that I am able to form.

LORD WESTBURY.—It would hardly be possible for me at this late hour to state in detail to your Lordships the reasons why I feel myself compelled, though reluctantly, to concur in the opinion which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. But it is unnecessary that I should add anything to the clear, and, to my mind, satisfactory statement of reasons which has been made by the noble and learned Lord. I shall, therefore, dispense with reading the opinion which I had prepared, inasmuch as the arguments which I should have submitted to your Lordships are substantially the same as those of my noble and learned friend, who has already expressed them in the clearest manner. I agree also in the opinion which he has expressed that this bill should be dismissed without costs. Unquestionably, I do not believe that the appellant desires that costs should be given, but whether that is so or not, I think your Lordships will act rightly in reversing the decree appealed from, and dismissing the bill without costs.

Decree reversed. Cause remitted to the Court of Chancery, with a declaration that the bill ought to have been dismissed.

Concise statement—Completion of defence—Postponement of hearing—Long Vacation.

DISCOVERY. B.—The Court will not prevent the postponement of the hearing of a cause till the plaintiff has answered the interrogatories filed with a concise statement by the defendant, merely on the ground that the postponement will prevent the hearing of the cause till after the Long Vacation.

This was an application to enlarge the time for a suit to come on for hearing on a motion for decree.

The bill was filed on the 19th of November, 1865. On the 15th of March the affidavits in support of the bill were filed, and on the 16th of June the defendant obtained leave to file a concise statement and interrogatories for the examination of the plaintiff. The cause was now set down for hearing, and this application was to have the hearing postponed until the plaintiff had answered the defendant's interrogatories. The motion was that this cause stand out of the paper till the plaintiff has filed a concise statement and interrogatories.

E. E. Kay for the motion.—The defendant has a right to have time allowed him for the completion of his defence.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Little, contra.—The Court will not allow a concise statement to be made so short a time before the Long Vacation. It is not required for defence. The object is to prevent a decree being made before the Long Vacation.

Jessel, Q.C., for other parties.—The old practice where a cross bill was filed seeking relief as well as discovery, was to bring up the cross bill to the same stage as the original bill. The original bill was never delayed for the sake of the cross bill.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—This case shows completely the satisfactory condition of the business of these courts at the present time. It is stated on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant has done all he can to delay this suit, and the utmost result is a delay of five months. I cannot go into the merits of this case. It may be that the answers the defendant requires are of great importance to his defence. If I were to decide against him I might be driving him to file another bill. This is much too strong a case to compel a defendant to waive his defence on the ground that it will prevent the case being heard before the Long Vacation. There will be no costs.

PIFFARD v. BEEBY.

14 W. R. 948.

Practice—Removal of next friend—Stranger—Connection with non-accounting defendant.

INFANT.—A suit was instituted to carry out articles for a settlement, the father being unable to perform his covenant, and his mother having made an abortive attempt to do so. The bill being by the infant children by their next friend, a near relative of the defendant, a motion was made to remove him and substitute the brother-in-law of the wife, on the ground of the present next friend's near connection with the defendant, that he was a stranger to the family, and that the defendant, being one of the trustees of the articles, had, in fact, filed the bill, and had omitted to enforce the articles.

Motion refused with costs.

Semble, the mere fact of a next friend being a stranger and a near connection of a defendant is no reason for his removal, unless such defendant be accountable.

This was a motion by Hamilton Hume, as next friend pro hac vice, that William Porter Knightly, the present next friend of the infant plaintiffs, might be discharged from his office, and for a reference to chambers in the usual way, in order that the moving party, or some other fit and proper person, might be appointed next friend in his stead. The bill was filed by the four infant children of Charles Piffard and Emily his wife, formerly Emily Hume, to determine their rights under a voluntary settlement made by their paternal grandmother, Elizabeth Piffard, under these circumstances:—On the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Piffard articles for a settlement were entered into whereby Mr. Piffard covenanted to settle 5,000*l.* on his wife and children in the usual way. These were dated 29th May, 1858, but inasmuch as the covenant entered into was rather in expectation of property which Mr. Piffard expected from his mother, than from any present ability of his own to settle such a sum, he effected an insurance upon his life and assigned it over to the trustees of the articles on the understanding that it should be re-assigned when the covenant was performed. Mr. and Mrs. Piffard were then resident in India, and his mother in England, and she, by the settlement in question, limited the 5,000*l.* to the children of Charles Piffard generally, without specifying them as the children of that particular marriage, and therefore this was inconsistent with the articles; but at the time this settlement was made the articles were cancelled, and the policy was allowed to drop. Four years elapsed, and, questions arising on the effect of the settlement, this suit was instituted, as it was alleged, by George Beeby, the surviving trustee of the settlement, William Porter Knightly, his near relative, being named next friend of the infants.

The case came on upon a former occasion upon exceptions to the answer, [1866] E. R. A. 283.

Cust, in support of the motion, contended that it was improper that a total stranger to the family, a solicitor, and a near connection of the defendant, who was, in fact, the originator of the suit, should be the next friend of the infants. The expense of the suit had also been very great. The Court had always considered these circumstances objectionable, and had removed a next friend on those grounds; moreover, here the same solicitor acted for Mr. Beeby and the next friend. The party proposed was the brother of the mother of the infants, and it was manifestly for their benefit that he should be next friend in consequence of that relationship, for the Court looked mainly at the interest of the infants. It was now asked that there should be the usual inquiry in chambers: Towsey v. Groves (11 W. R. 252); Sandford v. Sandford (11 W. R. 336).

Mr. Piffard, the father (a defendant) in person, said that the present motion was not his motion, but he supported it, and contended that the defendant Beeby had been guilty of an omission in his duty as trustee, in not, during the four years, raising the question as to the settlement; and in allowing the policy to drop, for which he might be liable; and that therefore his connection with the present next friend was so objectionable.

Baily, Q.C., and Renshaw, in opposition to the motion, were not called upon.

Bagshawe for Mr. Beeby.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Mr. Piffard suggested that Mr. Beeby was liable as well as himself, in consequence of his not taking some steps on behalf of the infants which he ought to have taken. If he failed to do anything for which he became personally responsible—which is a great assumption, and which I assume only for the purposes of this motion—who is first liable? The infants' right is to have the articles carried out, but their prior right is against Mr. Piffard. If Mr. Beeby ought to have compelled Mr. Piffard to perform his part, Mr. Beeby cannot be liable until the liability of Mr. Piffard is exhausted. This is not an attorney's suit, if it was, the Court would promptly interfere on the point whether there ought to be a suit at all, and if so to have a proper next friend. This is the case of an unfortunate miscarriage by reason of the ultimate limitation in the settlement being in favour of the children of any marriage. No doubt Mr. Beeby could have brought an action against Mr. Piffard under his covenant, but it would have been foolish, and in not doing so he acted wisely. He was perfectly justified, however, in getting some proper person as a next friend of the infants, the object being to compel the carrying out of the articles. Then comes this motion, the person proposed as a next friend having the apparent additional advantage that he is the maternal uncle of the infants. It is truly said that the same solicitor acts for the infants and Mr. Beeby, and is that right? Not if there were a question between the infants and Mr. Beeby, or if he were personally liable; but, except upon the suggestion made, I do not see how he is liable. If he be, he clearly should be exonerated by Mr. Piffard; but he has received nothing, and therefore it is not the case of the same solicitor appearing for the infants and an accountable trustee. Moreover the person proposed is the brother-in-law of Mr. Piffard, between whom and the infants there is a question, and therefore, if the present next friend were removed, I should remove a person who has no interest, and substitute one who has an interest, and who, it is not too much to assume, would employ the same solicitor as Mr. Piffard, and pull with him; to whom, therefore there would be the very objection now made to the present next friend. Mr. Piffard may feel sure of this: that, whatever the Court's obligations may be in regarding the infants' rights, it will so exercise them as not unduly to press upon him. Assuming, therefore, to the utmost extent that the present next friend is the nominee of Mr. Beeby, there is no reason to suppose that he will work the suit, (although he is no relative) otherwise than properly. Under these circumstances the fact of the same solicitor being employed is no detriment to the infants; whereas, if I were to do what is asked, their interests might be neglected. I must refuse the application, with costs.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—On an application by tenant for life for payment to her of dividends on purchase-money of land taken by railway company, her affidavit as to title, &c., dispensed with.

Petition by a widow, tenant for life under her husband's will, to have the purchase-money paid into court by a railway company carried over to a separate account, and the dividends paid to her for life.

The executors and remaindermen were co-petitioners.

The affidavit required by C. O. xxxiv. r. 3, had been made only by the executors, the remaindermen being infants, and the tenant for life very old and infirm.

Rendall, for the petitioners, cited Re Baroness Braye (9 Hare, App. 7) in which Turner, V.C., had considered that the order did not apply to applications by tenants for life for payment of the dividends only. He thought it right, however to call the attention of the Court to "Seton on Decrees," p. 1077, where the practice was stated to be the contrary.

Streeten, for the company:

KINDERSLEY, V.C. thought that he could dispense with the tenant for life's affidavit.

WRAGG v. MORLEY.

14 W. R. 949.

Will—Charge of debts on rents and profits—Costs.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—A charge of debts on rents and profits is a charge on the corpus. The costs of residuary legatees appearing on further consideration, but not parties to the suit, will not be allowed.

Daubney v. Leake, 14 W. R. 413, and Hubbard v. Latham, 14 W. R. 553, followed.

This was the further consideration of a suit for the execution of the trusts of the will of Edward Marriott. By his will the testator, after giving to his wife Elizabeth Marriott (now the plaintiff Elizabeth Wragg) his household goods and furniture, &c., gave all his real estate and all his personal estate not specifically bequeathed to the defendant William Morley and to William Fretwell, since deceased, upon trust to sell and receive his personal estate, and to stand possessed of the moneys to arise by such sales, and to be collected, got in, and received; and the will proceeded as follows:—"Upon trust thereout to pay the costs and expenses attending such sales, and collecting and getting in as aforesaid, and then to pay thereout my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, if the same shall be sufficient for the purpose; but if not sufficient, I direct that the deficiency be supplied from the rents and profits of my real estate; and, after the payments aforesaid, do and shall invest the residue of the said trust moneys, if any, in the names or name of my said trustees, in or upon Government or real securities, at interest, and do and shall pay to, or permit and suffer my wife to receive the income of the said trust moneys, and the rents and profits arising from my said real estate during her life for her separate use, independently of any husband with whom she may intermarry, and her receipts, whether covert or sole, to be sufficient discharges for the same; and upon the decease of my said wife, upon trust, that they, the said trustees or trustee, do and shall, as soon as conveniently may be, make sale, and absolutely dispose of my said real estate." The testator directed his trustees to stand possessed of the moneys to arise from such sale of his real estate, and of the rents and profits thereof until sold, and of the money so invested as aforesaid, and all the accumulations of interest thereof, upon certain trusts for the benefit of the children of his brother and sisters, and of his wife's brother, the defendant William Morley, and their children. The bill alleged that the defendant Herbert Morley, one of the children of the defendant William Morley, sufficiently represented the interests of all the children of testator's brother and three sisters, and of the defendant William Morley. A question arose on the construction of the testator's will, whether the debts ought to be paid out of the income, or out of the corpus of the real estate. There was also a question whether the costs of the children of one of testator's sisters, who appeared on the further consideration, but had not been made defendants to the bill, were to be allowed out of the trust estate.

Rolt, Q.C., and T. A. Roberts, for the plaintiff, contended that the debts were payable out of the corpus, referring to the cases collected in Jarm. on Wills, ii. 516, et seq. 2nd ed. They also urged that those persons interested under the will, who appeared now, but had not been made defendants to the bill, were not entitled to their costs. On this point they cited Stevenson v. Abington (11 W. R. 936); Daubney v. Leake (14 W. R. 413; 1 L. R. Eq. 496); Hubbard v. Latham (14 W. R. 553).

Cracknall for the defendant William Morley, the surviving executor and trustee.

W. M. James, Q.C., and Chapman Barber, for the defendant Herbert Morley, contended that the testator intended the debts to be paid out of the annual rents and profits.

C. O. Boys, for the defendant Charles Wragg, the plaintiff's husband.

W. Pearson, for the children of one of the testator's sisters, who were not parties to the suit, also contended that rents and profits meant annual rents and profits: Heneage v. Lord Andover (3 Y. & J. 360); Harper v. Munday (7 D. M. G. 869); Forbes v. Richardson (11 Hare, 354), and that he ought to have his costs.

Rolt, Q.C., in reply upon the question of costs.—Where you have the accounting party a defendant, and the party to whom he is to account plaintiff, you need not go any further.

Wood, V.C., said that the rule laid down in Allan v. Backhouse (2 Ves. & B. 65), had been acquiesced in in a series of cases since that time. The principle there established was that where there was a sum to be raised at once, or one which the testator had not contemplated being raised by dribblets, and subject to that testator had given his real and personal estate to A. and B., then it was a charge upon the corpus. His Honour then referred to the case of Wilson v. Halliley (1 R. & My. 590), and said that, applying the principles of that case to the present, where there was a charge of debts which might require immediate payment, every word in that case justified him in saying that a sale or mortgage would be authorised in the present case. All that he found to militate against this view was the direction "after the payments aforesaid" to invest the residue and pay the income to the wife. But the testator had no intention that his wife should be deprived of the rents and profits simply because there was a charge. Why was the sale directed to be postponed to the death of the wife except that she might have the benefit of the rents and profits during her life? The case of Harper v. Munday (loc. cit.) showed how strong the rule must be. Then, as regarded the question of costs, the rule having been laid down by the Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellor Kindersley (in Daubney v. Leake and Hubbard v. Latham), he would not depart from it. It was a considerable departure from the old rule. The plaintiffs and the defendants to the record must alone have their costs.

Wood, V.C., July 4, 1866.

THE CLECKHEATON INDUSTRIAL SELF-HELP SOCIETY v.
JACKSON.

14 W. R. 950.

The Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), was repealed by the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63)—Reasonable notice—Sewer.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. D.—A notice is reasonable, within the meaning of section 45 of the Act, when it specifies the object of an entry on private premises to be the construction of a sewer of certain dimensions, and shows that the entry will be made at a particular point, and that the sewer will go from that point in an oblique direction. It is not necessary that this notice should be accompanied by a map.

This was a suit to restrain the Local Board of Health of Cleckheaton from entering on the plaintiff's premises, and constructing a certain sewer thereon. The Local Board, after sending a notice that, for the purpose of effectually draining the district by constructing a sewer of certain dimensions, they intended to penetrate at a certain part of the plaintiffs' premises, going in an oblique line, had sent workmen, who commenced digging a trench.

G. M. Giffard, Q.C., and Freeling, for the plaintiffs, contended that this motion was insufficient, as it did not specify how and where the board were going through plaintiffs' land, and was not accompanied by a map, and that it was therefore not a "reasonable notice" within the terms of section 45 of the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. That section only gives them compulsory powers over public property, not over private property: Reg. v. Local Board of Health of the Borough of Godmanchester (18 W. R. 155).

Rolt, Q.C., and Robinson, for the defendant, were not called upon.

Wood, V.C., said that the Act was one for the public benefit, and Parliament had assumed that its powers would not be abused. Section 45 imposed the duty of doing a great public work. As to that part of the evidence which said the board were not doing it properly, it was met by a long series of decisions showing that they were the best judges of that. If he held that section 45 gave no compulsory powers over private property, he should find the Act imposing a duty, and at the same time leaving power in any individual to stop the improvements. The Godmanchester case (loc. cit.) had nothing to do with section 45. It was never contemplated by the Public Health Act that local boards should be arrested in their improvements by individuals. As to the notice, the Act did not say that a map must be sent. If the Legislature had intended this it would have said so. He could not, therefore, hold that a map was necessary.

His Honour held the notice to be reasonable, and dismissed the bill with costs.

Joint-stock company—Winding-up—Appointment of official liquidator—Discretion of Court.

COMPANY. M.—An official liquidator having been appointed by one of the Courts below, the Court of appeal will not vary the appointment unless upon special grounds, the appointment being a matter of discretion.

An order having been, on the 28th May, 1866, made for the winding up of this company, the Master of the Rolls afterwards appointed Mr. Price the official liquidator. Two motions were now made to discharge the order. The one asked for the appointment of Mr. Chatteris, and the other for the appointment of Mr. Cooper.

Craig, Q.C., and Cottrell, for the first motion, on behalf of the directors, and some of the shareholders and creditors.

Daniel, Q.C., and Roxburgh, for the second motion, on behalf of a large creditor.

Their LORDSHIPS refused both motions with costs, saying that they would not, in a matter of discretion like this, interfere with the way in which the Master of the Rolls had exercised his discretion, unless upon special grounds, which were not shown in the present case.

ATWOOD v. ALFORD.

14 W. R. 956; L. R. 2 Eq. 479.

Will—Codicil—Substitutionary gift.

WILL.—A codicil contained the following words:—"Between my sisters then living, or the lawful issue of any or either of them then dead"—Held, that this was not a substitutionary gift.

John Lush Alford, by his will, gave to his mother real and personal property, and appointed the plaintiff and James Cobb (who pre-deceased him) executors of his will.

The said testator made a codicil to his will, dated the 2nd of August, 1849, in the following terms:—

"I hereby revoke the devise and bequest made by my said will to my mother, and I hereby devise and bequeath to my executors in my said will named, the real and personal estate by my said will devised to her, upon trust to sell and convert the whole thereof into money, and to invest the produce in Government securities, and by and out of the dividends or interest accruing therefrom, to allow yearly, for the maintenance of my sister Emily, the sum of 50*l.*, and for that of my mother the like sum of 50*l.* per annum; and upon trust to divide the residue of the dividends and interest, during their joint lives and, after the death of either of them, between my other sisters for their maintenance, and after the death of both, then to divide the principal between my sisters then living, or the lawful issue of any or either of them then dead, the issue taking per stirpes, and not per capita."

The testator had four sisters, one of whom died in his lifetime, leaving one child, Mary Ellen Hardy. The question was whether such child was entitled to take a share with the other sisters.

The bill was filed by the surviving executor.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Laurance, for the plaintiff.

Selwyn, Q.C., and Speed, for Eliza Alford, one of the sisters, contended that Mary Ellen Hardy could take no share under the will. Her mother had died, and in the lifetime of the testator. The gifts were substitutionary, and the class to take by substitution were to be ascertained at the death of the testator. They quoted Christopherson v. Naylor (1 Mer. 320); Thornhill v. Thornhill (4 Mad. 377); Ive v. King (16 Beav. 46); Congreve v. Palmer (1 W. R. 156; 16 Beav. 435).

Shapter, Q.C., and Bush, for the representative of another sister.

Southgate, Q.C., and Hemming, for Mary Ellen Hardy.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I think this is not a case of a substitutionary gift at all.

Winding up—Unregistered company—Company formed under a private Act of Parliament.

COMPANY. M.—A canal company formed under a private Act of Parliament may be the subject of a winding-up order under the Act of 1862.

This was a petition for winding-up the Basingstoke Canal.

The canal was opened in 1794, under a private Act of Parliament. The capital was 86,000*l.*, with power to raise 40,000*l.* by mortgage bonds. A subsequent Act was obtained, enlarging the capital. The canal was wholly unsuccessful. The ordinary capital never received any dividend, and the interest on the mortgage bonds was in arrear. The petition stated that the present income was insufficient to keep the canal in repair, and pay the working expenses. The petition was presented in pursuance of a resolution passed at a general meeting of the proprietors.

Wickens and Davey appeared on behalf of the petitioners.

The petition was unopposed.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—Is this a trading partnership, such as can be made the subject of a winding-up order?

Wickens.—Yes; this is a similar case to the Isle of Wight Trading Company, and the Ventnor Harbour Company, in both of which cases the winding-up order was made.

His LORDSHIP made the order prayed for.

Re THE LAND CREDIT COMPANY OF IRELAND; MUNSTER'S CASE.

14 W. R. 957; 14 L. T. 723.

Winding up—Contributory—Misrepresentation—Directors—Lapse of time.

COMPANY.—A mis-statement of the names of the directors of a company in the prospectus is an important misrepresentation.

A shareholder complaining of misrepresentation in the prospectus of a company must do so within a reasonable time after becoming aware of the misrepresentation.

This was an application on an adjourned summons from chambers to have Munster's name struck off the list of contributories, on the ground of misrepresentation in the prospectus of the company. The prospectus stated that all the directors of the company were shareholders, and gave the name of James Pim as one of the directors.

It was alleged that Munster was induced to take shares in the company from seeing Pim's name as a director, and that Pim was never qualified to be a director. When the company was formed a negotiation was commenced for the purchase by the company of an estate belonging to Pim, for which he was to be paid partly in cash and partly in shares of the company. This was the only interest Pim ever had in the company, and the negotiation was afterwards broken off. Munster continued to attend the meetings for six months after the negotiation was broken off.

The winding-up order was made on the 1st of July, 1865.

Jessel, Q.C., and E. E. Kay, for the applicant.—The list of directors is a very important part of the prospectus. Persons taking shares rely very strongly on the names they see on the list. Pim never had any qualification at all. He only had a possibility of a qualification, and this possibility subsequently came to nothing: Re The Life Association of England, Ex parte Blake (13 W. R. 468; 11 Jur. N.S. 459), The Brighton Brewery Company (10 S. J. 807).

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I have always held that the names of the directors are most important. But as far as I can see there is no ground for striking out Munster's name. Munster was present during the negotiations in 1864. Pim never attended previous to that time. If the contract had been carried out Pim would have become a director. Munster goes on attending six months after the agreement came to an end, and when, as he must have known, Pim's qualification ceased. In my opinion it is too late for him to raise the question of misrepresentation. He ought to have acted speedily. A misrepresentation does not bind a person who complains directly he finds it out, but he must complain directly. The case of the Marquis of Abercorn, in which the Lords Justices differed from me, was compromised by the plaintiff on payment of 30,000*l*. There is no ground for striking off the name of Munster.

Administration suit—Legatee—Creditor—Costs.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—In an administration suit by legatees, the fact of one of the legatees being a large creditor will not entitle him to costs as between solicitor and client.

Reason for the rule for taxation as between solicitor and client in a creditor's suit.

Earmarking a fund where there is a contingency.

This was an administration suit. W. E. Horne, by his will, charged all his estate with the payment of his debts, and subject thereto and to a specific bequest, devised all his estate to his wife for life, and after her death, on trusts for sale and division of the proceeds among his children. Some years before the testator's death his sister had sent him 250*l.*, with a letter stating that the money was to be for the benefit of his son Fallon Horne, if he should attain twenty-one, and if not, to be divided among the testator's other children. The letter also directed that the interest on the 250*l.* should be accumulated until the fund became payable. The testator mixed the 250*l.* with his own moneys, and on his death his assets were about 935*l.*, and debts about 2,440*l.* The bill was filed by the testator's three children (of whom Fallon Horne was one), all infants, by their next friend, against the testator's widow, praying for an administration of the estate. The usual administration order had been made, and the Chief Clerk had allowed Fallon Horne's claim as a creditor for 250*l.* and interest, amounting to upwards of 300*l.*

F. H. Colt, for the plaintiffs, now asked that, as Fallon Horne was so large a creditor, the suit, quoad him, might be treated as a creditor's suit, and his costs taxed as between solicitor and client: Seton on Decrees, 165. There was also a question as to how the fund representing the 250*l.* and interest should be dealt with, it being not yet certain who would be ultimately entitled.

O. S. Round for the defendant.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The reason for the rule for taxing costs as between solicitor and client in a creditor's suit is that a creditor, as a party suing for the benefit of others, is entitled to something more than an ordinary plaintiff. Fallon Horne sues here as a legatee, and not as a creditor, and therefore the rule does not apply to him. As regards the fund representing the 250*l.*, and interest, it is of importance that it should be earmarked; it had better therefore be carried over to an account entitled "The account of the person or persons entitled to the benefit of the debt or claim of Fallon Horne."

Election—Colonial heir.

ELECTION.—Where A. bequeathed and devised certain personal and real estate in England, and devised real estate in the island of St. Kitts, in the West Indies, to trustees in trust for his eldest son for life, with divers remainders over, the will being duly attested to pass the property in England, but not so as to pass real estate in the island of St. Kitts:—Held, that a case of election arose, and that the son had elected to take under the will.

Semble, that irrespective of the question of a voluntary election, the Court would have declared the heir bound to elect.

This was a bill filed on behalf of three infant children of Albemarle Dewar, against the eldest son and heir-at-law of the said Albemarle Dewar, and the trustees of the will of one David Albemarle Bertie Dewar, for the purpose of carrying into execution the trusts of the said testator's will. The question for the Court's decision was one of election, arising under the following circumstances:—

David Albemarle Bertie Dewar, at the time of his death was possessed of valuable freehold and personal property, including certain freehold estates in England, and also in the Island of St. Kitts, in the West Indies, and by his will dated 12th day of January, 1857, after giving a legacy of 3,000*l.*, and certain interests in other personal property, to his son Albemarle Dewar, devised all his real estate in Hampshire to his said son for life, (with certain restraints on alienation), remainder to his first and every other son in tail male, remainder to the first and every other of the said sons in tail general, remainder to the daughters of the said Albemarle Dewar in tail general. After giving the usual powers of jointuring, to create charges in favour of children, to lease, &c., the testator proceeded to give all the rest and residue of his real and personal estate, "including his property in the West Indies," to trustees to sell, and after payment of debts, to invest the produce thereof in the purchase of freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments in England or Wales, upon the same uses and trusts as his freehold hereditaments in Hampshire had been devised. The will was duly attested according to the law of England, but was not attested so as to pass real estate according to the law of St. Kitts, the law of that island still requiring wills affecting real estate to be witnessed by three witnesses. On the death of the testator, his son Albemarle Dewar duly entered into possession of the Hampshire estates, and received the rents and profits both of them and the West India estates during his life, treating himself, as the balance of evidence was held to shew, as tenant for life only. After the death of Albemarle Dewar in 1862, intestate and practically insolvent, the West India estates were sold by the trustees; but the purchaser declined to complete, insisting that, as the testator's will was not executed so as to pass the real property by the law of St. Kitts, Albemarle Dewar took the estates in that island as heir-at-law, and, on his death intestate, they devolved upon his eldest son, one of the present defendants. The plaintiffs then filed their bill, praying a declaration to the effect that the said Albemarle Dewar was bound to elect either to take the West India property under or against the will of the testator, that he had elected to take it under the will; and that, should the Court be of a different opinion, the estate of Albemarle Dewar, including the West India estates, might be made liable in compensation for the loss sustained by the plaintiffs through the said Albemarle Dewar not giving effect to the said devise of the West India estates.

Bacon, Q.C., and F. J. Wood, for the plaintiffs.

Greene, Q.C., and G. O. Morgan, for the defendant, cited Hearle v. Greenbank (3 Atk. 695), Boughton v. Boughton (2 Ves. sen. 12), Sheddon v. Goodrich (8 Ves. 481), Brodie v. Barry (2 Ves. & B. 127), Dillon v. Parker (1 Swans. 405), Gardiner v. Fell (1 Jac. & W. 22), Churchman v. Ireland (1 R. & My. 251).

F. O. Haynes, for the widow of Albemarle Dewar, who, in the event of his being held to have taken against the will, had a claim against the estate, called the attention of the Court to Padbury v. Clark (2 M. & G. 298), Thelluson v. Woodford (13 Ves. 209). He referred to the circumstance that in cases where a testator had attempted to dispose of some portion of his own property by an instrument ineffectual for that purpose, the principle of election did not apply to an heir of freehold estates in England. The cases had not gone further than to make a copyhold or customary and Scotch heir elect.

STUART, V.C.—You see an English heir was always a great favourite. I do not know that this is so with a colonial heir. The exceptional doctrine has not gone beyond an English heir. Can we take it to St. Kitts?

F. O. Haynes.—There is no reason why the doctrine should not extend to a colonial heir.

STUART, V.C.—In this case the heir enjoyed the property according to the terms of the testator's will. It is beyond a doubt that he recognised the devise of this West India estate as a valid devise, and enjoyed all the benefits under the will on that footing. It is said, however, that it must be shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that he knew that the will was an invalid will, and that, if he chose, he could have denied its operation, and enjoyed the estate as heir. There is no doubt that, before an heir can be put to his election, he is entitled to know everything that ascertains the value and situation of the property as to which he is to make his election. But, there is no authority for the doctrine that, where an heir has elected to confirm a devise of land which without such confirmation would be invalid, this Court ought not to hold that those claiming under him are bound. If property be enjoyed according to a certain mode of enjoyment, and with the recognition of certain rights, the Court will be very slow to disturb what has been settled by a long course of enjoyment. In this case the heir-at-law chose to enjoy the property devised by the testator on the footing of his will. The argument has turned on cases where the Court will compel an heir to elect, and in the course of the argument, the extraordinary doctrine of the Court, (too well established to be shaken now), that the heir-at-law is not to be put to his election by an unattested will or codicil, has been discussed. But although that doctrine prevails as to the English heir, it does not apply to copyhold or customary heirs, nor to Scotch heirs. Then on what ground am I to hold that the colonial heir is not to be put to his election where the colonial real estate is not validly devised, and there are benefits given to him on the footing that the property has been validly devised to him? I cannot see any distinction between a case of this kind and that of Brodie v. Barry, and that of a customary heir. My opinion, therefore, is that in this case, the Court is bound to declare that Albemarle Dewar must be held to have elected, and that the real estate in the colony must be bound by his act, and that his infant heir is not entitled to elect against the provisions of the will.

WOOD, V.C., June 29, July 2, 3, 1866.

HARRISON v. SYMONS.

14 W. R. 959.

Deed—Construction—"Issue."

DEED AND BOND. POWERS.—Where, in a deed, a power is given to appoint among "issue," followed by a limitation over in their favour, and then it is declared that the "children" shall take in equal shares, the word "children" does not cut down the strict technical meaning of the word "issue."

This was a suit for obtaining the decision of the Court on the construction of a power given to Margaret Dyne, by the settlement executed on her marriage with Peter Fry. The settlement was dated the 29th of August, 1826, and, after providing for the husband and wife and the children, declared the following trusts in case there should be no children of the marriage.

"Upon trust for all or any one or more of the brothers and sisters of her the said Margaret Dyne, who shall be then living, and the issue of any one or more of them as shall be then dead leaving issue, in such shares and proportions, and for such estates and interests, and with such powers, provisions, and limitations over, such limitations over being for the benefit of some or one of them as she, the said Margaret Dyne, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments, in writing, to be sealed and delivered by her in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, or by her last will and testament in writing, or any writing in the nature of or purporting to be her last will and testament, or any codicil or codicils thereto, to be executed and attested in manner aforesaid, shall, notwithstanding her coverture, and whether covert or sole, direct, limit, or appoint, give or devise the same. And in default of such direction, limitation and appointment, gift and devise, and in case any such shall be made, then subject thereto, and as to so much and such parts thereof, and such estates and interests to which the same shall not extend, upon trust for all the brothers and sisters who shall be then living of her, the said Margaret Dyne, and the issue of any of her brothers and sisters who shall be then dead, equally to be divided amongst them as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the issue of any deceased brother or sister to take only such share as such brother or sister would have taken in case he or she was then living, and the children of each deceased brother and sister, if more than one, to take in equal shares as tenants in common between themselves."

The power thus given was the one in question.

Margaret Fry exercised her power of appointment by her will, in which she appointed in favour of some of her grandnephews and grandnieces as well as in favour of some of her nephews and nieces; and the question now to be decided was whether the appointments to the grandnephews and nieces were or were not good, and whether the limitation over in default of appointment was or was not confined to issue of the first degree. The husband and wife are both dead, and there was never any issue of the marriage.

Prendergast, for the plaintiffs, the Rev. W. M. Harrison and Elizabeth his wife, the latter of whom was a niece of Margaret Fry, and one of the appointees under her will.—The word "children," used in the power, restricts "issue" to those of the first degree.

Daniel, Q.C., and Haddan, for two nieces and a nephew, all of whom were appointees, adopted the same view: Hampson v. Brandwood (1 Madd. 381).

C. O. Boys for a nephew and appointee.

Osborne, Q.C., and Surrage, for other defendants in the same interest, also contended that "issue" was cut down to "children": Swift v. Swift (8 Sim. 168).

Freeling, for the trustees of the settlement, and for a niece of Mrs. Fry, to whom she made no appointment, and her husband, cited Edwards v. Edwards (12 Beav. 97) (a case of a will).

A. E. Miller, for the widower of a niece who died in the lifetime of Margaret Fry, contended that "issue" was not confined to those of the first degree, and that, notwithstanding her death in Margaret Fry's lifetime, the nieces's issue were entitled.

B. B. Rogers for the child of a grandniece.

W. M. James, Q.C., and C. Hall, for grandnieces, who were also appointees, argued that there was nothing to shew that the word "issue" had been used otherwise than in its proper sense. The onus was on the other side to shew the contrary. The other side did not shew beyond all possible doubt that "issue" must be confined to "children."

G. M. Giffard, Q.C., and Willamson, for another grandniece and appointee.

Wood, V.C., said that the only case for restricting the word "issue" to children in a deed was that of Swift v. Swift (loc. cit.). There it was almost impossible to construe it otherwise; and the marriage articles were executory, which brought the case nearly to that of a will. This being a deed, he did not feel justified in cutting down the word "issue." The word "such" ran through the whole series of limitations. He thought that, on the whole, he was bound to hold that "issue" was not confined to children.

The decree would be—Declare that, according to the true construction of the appointment, and the limitation over in default of appointment, in respect to the brothers and sisters of Margaret Fry and their issue, the word "issue" comprehends all the descendants of the brothers and sisters of Margaret Fry who were alive at the date of the settlement and pre-deceased Margaret Fry; but that, as between the children of such deceased brothers and sisters and their descendants, their children take as tenants in common; and as to the rest, as joint tenants. Tax the costs of all parties as between solicitor and client; and declare that the appointed and unappointed shares must contribute rateably to such costs.

SANDERSON v. SANDERSON AND GIBSON.

14 W. R. 972.

Suit for dissolution—Examination of the petitioner—Discretion of Court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 43.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The Court will, under some circumstances, allow a petitioner in a suit for dissolution of marriage to be called to give evidence, under a discretion given by the 43rd section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, notwithstanding the Act which provides that neither of the parties in such a suit is allowed or compellable to give evidence.

This was a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery. The respondent and co-respondent traversed the charge, and the case came on for trial before the Court and a special jury.

Sir R. P. Collier, S.G., and Spinks, Dr., for the petitioner, put in letters in the co-respondent's handwriting, and addressed to the respondent, but there was no evidence that they were ever in her possession.

It having been suggested that the petitioner was the only person who could state how they came into his hands,

The JUDGE-ORDINARY said that he thought the 43rd section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, gave the Court power to examine the petitioner, and that he should wish to put him some questions relative to the letters.

Sir R. Phillimore, Q.A. (Woollett with him), objected to the petitioner's being examined unless the respondent was also called as to the same matter.

WILDE, J.O.—It is not in my power to examine the respondent. The 43rd section of the Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 85, enacts that "the Court may, if it shall think fit, order the attendance of the petitioner, and may examine him or her, or permit him or her to be cross-examined on oath on the hearing of any petition; but no such petitioner shall be bound to answer any question tending to shew that he or she has been guilty of adultery." There is a case of Tatham v. Tatham (8 Sw. & Tr. 511), in which the Court exercised the discretion given by this section of calling the petitioner. In ordinary cases it would be unfair to examine the petitioner when the respondent cannot be examined; but on so narrow a point as to where he got a number of letters, I do not think there would be anything unfair in calling him.

The attorney having intimated that the petitioner was absent in France, the case was allowed to proceed, without insisting on his examination.

WILDE, J.O., in charging the jury, told them that though these letters were evidence against the co-respondent, that in the absence of any evidence as to their coming into the respondent's possession they were no evidence of adultery as against her.

THE "SPRING."

14 W. R. 975; L. R. 1 A. & E. 99; 12 Jur. N.S. 788.

SHIPPING.—Collision—Two sailing vessels crossing—Exception to 12th Sailing Rule.

This action was brought by the owner of the late sloop Constantine and the cargo on board, and by her master and crew, against the oyster smack Spring, for the recovery of damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels. A cross action was brought by the owner of the Spring. The collision took place off the Eddystone on the 15th of March, 1866, at about 9 a.m. The case of the Constantine was that the wind was blowing in squalls from S.S.E., and the Constantine was steering N.N.E., with the mainsail close reefed, and the boom over her port quarter, and that the Spring was seen about a mile distant, bearing four points on her starboard bow, and steering W. by S.: that the Constantine kept her course, and when the Spring approached waved to the Spring to pass under her stern, but that, instead of doing so, the Spring, when within about two lengths of the Constantine, put her helm hard-a-port, and soon afterwards struck the Constantine. The case of the Spring was that the wind was blowing hard from S. to S. by E., that the Spring was steering W. by S. on the port tack, with the wind a little free, and was sailing at the rate of about four knots an hour, and that the Constantine was descried about three miles off bearing broad on the port bow; that the Constantine was steering to the northward, had the wind aft, and was to windward of the Spring; that the Spring was kept on her course in the expectation that the Constantine would get out of her way, but that the Constantine approached and caused immediate danger of collision, whereupon the helm of the Spring was put hard-a-port, but that a collision happened.

The witnesses on both sides were examined vivâ voce.

Milward, Q.C., and Cohen appeared for the Constantine, and argued that the case fell within the 12th article of the Sailing Rules, and that the Spring, having been on the port tack, ought to have kept clear of the Constantine.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the Spring, submitted that the case fell within the exceptions to the 12th article of the Sailing Rules, and that the Constantine had the wind aft, and was to windward of the Spring, and ought to have kept clear of the Spring.

LUSHINGTON, DR., after consultation with the Trinity Masters, gave judgment as follows:—We are of opinion that both vessels are to blame. I think it right, however, to state the grounds on which we have formed that opinion. I think the case of the Constantine falls under the last clause of article 12 of the Sailing Rules. That article runs as follows:—"When two sailing ships are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, then if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close-hauled, and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way; but if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the ship which is to windward shall keep out of the way of the ship which is to leeward."

I am of opinion, and the gentlemen of the Trinity House agree with me, that the case of the Constantine falls under that head, and that that vessel was to blame. With respect to the Spring, I think it falls under the 18th article. The text of that article is as follows:—"When, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications (afterwards mentioned) of avoiding immediate danger." Now it is perfectly clear, that the Spring did not keep her course, but ported her helm. In the answer it is pleaded, that there was "immediate danger," when she ported, but looking at the whole of the evidence, I cannot come to the conclusion that it was done in order to avoid "immediate danger," and therefore we are of opinion that both vessels are to blame.

Decree accordingly.

Re THE ST. KATHERINE'S DOCK COMPANY.

14 W. R. 978.

Practice—Dock company—Costs.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Lands were taken and the purchase-money paid into the Bank, under the St. Katherine's Dock Act, and subsequently the company was amalgamated with another, and the Amalgamation Act repealed the former Act, and incorporated with it the Lands Clauses Act; but there was a saving clause, providing that everything done, suffered, or confirmed before the passing of the Amalgamation Act, should be valid as if the repeal had not happened, and the amalgamated companies should be treated as one.

On a petition for re-investment in land of the money so paid in under the former Act:—Held, that the costs were payable by the company under such former Act.

This was a petition for the re-investment in land of 52,000*l.*, which had been paid into court under the provisions of the St. Katherine's Dock Act. 6 Geo. 4, c. 105, as representing the proceeds of certain charity lands belonging to the St. Katherine's Hospital, and taken by the St. Katherine's Dock Company under the above Act, and the only question was as to the costs. By the 57th section it was enacted, that where by reason of a disability or incapacity of any party or parties entitled to any houses, lands, tenements, or hereditaments to be purchased or taken under the authority of that Act, the purchase-money for the same should be required to be paid into the Bank of England, and to be applied in the purchase of other messuages, houses, buildings, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to be settled to the like uses in pursuance of that Act; it should be lawful for the said Court (of Exchequer, now of Chancery) to order the expenses of such last mentioned purchase, or so much of such expenses as the said Court should deem reasonable, together with the charges of obtaining such order, to be paid by the said company; and the said company should, from time to time, out of any moneys applicable to the purposes of that Act, pay such sum of money, for the purposes aforesaid, as the said Court should direct. By the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 178, the St. Katherine's Dock Company and London Dock Company were amalgamated, and, amongst other Acts, the 6 Geo. 4, c. 105 was thereby repealed, and the Land Clauses Act incorporated; but by the 12th section it was enacted that, notwithstanding the repeal of the said recited Acts, and, except only as was by that Act otherwise expressly provided, everything before the commencement of that Act done, suffered, or confirmed respectively and under or by those Acts, or any of them, should be valid as if the repeal of them had not happened, and the repeal thereof and the operation of that Act respectively should, accordingly be subject and without prejudice to anything and everything so done, suffered or confirmed respectively; and to all rights, liabilities, claims and demands both present and future, which, if the repeal had not happened, might be incident to, or consequent on any and everything so done, suffered, and confirmed respectively, with respect to all such things so done, suffered, or confirmed respectively; and all such rights, liabilities, claims and demands; and the amalgamated company should to all intents represent the London Dock Company and St. Katherine's Dock Company respectively, provided that the generality of expressions should not be restricted by any of the provisions of that Act. By the 16th section it was provided that, notwithstanding the repeal of those Acts, in every case in which, under any of those Acts, any money was, before the commencement of that Act, paid into the Bank of England, or to any trustee or trustees, as purchase or compensation money, or on any account, the money, or the stocks, funds, or securities in or upon which the same was from time to time, by order of the Court of Chancery or otherwise, invested, and the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof should, after the commencement of that Act, be applied and disposed of pursuant to the repealed Acts. The petition was entitled in the 6 Geo. 4, c. 105, and an order was made upon it for re-investment, and the costs ordered to be paid by the company in the terms of the repealed Act in which the petition was entitled. In settling the minutes of the order the Registrar considered that the matter should be mentioned again to the Court, as he doubted whether the costs should be paid according to the terms of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 105, or the Lands Clauses Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18.

Baily, Q.C., in support of the petition, contended that the Act to regulate the payment of costs was the Lands Clauses Act.

Speed, for the company, insisted that the question of costs in this case, where the money was paid in before the Amalgamation Act, was governed by the 6 Geo. 4, c. 105: Re Cherry's Settled Estates (10 W. R. 305).

KINDERSLEY, V.C., stated the facts. If the question stood merely on the incorporation of the Lands Clauses Act and the repeal of the former Act, the costs would either have not been payable at all, or, if payable, it would have been under the Lands Clauses Act; but in this Act the 12th and 16th sections appear to me to govern the matter. [His Honour read the sections.] There is no question about the meaning of that, that notwithstanding the Act incorporating the two companies, and notwithstanding the total repeal of the former special Act, where any money has been actually brought into court (the case here) under the prior Act, it shall be dealt with, notwithstanding the repeal, as if the Act had never been repealed, and under the provisions of that prior Act. Now, taking the last section (the 16th) in connection with the 12th, in which there is a repeal of the prior Act, the operation of the new Act is to be subject to everything previously done, which is thereby confirmed, but subject to and including the right to costs in accordance with the Act. It appears to me that sections 12 and 16 entirely prevent what is contended for by the petitioners, which is, that the Lands Clauses Act is to govern the costs; because the last Act prevents that by saying that whatever took place before its commencement shall be carried out under the old Act, and all rights and liabilities contained in it shall be dealt with under the old Act. It appears to me that the costs which the company are liable to pay are costs under the old Act. The case of Ex parte Cherry was cited as similar to this, and no doubt if it was I should follow it, and come to the same conclusion, but the grounds were very different. [His Honour referred to that case.] In that case the subsequent Act did not repeal the former one, but gave power to raise further moneys, which were to be dealt with as under the former Act, the companies having no power to deal with the money under the last Act in any other way than specially provided by the prior Act, and they would not therefore pay any costs, otherwise than under such prior Act. On that ground the Lords Justices thought that the preceding Act governed the question of costs. There the application was to have the money out of court and invest it, and they thought the Act did not apply to that—not so here, for it is for re-investment. It appears to me in the present case the effect of the two sections I have referred to is to throw back the matter, where the money was brought into court before the passing of the second Act, and direct that everything shall be done, and the rights and liabilities dealt with under the former Act.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., July 17, 24, 1866.

SURRIDGE v. CLARKSON.

14 W. R. 979.

Will—Construction—Issue—Survivor.

WILL.—A testator gave the interest of 3,000*l.* stock to his wife for life, and after her decease, the interest of 1,000*l.*, part of the 3,000*l.*, to his daughter E. for life, and then to her issue; and as to another 1,000*l.*, to his daughter M., and all her issue at twenty-one, with trusts for maintenance; and if she should not leave issue at her decease, or they should not attain twenty-one, to the issue of his daughters E. and S. equally, in the same terms as the former gift; and as to the remaining 1,000*l.*, to his daughter S., and her issue after her decease. He then directed a valuation of his farm stock, and gave the amount, thereof and all his personalty and estate whatsoever, to his sons J. and T. equally, and appointed his sons R., J., and T. residuary legatees, subject to payment of 10*l.* a-year to his wife out of the valuation.

By a codicil the testator gave to his daughter M. 1,000*l.* Consols for life, and after her decease to her issue; and in default of issue, to her two surviving sisters' issue at twenty-one. M. survived her two sisters, and was not married, and the testator left grandchildren and great-grandchildren:—Held, that M. took for life only, that the three sons of the testator, R., J., and T., all took the residue, and their issue, at M.'s death, took as purchasers as joint tenants; that is, such issue as were either alive at the testator's death, or came into esse before the death of M.

The questions in this case arose on the will of North Surridge, dated 3rd April, 1811, whereby he gave the interest and dividends of 3,000*l.* Irish 5*l.* per Cents. to his wife Martha for life, and after her decease he gave the interest and dividends of 1,000*l.*, part of the 3,000*l.* to his daughter, Elizabeth Fitch, for life, and then to her issue; and after the decease of his wife he gave the interest and dividends of 1,000*l.* Irish 5*l.* per Cents. to his daughter Martha Surridge for life, and then for all and every her issue, equally to be paid and transferred as and when they attained twenty-one, and the interest and dividends to be applied for their maintenance; but in case she should not leave issue at her decease, or such issue should not attain twenty-one, then unto all and every the issue of his daughters Elizabeth Fitch and Sarah Surridge equally, in the same way as in the prior gift: and upon and after the decease of his wife he gave and bequeathed the interest and dividends of the remaining 1,000*l.* of the 3,000*l.* to his daughter Sarah for life, and to her issue after her decease. And after directing a valuation of his corn and live stock, &c., which should be upon his farms at his decease, he gave and bequeathed the amount thereof, together with all his personal property and estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or quality soever (except household furniture, plate, linen, &c., which he gave to his wife for her life) to his sons John and Thomas Surridge equally, and he thereby made and appointed his sons, Robert, John, and Thomas, residuary legatees, subject, nevertheless, to the payment by each, out of the produce of such valuation and the residue as aforesaid, of the sum of 10*l.* a piece, clear of all taxes and deductions whatsoever, which he gave and bequeathed to his said wife for life; and he appointed his sons Robert and North Surridge executors. The testator made a codicil dated 23rd January, 1812, whereby he gave to his daughter Martha 1,000*l.* Consols for life, and after her decease to her issue, and in default of issue to her two surviving sisters' issue as they should arrive at the age of twenty-one years.

The testator died on the 19th February, 1812, the widow in March, 1827, having received the dividends and enjoyed the other bequests during her life. Robert died in 1849, leaving North Surridge surviving, and he died in January, 1860, and appointed the plaintiffs executors, who also, therefore, now represented the original testator. Martha, the daughter, lived till 31st July, 1861, and was never married, and survived both her sisters, Sarah and Elizabeth. Sarah married John Smith and had five children, and died in June, 1861. Three of these children attained twenty-one, and one of the daughters survived her mother and died under twenty-one, as did the remaining child, and both these two died unmarried. Elizabeth Fitch survived her husband and died in 1838, leaving five children, who all attained twenty-one. Of these one was in America, another died in 1836 intestate, two (daughters) were unmarried, and the other was married and had two children, both now infants. At the death of the testator the issue of Elizabeth Fitch living were four, at the death of Martha Surreidge, the daughter, fifteen. On the death of Martha Surreidge, the daughter, questions arose as to the construction of the will in the events that had happened, and chiefly what was the effect of her having survived both her sisters, with respect to the 1,000*l.* Consols given by the codicil, and whether Robert was included in the residuary bequest? Thomas Surreidge died in 1817 and John in 1828, both leaving issue. This bill was filed in February, 1863, praying the construction of the will.

Charles Browne, for the plaintiffs, the trustees who had filed the bill, stated the points for argument.

W. W. Mackeson, for the issue of Elizabeth Fitch and Sarah Surreidge.—As to the legacy in the will, the word issue must mean children and remoter issue living at the death of the testator, and who were born subsequently up to the death of Martha; and as to the legacy in the codicil the word issue in the gift (to the issue of Martha), and in the gift over, must mean the same class, and default of issue therefore must mean default of issue to take under the previous limitation, so that it was immaterial whether the word issue in the limitation meant issue living at the death of Martha, or any issue who might have been born between the death of the testator and the death of Martha, in either view the gift over would be good. He also argued that the word surviving might be construed "other," or, at all events, that as the gift was to the issue of the surviving children, the testator could not have intended a contingent gift, and that he must substantially have meant the issue of the two sisters to take at all events; and that the issue took as tenants in common, because of the words "as they should arrive at the age of twenty-one years": Towns v. Wentworth (6 W. R. 395; 11 Moo. P. C. 526); Ginger v. White, (Willes, 348); Kirkpatrick v. Kilpatrick (13 Ves. 476); Sheppard v. Lessingham (Ambl. 122); Re Wyndham's Trust (1 L. R. Eq. 290); Westwood v. Southec (2 Sim. N.S. 192); Re Wynch's Trust (3 W. R. 750; 6 D. M. G. 188); Knight v. Ellis (2 Bro. C. C. 570; 2 Jarm. on Wills, 234); Hand v. North (12 W. R. 229).

C. Ward, for Samuel Fitch the younger, and William Claydon and Jane his wife, took the same view.

Warner, for Hester Martin, the representative of Thomas Surreidge, argued that the gift over of the 1,000*l.* Consols mentioned in the codicil to the issue of Elizabeth Fitch and Sarah Surreidge never took effect, for (1) the word "surviving" could not be construed "other," there being only three sisters in all, nor could the word be struck out of the codicil altogether; and (2) the gift over on the death of Martha without issue was void for remoteness: Tudor's Lead. Cas. Conv. (Forth v. Chapman); Jee v. Audley (1 Cox, 324); Darley v. Martin (13 C. B. 683).

Crossley, for Robert and North Surreidge, the representatives of Robert Surreidge, supported the same view as Warner with regard to the construction of the codicil.

Robert's claim to share as one of the residuary legatees being conceded, this point was not argued.

July 24.—KINDERSLEY, V.C. (after stating the facts and referring to the will).—With respect to the gift to the sons it is clear that not mentioning Robert was a mere slip, and that appears clear by what follows as to the valuation of the 10*l.*, and therefore the testator must be taken to have committed a clerical inaccuracy in omitting the name of Robert, who is therefore entitled equally with his brothers. The codicil presents much more difficulty than the will, the testator evidently having been unwise enough to pen it himself, drawing inspiration from the will, but not knowing how to handle the subject. If I looked at this matter not judicially, no doubt the testator intended to do the same with the 1,000*l.* Consols as with the 5*l.* per Cents., but I must put a proper legal construction upon it. He intended to give Martha a life estate only, followed by a gift to her issue after her decease, and if we were to stop there, it appears to me, after the decision in Wynch's Trusts (suprà), founded on Knight v. Ellis (suprà), it is impossible to maintain that she took an absolute interest. If the gift had been to her and her issue, it would have been absolute; but the life estate being given, I feel myself constrained to hold that her issue took by purchase (whatever is meant by the word "issue") expectant on her decease. But she had none, and the question is, what is the effect of the following words—"and in default of issue to her two surviving sisters," &c. No doubt they import a general failure; and, according to the general effect of the words, if at any time she had no issue, the intention was to give the estate over; and that would be void as to personalty, because in personalty you cannot have an estate tail. But it appears to me that those words, following immediately, as they do, upon the gift to her issue, must be construed as meaning the same thing as issue did in the gift; that is, "in default of her having issue to whom I intend at her death to give it over, to her sisters," &c. This is a curious question, arising from the singular way in which the testator has used his vernacular tongue. There were only three sisters, and having provided for Martha and her issue, in the event of her not having issue, then to the issue of her sisters. It is said it is only to go to such of her sisters as shall survive her, and that if one had pre-deceased her and the other had survived, then it would have gone to the issue of the surviving sister, excluding the issue of the deceased one; but as both have left issue, it is suggested that it is undisposed of, because there was, in fact, no sister of Martha who survived her and therefore it cannot go to the issue of either. Then it is argued that "survivor" means "other"; but that seems to be precluded by this:—He gives it to her two surviving sisters, and therefore, if you substitute the word "other" for "surviving," it would refer to more than two; but the fact is, the testator assumed that the two sisters would survive her, and then gave it to the issue of them, who, in such a case, must necessarily survive Martha. The mode of expression does not make it contingent, and therefore the gift to the issue of the sisters is effective, although both of them died before Martha.

Then comes the question, What issue is meant? They take as purchasers, but limited to a particular class. In neither of the cases referred to was there the same difficulty. In Wynch's Trust it was wisely agreed not to raise that question; and in Knight v. Ellis Lord Thurlow had not the same difficulty, and therefore he expressed no opinion as to what issue took. I am bound to hold here that Martha took only a life estate, and that the issue of her sisters, on her death, took as purchasers, and I must let in as many as I can. There is a suggestion on the will that the word should be interpreted children. I cannot so limit it. All I can do is to give it to all the issue of the two daughters, either alive at the testator's death, or coming into esse before the death of Martha, the tenant for life, and, there being no words of severance, they must take as joint tenants. The Court is always reluctant to give to a class in which there are members of different generations who would take together, but I do not see how to escape from this result; for it may be that among the issue of the sisters, parents and children, and even grandchildren, may take together.

Special case — Settlement — Construction — Bonus — Dividends — Yearly proceeds.

SETTLEMENT.—On the marriage of H. and D., sixteen shares in the P. and O. Company were vested in trustees in trust to pay the interest, dividends, and yearly proceeds to D. (the wife) for her life, or such persons as she should direct, to her separate use; and there was a proviso that if any bonus should be declared in respect of the shares, that should be invested in augmentation of the settlement. The company being their own insurers, carried over 5l. per cent. on their floating stock to the insurance fund, and declared a dividend out of the surplus (if any) year by year among the shareholders, and carried forward small sums left out of such surplus to the following year, and so on de anno in annum:—Held, that these additional payments were not bonuses, and that the wife was entitled to them for her life.

This was a special case under Sir George Turner's Act to determine the question whether two sums of 12l. and 16l. respectively were bonuses in respect of sixteen 50l. shares in the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, within the meaning of the settlement made on the marriage of the Rev. Benjamin Samuel Hollis and Jane Duplex.

The instrument in question was dated 24th August, 1841, and made between George Duplex of the first part, Mr. Hollis of the second part, Jane Duplex of the third part, and Richard Bourne and James Hartly of the fourth part. It recited that George Duplex was entitled to sixteen shares upon which the full sum of 50l. had been paid, making 800l., and that he proposed to settle the same on Jane Duplex and her children in the names of the trustees, and had assigned the same to them. It was witnessed that the trustees should stand possessed of the shares, upon trust, during the joint lives of the said Jane Duplex and the said Benjamin Samuel Hollis, her then intended husband, to pay the interest, dividends, and yearly proceeds of all and singular the said shares, as the same should come in and be received into the proper hands of the said Jane Duplex, or unto such person or persons as the said Jane Duplex, notwithstanding her intended coverture, should from time to time, after the same should have actually become due, and not by way of anticipation, direct and appoint; and after the decease of either of them to the survivor during his or her life, and after the decease of the survivor upon certain trusts, in favour of the children, with limitations over upon which no question turned. Then followed this proviso—"Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the said parties hereto, that in case at any time or times any bonus shall be declared and paid in respect of the said shares hereby settled, or any of them, in addition to the ordinary interest or dividend paid or payable in respect thereof for the current year, every such bonus shall be laid out and invested by the trustees or trustee for the time being of the settlement hereby made in their or his names or name, in some or one of the public stocks or funds of Great Britain, or upon Government or real securities, at interest, in augmentation of the settlement hereby made." And there was a covenant by Mr. Hollis to settle after-acquired property, and there was a power to appoint new trustees, which was exercised in 1856. James Allan was now sole trustee.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company was established in 1840, by Royal charter, and by the deed of the company it was declared that there should be half-yearly meetings; and by the 128th clause, that in every year, commencing from the 1st of September, 1840, the board of directors should set apart out of the net profits made by the company during that year such a sum of money as should be considered necessary for forming a repair fund for machinery, vessels, &c., and other stock; and further, that the directors should set apart, out of the dividends and profits, such a sum of money, or security of any description, not exceeding one-fourth of such net profits after deducting any moneys so set apart for repairs, as in the discretion of the board of directors should for the time being be thought desirable, and invest it in the name of the company as a reserve fund for the general benefit of the company; and that from time to time it should be lawful for the board of directors to provide a guarantee fund; and to make a dividend, as in the discretion of the said board should be thought advisable (under the clause next in order), out of the net profits to be declared at the end of the half-year. Previously to, and up to the date of, the settlement aforesaid the company had paid 7l. per cent. on their shares, which was paid half-yearly until 1846. In that year, and in 1847 and 1848, the dividend was 8l. per cent.: 3½l. per cent. in one half-year, and 4½l. in the other half-year.

From 1848 to the present time the company had divided its net annual profits among the shareholders in sums composed of various items; one being called a dividend, another an additional payment, and another a payment out of the proprietors' underwriting account. The dividends varied in amount, and were sometimes called "the usual dividend," whereas the additional payments were called in the reports "bonus," "dividend," and "additional payment." It appeared that up to December, 1848, the company was in the habit of insuring at Lloyd's in the usual way, but that thenceforward they determined to insure their vessels themselves. For this purpose they, by resolution, charged the annual revenues with 5l. per cent. on the floating stock, before striking a balance of profit and loss, and that sum was carried to what was called "the proprietors' underwriting account."

The unused surplus of this account was annually divided among the shareholders under the name of the payment out of the proprietors' underwriting account, and the residue (if any) too small to be included in such payment was carried forward to the next year, and formed part of the fund available for "additional payments" in the next account. Up to 1864 the moneys paid to the trustees as "additional payments" and on the "underwriting account," were treated by all parties as income, and paid to Mrs. Hollis; but in that year the question was raised whether they were not within the proviso, and so capital. Therefore, in December, 1864, Mr. James Allan, having received 56l.; that is 28l. for dividend, 16l. additional payment, and 12l. on the underwriting account; only paid 28l. to Mrs. Hollis, retaining the other sums until the question was decided, and this special case was filed for that purpose. The questions were, first, whether the 16l. ought to be treated as income and paid to Jane Hollis for her separate use, or as capital, and invested under the trusts of the settlement; secondly, the same question as to the 12l.

Toller, Q.C. and Lindley, appeared for the plaintiff (the husband), and contended that the sums in question were capital or bonus, and ought to be invested: Ward v. Coombe (7 Sim. 634); Plumbe v. Nield (8 W. R. 337).¹

Baily, Q.C., and Bovill, for the defendant Mrs. Hollis, insisted that the 16l. and 12l. were in fact part of the annual proceeds of the shares, and had been and were paid de anno in annum, and were therefore income.

Toller, Q.C., in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., stated the facts and questions.—Some observation has been made on the language of the settlement, but it appears to me that the proviso was clearly intended for regulating the way in which the clause giving the life interest was to be carried out. Now it is to be observed that, although the discussion had reference to the general law with respect to bonuses, the real question is what is the construction of the settlement. That instrument uses the word "bonus," and I have to determine in what sense it is used. In order to determine any question, either generally or on this particular settlement, with respect to these payments, which were not made simply as dividends, it is necessary to look into the machinery of the company regulating their practice with respect to the mode of dealing with profits arising from the concern from year to year, in order to see what properly is bonus, that is, as the term is used in this deed. I need not say that the word "bonus" may be and often is used incorrectly and inappropriately; but I may consider that it does not depend on the mere term applied, but the nature of the matter under the general law as to what is a bonus. [His Honour referred to the company's regulations and practice.] The repairing fund, no doubt, was to provide for the wear and tear constantly going on of the stock, and the reserve fund was applicable for purchasing vessels and machinery, and for general purposes. It appears to me the effect of these clauses is that, after paying the expenses of repairs, and setting apart a reserve fund to be applied in any way for the benefit of the company, subject to this the profits are divided among the proprietors to such an amount as the board of directors shall from time to time think fit. [His Honour then referred to the insurance practice of the company.] It appeared that after dealing with the surplus of this fund as divisible among the shareholders, they could not get rid of the whole, but there was always a small amount left, and that was thrown into the aggregate of profits for the next current year, and all treated as profits; because, of course, such a sum could not be accurately or mathematically divided, but from year to year this surplus was brought in as part of the profits of the next half-year, and so toties quoties. Now the question is, having regard to the deed of settlement, whether sums so dealt with are to be considered dividend or bonus? Mr. Bailly justly said that all the income of the shares belonged to the tenant for life, and if there were no proviso the matter would be left to the general law with respect to the mode in which the things called bonuses are dealt with. I think I may say that in ordinary cases the general rule is that what is properly called bonus, which is so called in contra-distinction from what is called dividend or income, may be described as, without pretending to define it, whatever comes from a fund accumulated during several preceding years for any purpose, and ultimately found unnecessary for the ordinary payments, or grown so large as not to be capable of being dealt with in the usual way; if that be paid to the shareholders in addition to a dividend, I should say that was a bonus. On the other hand, if what is often called bonus, or which a company choose to call bonus, is nothing more than dividends of a current half-year, it is not bonus; and that view I acted upon in Plumber v. Nield (suprà); but that does not affect the decision of this case. Here it depends on the construction of a particular clause, a proviso in the settlement, which I must treat as as important as that which creates the tenancy for life. The purpose of the parties appears to be that, notwithstanding that Mrs. Hollis was to have the dividends for life, she was to take them subject to the proviso. What, then, on the fair interpretation of the words, is bonus, and what interest or dividend? for under one or other term these sums must come. When the settlement was made there was no experience of the proceedings of the company, so as to determine what was the ordinary interest or dividends of the current year, whether 3l., 4l., or 7l. per cent., therefore that cannot govern the interpretation. I think they meant this: "We do not know at present anything about dividends, but we do know that under the deed, after setting apart certain funds out of annual net profits, there is to be division among the shareholders"; therefore, as I conceive, they considered bonus to mean that which comes, not out of the current year, but from some fund which, being appropriated, has become so large that the directors could part with some portion of it irrespective of the income of the current year. And when the settlement speaks of interest and dividends, it contemplated the clause in the deed of the company by which, after providing for different funds, there was to be a division of the profits; and I cannot go upon anything except what they knew at the time, not upon any resolution or practice of the company since.

No doubt the company have power to carry the surplus over to the other funds; but unless they do so, it never became part of such funds, or of any funds which could supply a bonus, which is not from current profits, but from profits of one or more previous years. The word bonus means something good, though why it is in the masculine instead of the neuter I do not know; but a God-send, something unexpectedly good.

With respect therefore to the 12l. from the underwriting account, that never was, nor was intended to be, a permanent fund; it was a surplus which was thrown back to the profits as dividends. Calling this or the additional payments bonuses will not prevent their being mere profits of the current year; the 12l., therefore, is not bonus, not coming from any preceding year or years, but is part of the profits, separated by a process of machinery of account, and Mrs. Hollis is entitled to it as tenant for life.

As to the 16l., additional payment, that could be got at only by dissecting the aggregate mass treated as profits, and the fund consisting of what was not divided in the previous year, and was treated as part of the profits of the year. This surplus was always small in comparison with the millions dealt with in each year. It appears to me that I ought not to dissect that fund in order to say how much (if any) is bonus in distinction from interest. There is nothing illegal in throwing it in as part of the profits of the next year. It is a very convenient and reasonable practice, and not contrary to any resolution of the company. Mrs. Hollis is therefore entitled to this other sum of 16l.

Costs of all parties out of the fund.

RUSSELL v. HARFORD.

Specific performance—Conditions of sale.

WATER. VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—Where the owner in fee of two adjoining houses, let to A. and B. as yearly tenants, allowed A.'s house to have a water-pipe running into the well of B.'s house, and at a subsequent sale of the houses by auction each tenant purchased his own house, such privilege of water supply was:—Held, not to pass as against B. under an ordinary reservation in the conditions of sale of "rights of way and water and other easements."

Harford, the defendant, was seised in fee of certain houses at Clifton two of which, adjoining each other, he let for some years to Russell, the plaintiff, and one Mackrell, respectively, as yearly tenants. During Mackrell's tenancy the defendant, as landlord of both houses, allowed the house occupied by Mackrell to be supplied with water by means of a pipe communicating with a well in the yard of that occupied by the plaintiff. In October, 1865, both premises, together with others belonging to the defendant, were sold by auction in lots, the premises occupied by Mackrell being numbered as lot 5, and those occupied by the plaintiff as lots 4 and 6. The 10th clause of the conditions of sale was as follows:—

“ 10th. Each lot is believed and shall be taken to be correctly described as to quantity and otherwise, and is sold subject to the payments mentioned in the particular, and to all chief rents and other rents, rights of way, and water and other easements (if any), charged or subsisting thereon, none of which matters, nor any matter discoverable by mere inspection of the premises, shall annul any sale, or give rise to any right to compensation.”

Mackrell and the plaintiff both, by their respective solicitors, attended the sale. Lots 4 and 6 were put up together, before lot 5, and were knocked down to the plaintiff's solicitor. Mackrell's solicitor then, in the presence of the plaintiff's solicitor, stated to the auctioneer that lot 5 was supplied by a pipe with water from a well on lot 6, and inquired whether that supply would be continued. The auctioneer replied, in the words of the 10th condition of sale, that each lot was sold subject to all rights of way and water and other easements then existing. Lot 5 was then put up and knocked down to Mackrell's solicitor. Afterwards a memorandum of agreement printed on the back of the conditions of sale was signed by each solicitor for his principal. No objection to or requisition upon the title of the defendant to lots 4 and 6 was taken by the plaintiff, and a conveyance was tendered by his solicitor to the defendant's solicitor. The draft was subsequently returned to the plaintiff's solicitor with the addition of a clause covenanting a reservation to Mackrell, as owner of lot 5, of a right of water supply by a pipe communicating with the well on lot 6, and a right of entry for purposes of repair. This addition was resisted by the plaintiff; a correspondence took place; and the defendant threatened to proceed under the 12th condition of sale, which provided for forfeiture of the deposit and re-sale by the vendor, in case of non-completion by the purchaser. The plaintiff then filed his bill, praying specific performance of the agreement and restraint of any re-sale by the defendant.

Baily, Q.C. and Millar, for the plaintiff. Daniel v. Anderson (10 W. R. 366), shows your Honour's opinion that such a condition of sale does not apply to a case like the present: Suffield v. Brown (12 W. R. 356). The auctioneer merely referred to the conditions of sale, and the 10th condition relied on does not apply to a requirement like the present, but to “ easements,” which might prevent the vendor from giving a conveyance: Fewster v. Turner (6 Jur. 144).

Glasse, Q.C., and C. J. F. Cooke, for the defendant.—Daniel v. Anderson (ubi sup.) was a case between two purchasers. In Suffield v. Brown, the Lord Chancellor's judgment at p. 360, (citing Nichols v. Chamberlain, Cro. Jac. 121), supports our case. Fewster v. Turner, is disapproved of by Lord St. Leonards (Vend. & Pur. 13th ed. p. 20). Then the silence of the plaintiff's solicitor, when the defendant's solicitor questioned the auctioneer, entitled the latter to infer an acquiescence in the right: Freeman v. Cooke (2 Ex. 654); Cornish v. Abington (7 W. R. 504).

Baily, Q.C., in reply.—Any inference from “ silence ” is against the defendant, who never mentioned the “ easement.”

KINDERSLEY, V.C., said that the defendant, while landlord, had imposed an obligation on lot 6, and granted a privilege to lot 5; but this was simply a license, and not an easement or right of water; at any rate, any right there might be to this privilege determined with Mackrell's tenancy.

Then had anything occurred at the auction to bind the plaintiff to a continuance? The auctioneer, in reply to the question put to him by the defendant's solicitor, had quoted the tenth condition of sale, so that, assuming that the plaintiff's solicitor heard what passed, the matter came to this, that the agreement for the purchase of lots 4 and 6 was signed on the footing of the conditions of sale.

Then, what was the effect of the conditions of sale? The tenth condition, about which the main contention was, might apply to a part of the property as well as to the whole, but it was evident that that condition was never intended to apply to rights as between different lots. Now, independently of authority, what did the language of the condition import? Its import was—protection to the vendor against a discovery by the purchaser of any easement of which the vendor had been ignorant. If it was intended to mean that, as between different lots, one lot should be servient to another, that ought to have been stated. It was clear, therefore, that there was no easement which could be binding as between vendor and purchaser, and that the plaintiff had made his purchase without notice, or intention of notice, of any continuance of the previous privilege.

Then it had been said that, sale and purchase having taken place, the matter had turned out differently to what each party had anticipated, and that, if the plaintiff was not to be bound, neither should the defendant, the vendor. But this had not been the defendant's contention. He had been proposing to proceed under the twelfth condition.

A decree must be made in favour of the plaintiff, with costs, declaring that the defendant was not entitled to the benefit of such a covenant as he claimed.

COOPER v. THE LONDON CHATHAM AND DOVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 W. R. 985.

Practice—Specific performance—Motion, before answer, for payment of purchase-money or delivery of possession.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—Messrs. C. contracted with a railway company to sell land, with a stipulation that they should have possession and pay the purchase-money in two years, with interest. They took possession, but only paid one-third of the purchase-money, and a bill was filed for specific performance and payment of the purchase-money unpaid and interest. Before answer the plaintiffs moved for payment of the balance of the purchase-money into court, or delivery up of the land.

Order made for payment or delivery up within a month, and if the land should be delivered up, payment into court by the vendors of the one-third received by them in a fortnight after delivery up of possession.

This was a motion that the London Chatham and Dover Railway Company might either pay into court 21,000*l.*, or deliver up possession of certain land at Battersea-park, now forming part of a station used for engines, plant, &c., the subject of the suit, which sought specific performance of the contract to purchase the land. This contract was dated in 1862, the purchase-money (31,000*l.*) to be paid in two years, with interest, the company being allowed to take possession. The two years expired, and the company paid 10,000*l.*; and the 21,000*l.* and interest remaining due, this bill was filed, and this motion made before answer. The contract, by the 15th clause, provided that the lien of the plaintiffs on the said land, buildings, and hereditaments, for and in respect of the moneys under and by virtue of those presents contracted to be paid, and all interest thereof, and all rights and remedies incident to such lien should be in full force and effect, anything thereinbefore contained notwithstanding. The plaintiffs were trustees for sale, and had sold the land in question, being part of Long Hedge Farm estate, Battersea, to the defendants.

Glasse, Q.C., and Nalder appeared for the plaintiffs.

Baily, Q.C., and Kekewich for the company.

Cases referred to: Cosens v. The Bognor Railway Company (10 Sol. Jour. 884); Tindal v. Cobham (2 M. & K. 385); Younge v. Duncombe (1 Yonge, 275).

July 28.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Under ordinary circumstances the motion is almost a matter of course, but it was said that there are grounds in this case upon which the Court cannot make the order, namely, that the purchasers are in possession, and were let into possession for the purpose of using the land for their railway works, and that therefore it is unreasonable that they should be called upon to deliver up possession. No doubt the object of the contract was that the company should take possession and build, but it is expressly provided by the 15th clause of the contract that the vendor should retain the benefit of his lien for the purchase-money unpaid. Under these circumstances, the effect of the purchasers being let into possession to use the land does not prevent the vendors from coming here to make such a motion as this. There is another difficulty. It appears that, in another branch of the court, in a suit against the same company, a receiver and manager has been appointed, and the point was discussed whether an order on this motion might not clash with that order; but, on consideration, I think it does not. Here the purchasers (the company) have the option of paying the money or delivery of possession, and if the receiver prevents the delivery of possession, it is no fault of the vendors, and they are not to be affected by the circumstance that by reason of some general dealings the purchasers have made themselves liable to have a receiver put upon this property. The purchasers having paid 10,000*l.*, and 21,000*l.* remaining unpaid, the vendors have no more right to retain the land and possession of the money than the purchasers, and therefore the vendors, if the purchasers deliver up possession, must bring into court the amount they have received. Therefore the order must be that within one month after service of the notice, the company do either pay into court the 21,000*l.* or deliver up possession of the premises to the vendors; and in case the purchasers deliver up possession then there must be an order that within a fortnight after that time the vendors do bring into court the 10,000*l.* received. I can say nothing about interest.

It was then arranged that on payment within a fortnight of all interest and arrears of interest, the principal might be paid on or before the second seal in Michaelmas Term, 1866.

In re ROLLING STOCK COMPANY OF IRELAND (LIMITED) (COMPANIES ACT, 1862).

CLACK'S CASE.

14 W. R. 987.

COMPANY.—Where a holder of shares in a company transfers his shares to the nominee of another company, as part of a scheme for the amalgamation of the two companies, the second company having no power to buy shares, and the transfer is not registered, but the transferor's name remains on the register:—Held, that he must be placed on the list of contributories of the first company.

This was an application by the official liquidator of the above company, which is now in course of being wound-up to have the name of a Mr. Clack placed upon the list of contributories.

In June, 1863, the company made an attempt to amalgamate with the General Rolling Stock Company. The attempt was continued in that and the following years, but it was eventually found impossible to carry out the amalgamation scheme.

Part of the scheme was that the General Company should offer the members of the Irish company shares in the General Company or give them the value of their shares in money. Mr. Clack elected to receive the value of his shares in money, and executed a transfer of his fifty shares in the Irish company to Morris, the secretary of the General Company. This happened in August, 1864. In consequence of the desire to amalgamate no meeting of the directors of the Irish company had been held since June, 1863, and its business had been virtually in the hands of the General Company. The 16th section of the Irish company's Articles of Association provided that deeds of transfer should be left at the office of the company with the acceptance by the transferee, and such evidence of title as the directors might require, and that, thereupon, the directors should register the transfer. In the present case the transfer deed was taken to the office with the acceptance, but it was never registered in the official register, and Mr. Clack's name was never removed from the register of shareholders. A notice of the transfer was pasted into a book by the General Company. This book was stamped with the name of the Irish Company, although labelled in another part with that of the General Company.

Giffard, Q.C., and Lindley, for the official liquidator.—This transfer cannot stand. Morris was a mere nominee, or common vouchee of the General Company, and the purchase of shares was ultra vires the General Company. Mr. Clack, being on the official register, must be a contributory, unless he can show that the register ought to be rectified. If he attempts to show that, we must look at the whole transaction.

Wilcock, Q.C., and Graham Hastings, for Mr. Clack.—The sale to Morris was bonâ fide, and there was a complete transfer. We took the deed to the office with Morris's acceptance. The company required no evidence of title, because they knew all about it. Notice of the transfer was put into a book at their office; whether that is a proper book or not is immaterial. Mr. Clack and the transferee have done all that is necessary, and the directors are bound to register the transfer: Whittet's case (1 De G. & J. 577); Ward's case (2 L. R. Eq. 226); Emmerson's case (14 W. R. 785; 2 L. R. Eq. 231); Mayhew's case (2 W. R. 486; 5 D. M. G. 837); Scully's case (6 Ir. Chan. Rep. 524); Walton's case (26 L. J. Ch. 545).

Wood, V.C., said the whole question was whether this was a bonâ fide purchase and sale. It was not a purchase and sale at all. The company had attempted to amalgamate and then found they could not do so. Thereupon the General Company offered the choice of receiving shares in their company or having the money back. The deed of the General Company gave power to amalgamate or to purchase another company, not to purchase their shares. Mr. Clack says: "I prefer having back my money." There was clearly no idea of a sale, but it was this: "We want to retire, and the General Company has offered to return our money so as to get rid of unwilling shareholders." Morris was a mere nominee, and on a bill for specific performance the case of Mortlock v. Buller (10 Ves. 292), would arise immediately. This was a mere inchoate transaction, and illegal on the face of it. Mr. Clack's name must be on the list of contributories. He must pay no costs but would receive none.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 5, 26, 1866.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES v. CROSSMAN.

14 W. R. 996; 14 L. T. 856.

Practice—Venue—Information at the suit of the Attorney-General of Prince of Wales—Balance of convenience—Prerogative as to venue.

CROWN. PRACTICE.—An information was filed by the Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales to recover, in respect of the duchy of Cornwall, certain port dues, payable on goods imported into the outport of Torquay. The venue was laid in Middlesex.

The defendant moved to change the venue to Devon, on the grounds that the cause of action arose and the principal witnesses resided there, and that to try in Middlesex would increase the cost of the proceedings.

It was held, however, that, as of necessity the documents relating to the matters in issue could more easily be produced in Middlesex, from the office of the duchy, and as the Crown had the power to interfere and demand a trial at bar at Westminster, the balance of convenience was on the side of the trial in Middlesex, and a rule, obtained to change the venue to Devon, was accordingly discharged.

Semble, that in a suit in the nature of a transitory action, the Attorney-General for the Crown has a prerogative right to lay and retain the venue in any county he pleases.

Semble, that the Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales has the same prerogative in respect of the duchy of Cornwall.

This was an information at suit of the Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales. It contained the common money counts for money due in respect of certain customs and dues chargeable upon goods imported by the defendant into the outport of Torquay within the water of Dartmouth, parcel of the duchy of Cornwall, and for dues payable by the defendant for breaking bulk from certain ships arriving in the first outport.

The venue was laid in Middlesex.

Mr. White obtained a rule to change the venue from Middlesex to Devon upon an affidavit sworn by the defendant stating (1) that the cause of action, if any, arose in the county of Devon, and not in the county of Middlesex nor elsewhere out of the county of Devon.

2. That the defendant and all the witnesses as to facts resided at Torquay in the county of Devon, or within the immediate neighbourhood, and that it would add considerably to the expense if the action were tried out of the county of Devon.

No affidavit in answer to this was filed by the Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales, but there was an affidavit filed, sworn by the Attorney and Solicitor for the Duchy of Cornwall, which stated—

1. That the suit had been commenced by information at suit of the Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, for the recovery of certain dues and customs, part of the ancient revenues of the duchy, and that he believed the defendants were about to contest the same on the ground that these were not payable to his Royal Highness in right of his said duchy.

2. That he had instituted inquiries in the office of the Queen's Remembrancer, in order to ascertain if there were any precedents in the office for a change of venue at the instance of the defendant in a personal suit, commenced by information on the part of the Attorney-General for the time being of the Crown, or the Attorney-General for the time being of the Prince of Wales and

Duke of Cornwall, suing in right of the duchy, but that he could not find any, and that it had always been the practice in these cases to lay the venue in personal suits by information in any county which the Attorney-General for the time being might select.

Karslake, Q.C., and Garth, showed cause.—In the first instance the question involved in this motion is whether the ordinary rules of the Court, with respect to changing the venue, apply to an information filed by the Attorney-General for the Prince of Wales. There are no direct authorities upon the point. In a purely personal information the Crown can lay the venue at pleasure in any county and keep it there: Attorney-General v. Smith (2 Price, 113). And the balance of convenience is in favour of extending this privilege to the Prince of Wales suing in right of his possessions as Duke of Cornwall. The immediate reversion of the duchy is vested in the Crown, which is therefore directly interested in all suits relating to it: Attorney-General v. Mayor of Plymouth (Wightwick, 134), Attorney-General v. Sir J. St. Aubyn (Wightwick, 167). And accordingly the Attorney-General for the Crown might intervene in this case and demand a trial at the bar of the Exchequer: Rowe v. Brenton (3 Man. & R. 133). [CHANNELL, B., referred to Attorney-General v. Hallett (15 M. & W. 97).] If pending this suit the duchy reverted to the Crown these prerogative proceedings could be continued without abatement: Attorney-General v. St. Aubyn (1 Wightwick, 247). It is therefore advisable, the interest of the Crown and Duke being thus identical, that the practice here should be assimilated to that of the Crown, and that one mode of practice should not prevail when the Prince of Wales is seised of the duchy, and another when the Crown is so seised. Besides, there is no precedent for this; the records have been searched, and no instance of a change of venue upon the motion of the defendant in a case like this can be found. There is, however, very little precedent to guide us for the periods during which Princes of Wales have been actually seised of the duchy are very short. That the Prince of Wales is not bound by the ordinary rules of procedure when suing in respect of his duchy, is shown by the fact that when he is intended to be bound by a statute, he is expressly named. [MARTIN, B.—The power of changing the venue is not given by statute, but depends on the equitable power of the Court.] Attorney-General v. Churchill (8 M. & W. 171) will be relied on, but there the information was quasi local. Tidd's Prac. vol. I. p. 650, was also referred to.

White and Channel in support of the rule.—When this duchy was granted to the Princes of Wales no special rules were laid down. Parliament simply ratified the charter of the King: Prince's case (8 Rep. 1). The origin and history of venue are well explained in Churchill's case (sup.), and it lies on the other side to establish a prerogative so as to exempt the Prince of Wales from the operation of the ordinary rules as to venue. The only argument brought forward is the argument ab inconvenientiâ; and there is no precedent. Analogous cases of privileged persons suing in Middlesex show that the question of change of venue is entirely in the discretion of the Court: Bisse v. Harcourt (Carth. 126), Earl of Shaftesbury v. Cradock (Ventr. 363), which was a case of scandalum magnatum. And if the Court have the power they will exercise it in favour of defendant, as no affidavit has been filed in answer to his; and the cause of action is one which is local in its nature, and ought to be tried in the county where the witnesses live. Standford v. Nedham (1 Lev. 56) was also referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26.—BRAMWELL, B.—In this case I wish to say one word as to my own opinion. It seems to me that the counsel for the Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales have made out that the rights of the Duchy are to be treated on the same footing as those of the Crown, but I doubt very much, when we come to see what the nature of the application is, and the answer to it here, whether any question of prerogative arises, because it seems to me that the application is made to us, and resisted on the ground of convenience, that is to say, the defendant says it would be more convenient to try at Exeter, and the Crown officers, although they assert their right simply and irrespective of convenience, also say it would be more convenient to try in London. As far as I can judge, the balance of convenience is not such as that if this were a case between subject and subject we should interfere with the right of plaintiff to lay his venue where he likes, and I do not think we ought to do so here. But for my own part I should be very sorry to lay down, without much consideration, that in any case at the pleasure of those who advise the Crown they may lay the venue in an inconvenient county, I am not at all prepared to assent to any such proposition. I do not at all dissent from anything that may be said by my brother Channell.

CHANNELL, B.—The Court is very anxious to deliver judgment in this case at these sittings, in order that the party who might wish to go to trial might have an opportunity of doing so either in Devonshire or Middlesex, and a judgment has been prepared, which I am about to read as the judgment of my Lord Chief Baron, my brother Martin, and myself. There has not been time to submit it to my brother Bramwell, to enable him to give all the considerations and reasons he would wish to give, but he has just stated that he does not differ from us in the result, and I think that when what he has just said comes to be considered it will not demonstrate any difference between the reasons on which he relies and those which will be found in the judgment of the rest of the Court.

It will be understood that the judgment which I am about to read is the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, my brother Martin and myself. This was an information filed by the Attorney-General for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, to recover certain port dues alleged to be due from the defendant, claimed by the duchy in respect of goods brought into, and landed at Torquay, which is alleged by the Attorney-General for the Prince to be a member of the port of Dartmouth (referred to in Hale's Treatise De Portibus Maris, p. 48, Hargrave edition). The venue in this information is laid in Middlesex. Application was made by the defendant to a judge at chambers to change the venue to the county of Devon. This application was supported by an affidavit which, if made in an ordinary action, between subject and subject, and not answered, would have been sufficient to entitle the defendant to have the venue changed, on the ground that the cause of action arose within the county of Devon, and that the question could be more conveniently tried there. It would still, however, have been open to the judge in such an action to have retained the venue in, or restored it to Middlesex, notwithstanding the cause of action arose in the county of Devon, upon being satisfied upon affidavit, that on the score of saving expense, or some manifest convenience, it was improper that the trial should take place in Middlesex. In the present case the judge at chambers, on certain objections having been made on behalf of the Attorney-General for the Prince, referred the application to the Court. Accordingly, in last term, Mr. Meadows White, on the part of the defendant, obtained a rule to change the venue to Devon; against this rule cause was shown in the first instance by Mr. Karslake and Mr. Garth on behalf of the Attorney-General. It was contended on the part of the Attorney-General that the Court had no power to change the venue in this case: that the Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, is, in cases affecting the right of the duchy, in the same position as the Attorney-General for the Crown, and that they both have the right, not only to lay the venue where they please, but to keep it there. It was further contended that the application of a defendant by the motion to change the venue arose upon the equity of the statutes of Richard II. and Henry V., and that these statutes did not bind the Crown, the Crown not being named therein. See the judgment of the Court delivered by Parke, B., in the case of the Attorney-General v. Lord Churchill (sup.), where, at p. 193, the origin of the practice of changing the venue in actions is explained by that learned judge. See also Tidd's Practice (9th ed.), p. 601, et seq. It was further contended that the statutes applied to actions only, and not to informations.

We are agreed that it is for the officers of the Crown to make out clearly their prerogative in any case where they claim to be on a different footing from the subject as regards procedure in any litigation. This was, in effect, laid down in the case before referred to, namely, The Attorney-General v. Lord Churchill (8 M. & W. 171).

We think that, although the Attorney-General for the Crown may not have a right in all cases, not only to lay but also to retain the venue when he pleases, in an information such as the present, which is a suit in the nature of a transitory action, he would have the right. It would not necessarily follow that the Attorney-General for the Prince of Wales would have the same right. The authorities cited to us, to show that he would, were The Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales v. the Mayor of Plymouth (1 Wightwick Exch. Rep. 134), The Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales v. Sir J. St. Aubyn (1 Wightwick Exch. Rep. 167); Rules on the Revenue Side of the Exchequer, June, 1860, rule 190, November, 1861, and November, 1863; the Crown Suits Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104). Rowe v. Brenton (3 Man. & R. 133) was also referred to. We think that in this case the Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales must be taken to be in the same situation as the Attorney-General to the Crown; but it does not seem to us absolutely necessary in the present case to decide whether, in the case of an information such as the present, if filed by the Crown, the Crown would have a right to lay and keep the venue where it pleased, nor whether, if as against the Crown, the venue could not be changed on motion, the Crown not being bound by the statutes and practice referred to, the same rule would apply to the Attorney-General to the Prince, for the case was argued before us on the ground of convenience as well as on the points we have noticed. The facts on which the argument as to convenience or inconvenience proceeded were not indeed stated on affidavit—at least, no affidavit has been filed, but were referred to by counsel on each side with the sanction of the other. For the defendant were urged upon us the inconvenience and expense of bringing up witnesses from Torquay to London to attend the trial. On the other hand, it is clear from the facts stated to us by the counsel for the Attorney-General, and not disputed by the defendant's counsel, that the question to be tried must depend to a considerable degree upon documents and records which would be produced by the officers of the duchy, no doubt more conveniently in Middlesex.

Nor was it disputed by the defendant's counsel that the Attorney-General might allege such an interest in the Crown as to entitle him to appear and claim a trial at bar. The inconvenience of bringing a Devonshire jury to Middlesex for trial at bar at Westminster would be great, and would go a long way to counterbalance the inconvenience of many of the witnesses residing at Torquay.

We think, then, that the Court ought not to interfere to change the venue, and that the rule should be discharged, and discharged without costs.

Rule discharged.

CHELMSFORD, L.C., July 21, 25, 1866.

HAYWARD v. KERSEY.

14 W. R. 999; 14 L. T. 879.

Equitable mortgage—Implied agreement to release equity of redemption—Lapse of time against an insolvent—Costs where fraud is charged.

MORTGAGE. WAIVER.—An equitable mortgagee, who has bought in the legal estate, is fifteen years in undisturbed possession of the rents and profits:—Held, that the lapse of time and presumed acquiescence are immaterial as against an insolvent, and that he has a right to redeem.

A general charge of fraud does not affect the rule as to payment of costs by a resisting mortgagee.

This was an appeal from Vice-Chancellor Stuart. The facts of the case are as follows:—

On the 20th of June, 1829, Lord Cottenham demised certain premises to Balls for ninety-nine years at 31*l.* per annum. Balls becoming embarrassed in circumstances, deposited the lease with Kersey, the defendant, for money advanced, but no assignment took place until the 5th of December, 1846. Balls then became bankrupt, and Kersey entered on the premises. On the 2nd October, 1835, Kersey agreed to assign the premises to Hayward, the plaintiff, for ninety-nine years, provided Hayward rendered them fit for habitation within three months; he did not do so, but the forfeiture was waived. In 1844 Hayward, the plaintiff, borrowed 60*l.* from one Goddard, and in July, by a memorandum, authorised Kersey to satisfy himself and Goddard out of the premises. On the 25th March, 1845, the plaintiff Hayward, with permission of the defendant, made an underlease of a portion of the premises to Hardy for 30*l.* per annum, and an underlease of the residue to Coles for 61*l.* per annum, making altogether 91*l.* per annum. On the 5th of December, 1846, the defendant Kersey purchased the legal estate from the assignees of Balls. Hayward subsequently fell into difficulties, and went to Whitecross Street Prison, and petitioned for a discharge, and Goddard was appointed trade assignee. In 1849 the defendant brought an ejectment against Hayward and Goddard to which Hayward alone pleaded. Atkinson, the solicitor for both Hayward and Goddard, came from Kersey's solicitors with a proposal that Goddard should accept 60*l.* and that the plea should be withdrawn, which was done, and judgment went by default. For fifteen years, from the 6th December, 1849, the defendant Kersey enjoyed undisturbed possession of the rents and profits of the premises. On the 14th of April, 1864, the plaintiff's debts were all paid, and a re-vesting order issued, and he was restored to his rights. On the 29th of June, 1864, the plaintiff filed a bill against Kersey to redeem; and Vice-Chancellor Stuart held that no release of the equity of redemption had been executed by either Hayward or Goddard, and his Honour relied on the 13th paragraph of the plaintiff's answer to show that the defendant was still equitable mortgagee, and against this decision the present appeal was brought.

Malins, Q.C., and Bristowe, for the appeal.—The plaintiff is barred by lapse of time and acquiescence: Burton v. Slattery (5 Bro. P. C. 233), Trulock v. Robey (12 Sim. 402), Heathcote v. Paignon (2 Bro. C. C. 175), Chalmers v. Bradley (1 Jac. & W. 63), Pickering v. Lord Stamford (2 Ves. jun. 280), Roberts v. Tunstall (4 Hare, 257), Harcourt v. White (8 W. R. 715; 28 Beav. 203). The plaintiff has charged fraud, and has not proved it. He therefore ought to pay the costs: New Brunswick and Canada Land Company v. Conybeare (10 W. R. 305; 9 H. L. Cas. 750).

Bacon, Q.C., and Angelo Lewis, contra.

Malins, Q.C., in reply.

LORD CHELMSFORD, C.—This is clearly a case between mortgagor and mortgagee. There are, therefore, two questions—First, is the mortgagor entitled to redeem; and, secondly, is he precluded from so doing by any agreement with the mortgagee. The plaintiff's interest in the premises arose in the following manner. [His Lordship stated the facts as above.] His Honour therefore admitted the right of the plaintiff to redeem, unless the circumstances connected with the ejectment were equivalent to an agreement to execute a release of the equity of redemption. Now where is the agreement with the defendant? The legal estate was in Kersey, and Goddard assisted Kersey in obtaining possession. Goddard appeared to have looked more closely to his own interest than to that of the creditors. The premises were worth 800*l.*, and there was a negotiation on foot for their sale at 1,200*l.*, while Goddard's debt was but 60*l.* What was the duty of Goddard? To dispose of the equity of redemption most advantageously for the creditors. It is quite clear that Goddard might have bound the plaintiff by releasing the equity of redemption, and if he had executed a release the plaintiff would have been bound, but as Goddard executed no release the insolvent is not bound. And what is the evidence of any agreement to execute a release? Mr. Hartland's affidavit declares that the circumstances relating to the ejectment were a perfectly bond fide arrangement that the premises would be delivered free of any charge on the part of Hayward or Goddard, and that it was his belief that there was no release nor agreement to release. Under these circumstances it appears that there was no release of the equity of redemption to bind the plaintiff, and if so, the lapse of time and the alleged acquiescence on the part of Hayward signify nothing. True, Goddard did not do his duty as assignee, but what was the acquiescence on the part of Hayward? Hayward had no power to enforce his rights; he was not a free agent; he was completely in the hands of his assignee. Hayward's mere forbearance is quite immaterial. Hayward's right, therefore, is not taken away. There was no release and no agreement to release, and consequently the plaintiff has a right to redeem. As to the costs, the general rule doubtless is they are to be paid by the mortgagor if his right to redeem be admitted, and by a mortgagee who unsuccessfully resists the claims of the mortgagor, unless there be fraud charged on the part of the mortgagor and not established. In the present case, however, the charge of fraud appears to me but a sort of general summing-up; there are no specific charges of fraud, and no difference ought to be made in this case on that account.

Vary so much of the Vice-Chancellor's decree as relates to costs, and declare Hayward entitled to redeem, and let the defendant pay the costs.

CAUSTON v. THE CITY OFFICES COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 999.

Demurrer—Bill to restrain action on lessee's covenant to repair.

C. was tenant of some premises under a lease which contained a covenant by the lessee to repair, and leave in repair. The reversion was vested in A. Before the expiration of the lease A. contracted to sell the reversion to O., the owner of some adjoining premises. O., before the expiration of C.'s lease, began rebuilding the adjoining premises, and in so doing, according to the allegations in the bill, seriously injured C.'s premises. After the lease expired, O. commenced an action in A.'s name against C. upon the covenant to repair. C. filed his bill against O. and A., alleging that the want of repair in the premises was caused by the works carried on by O. on the adjoining premises, but that he (C.) had no defence to the action, because it was commenced in A.'s name, and praying that O. might be restrained from prosecuting the action.

A demurrer for want of equity to this bill was overruled.

The plaintiff in this case was lessee of some premises in Nag's Head Court, Gracechurch Street, under a lease which expired 25th March, 1866. The reversion in fee was vested in two persons named Appleton. The lease contained a covenant to repair, and leave in repair, the premises. In the year 1865, the defendants, the company, entered into an agreement with the Appletons for the purchase of the reversion. They also purchased some adjoining property, and intended to erect large buildings on both properties. In November, 1865, they commenced their works on the adjoining property, and, according to the allegations in the bill, they, in the course of their works, seriously injured the plaintiff's premises, and also his stock-in-trade. The plaintiff demanded compensation, which was refused by the company, and ultimately the plaintiff commenced an action against the company for damages. subsequently, on the 28th March, 1866, the company commenced an action against the plaintiff, in the name of Appletons, for alleged breaches of the covenant to repair, and leave in repair. The bill alleged that the dilapidations in the premises were occasioned by the works carried on by the company upon the adjoining premises, and that the names of the Appletons being used in the action, because the legal estate in the premises was still vested in them, the plaintiff in this suit had no defence to the action at law.

The bill prayed an injunction to restrain the company from proceeding with the action, and to restrain the Appletons from allowing their names to be used, the plaintiff offering to pay such compensation as the Court might think fit in respect of any want of repair of the premises not caused by the company. To this bill the defendants demurred for want of equity. The demurrer was allowed by Vice-Chancellor Stuart, and from this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Malins, Q.C., and Dickinson, for the plaintiff.

Bacon, Q.C., and G. Druce, for the defendants, contended that this was a case of cross-actions, and that all the questions at issue between the parties could be settled at law.

Malins, Q.C., in reply.—The actions cannot be cross-actions as the parties to them are different.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that the bill alleged a wrong done by the defendants, and a title such that the merits of the case could not be raised in a court of law. There might be some circuitous mode of redress there, but if this Court saw a substantial ground for its interference it would interfere. Such a case was in truth admitted here, and with deference to the Vice-Chancellor, he thought that the demurrer must be overruled.

TURNER, L.J., said that he had some doubt, but he submitted his opinion to that of his learned brother. The Court would be able to do complete justice upon the merits of the case when they came before it.

THE CREWER AND WHEAL ABRAHAM UNITED MINING COMPANY (LIMITED) v. WILLYAMS.

14 W. R. 1003.

See, National Bank of Australasia v. United Hand-in-hand & Band of Hope Co., [1879] E. R. A.; 48 L. J. P.C. 50; 4 App. Cas. 391; 40 L. T. 697; 27 W. R. 889 (P.C.).

Mortgage by directors of a joint-stock company—Articles of association—Ultra vires.

COMPANY.—Where the articles of association of a company empowered the directors to raise any sum or sums of money by mortgage or charge upon all or any of the company's estate or effects, a mortgage made by the directors to secure past and future advances by a banker to the contractor of the company, was set aside at the instance of the company as ultra vires.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported 14 W. R. 444 [35 Beav. 353; 55 E. R. 932]) dismissing a bill filed by the company for the purpose of setting aside a mortgage made by the directors, in the name of the company, of all the property of the company, to secure to the defendants, who were bankers, moneys advanced, and to be advanced, by them to the contractor of the company, to enable him to carry out his contract with the company.

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the former report.

Jessel, Q.C., and Prendergast, for the appellants, the company.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Rowcliffe, for the defendants.

Jessel, Q.C., in reply.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that the bill seemed to have been dismissed under a misapprehension, and the dismissal could not stand.

TURNER, L.J., said that there must be a declaration that the mortgage was invalid so far as it made the property of the company a security for debts due by the contractor to the defendants. So far as it secured moneys due by the company, and so far as it was a mortgage by the contractor himself, it would not be interfered with by this declaration.

Will—Construction—Gift to children by implication.

WILL.—A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees, "the interest therefrom to be divided half-yearly between my four sons above named, and at the decease of either without lawful issue, such share to revert to the remainder then living, or their child or children":—Held, (reversing STUART, V.C.), that the sons took absolute interests, subject to be divested in the event of their dying without issue.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice-Chancellor Stuart (reported 14 W. R. 47) that the sons of the testator in the cause took only life interests in the residue of the estate, with remainder by implication to their respective children. The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the report of the hearing before his Honour.

Malins, Q.C., and Cracknall, for the appeal.

Bacon, Q.C., and Aitkin, contra.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J.—We have both made up our minds as to the true construction of this will. The four sons take absolute interests, subject to their being divested in the event of their dying without leaving issue. It is unnecessary, at the present stage, to go beyond that.

TURNER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The gift to the sons is a limited gift, but not expressly a gift for life. The expression is, “the interest to be divided between my four sons, and at the decease of either without lawful issue, such share to revert the remainder,” which seems to assume that the share of each was considered by the testator to be vested in the original person to whom he had given it. There is, therefore, in my opinion, an absolute gift to the sons; but this absolute gift is subject to this: that upon the death of either of them without issue, the share is to revert to the remainder then living, or their child or children. I do not know whether I am right as to this, but it appears to me, upon the true construction of the will, that the children are not to take any interest as against their parents. If the parents are out of the way, then the children are to take in the place of the parents; but so long as there are parents, their children are to take nothing. This agrees with the view that the sons take absolutely; but this absolute gift is not cut down in favour of the children, because they take nothing as against their parents. I do not know that we differ from the learned Vice-Chancellor as to the rule of construction applicable to this case, but he has drawn an inference in favour of the children from the fact of the gift over being to the surviving sons or their children; but as the gift over to the children of the other sons was not such as to interfere with the gift of the parents, except in the event of the parents being out of the way, no inference can be drawn in favour of the children of a son dying, leaving children, as against their parent. The case of Ex parte Rogers (2 Mad. 449), which has been so often commented upon, does not govern the present case. The mere fact of giving over property, in case of dying without issue, does not show an intention to give to children as against the parent. The testator might well suppose that the children would be sufficiently provided for from other sources, or that the parent would himself be able by means of the gift to provide for the children. The result is, that, in our opinion, each of the four sons take absolute interests, subject to their being divested in the event of any of them dying without issue, leaving it undetermined how the shares will devolve in that event.

JENNER v. MORRIS.

Discussed, Leathes v. Leathes, [1877] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. Ch. 562; 5 Ch. D. 221; 36 L. T. 646; 25 W. R. 492 (M.R.).

Title deeds—Delivery out of court to legal tenant for life.

DEED AND BOND.—Circumstances may be such as to disentitle a legal tenant for life (subject to terms) from having the title deeds of the property, of which he is so tenant, delivered out of court to him.

This suit was instituted by one of the persons entitled to a portion charged upon certain real estates, of which Sir J. A. Morris, one of the defendants, was legal tenant for life, for the purpose of having his portion and the other portions raised by mortgage. Sir J. A. Morris's life estate was subject to a term vested in trustees to raise the portions in question, there being also a prior term for other purposes. The title deeds were brought into court for the purposes of the suit, and the money having been raised by mortgage, Sir J. A. Morris applied before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley to have the deeds delivered out to him, on the ground that the suit was now at an end. The mortgagees resisted this application, and the Vice-Chancellor refused it. It appeared that on one occasion, before the deeds had been deposited, Sir J. A. Morris had taken a large number of them with him to Paris, and this was urged as a reason why they could not be safely handed over to him. Sir J. A. Morris now appealed from the Vice-Chancellor's order.

Baily, Q.C., and A. Smith, for the appeal.—Mortgagees of a term, even from an owner in fee, have no right to the deeds in the absence of special stipulation, and the case is still stronger when the mortgage is only made by trustees of a term. The legal tenant for life has a strict right to the deeds, the purposes of the suit, which in no way affected the inheritance, being at an end. They cited Harper v. Faulder (4 Mad. 129); Wiseman v. Westland (1 Y. & J. 117); Plunkett v. Lewis (6 Ha. 65).

W. W. Karslake, for the mortgagees, relied upon the conduct of Sir J. A. Morris as disentitling him to have the deeds placed in his custody, and also stated that the original contract with the mortgagees, which was settled by the Vice-Chancellor personally in chambers, provided that the mortgagee should have the deeds, although this arrangement was opposed by the solicitors of Sir J. A. Morris. He also contended that it is the practice of the Court to retain deeds in court when a stranger is interested in them, and cited Webb v. Webb (1 Dick. 298); Hicks v. Hicks (2 Dick. 650); Brigstocke v. Mansel (3 Mad. 47); Hotham v. Somerville (5 Beav. 360).

Baily, Q.C., in reply, contended that the mortgage deed contained no provision as to the title deeds.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that he could not, without the consent of the mortgagees, agree in ordering the deeds to be delivered to Sir J. A. Morris, after the way in which he had formerly dealt with them. He concurred in the view of the Vice-Chancellor.

TURNER, L.J., said that he should have thought that an order might have been made for delivery of the deeds to Sir J. A. Morris upon his giving security, to be approved by the judge in chambers, for their safe custody, and for their production to the mortgagees, and for their being brought back if, and when, required by the Court.

W. W. Karslake then, on behalf of the mortgagees, consented to an order in the terms suggested by Turner, L.J., and the order was accordingly so made.

EXECUTION.—An order will be made for the sale of lands of a railway company under an elegit as a debtor within the meaning of section 4 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112.

This was an application to have the property of the Bishops Waltham Railway Company sold to pay a judgment debt.

An action had been brought against the company to recover a debt of 2,389*l.* Judgment was obtained, and a writ of elegit issued, and was returned nulla bona.

The judgment debtor now applied for an order under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, s. 4, to have the property of the railway company sold for a payment of the debt.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—The petitioner is entitled to the same order as in the case of The Hull and Hornsea Railway Company. Even if the effect of the order is to put an end to a railway company which cannot pay its expenses, it will not be much to be regretted.

Copyholds—Disentailing deed—Enrolment—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74.

COPYHOLD.—An indorsement by the steward of the manor on a disentailing deed, that the same was produced before him at his residence, is not a sufficient enrolment within the statute.

On the 9th February, 1861, P. H. Clutterbuck, being legal tenant in tail of certain freehold hereditaments in Hertfordshire, and equitable tenant in tail of certain copyholds held of the manor of Croxley, in the same county, executed a disentailing deed of the property of both tenures. The deed was allowed to remain unenrolled until the last day of the six months within which the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74 requires such a deed to be enrolled in chancery, and on the court rolls of the manor.

On that day the steward of the manor was waited on at his private residence in London, and the parties, being unable to leave the deed with him, on account of losing the opportunity of enrolling it in chancery, procured his indorsement as follows:—"This deed was produced before me, at my residence, on the 9th of August, 1861, and was then withdrawn to be, as I was told, enrolled in chancery."

No actual entry was made on the court rolls.

The question now raised was whether the deed operated to bar the entail as to the copyholds therein comprised.

Bacon, Q.C., and Roberts, argued that the indorsement was sufficient.

Greene, Q.C., and Bristowe, for the tenant in tail, were not called upon.

Horton Smith for trustees.

STUART, V.C.—It is decided by authority that under the statute, unless the deed be enrolled within six months, it is void. This is the case here, and the distinction attempted to be made here is unavailing.

Declare that the copyhold property is not affected by the disentailing deed, but that it goes to customary heir. Costs must be costs in the cause.

Limited company—Overwhelming influence—Compulsory winding-up.

COMPANY. M.—Where investigation of the affairs of the company about to be voluntarily wound up seems proper, and there is an overwhelming influence on the part of a single shareholder, the Court will, on the petition of a shareholder having a substantial interest in the company, order a compulsory winding-up.

This was a shareholder's petition for the winding-up of the above company. The facts were substantially as follows:—

The company was incorporated in April, 1863, for the purpose of acquiring a certain tannery, and the stock-in-trade and goodwill thereof, extending the tannery if necessary, and carrying on the trade of tanning in all its branches. The ostensible vendor of the tannery was one W. A. Page; and the prospectus dwelt much on the favourable terms on which Page had consented to sell it, viz., the allotment to him of shares in the company to the extent of 6,000*l.*, and on the fact that he had consented to become the manager of the works.

Amongst the names of the first directors of the company was that of a Mr. Van Zeller. The petitioner, one Colonel Todd, knowing something of Van Zeller, and induced also by the terms of the prospectus, applied for and obtained 100 shares. Afterwards he obtained 1,200 more, and ultimately became one of the directors of the company.

The petition stated that the petitioner had recently discovered that Van Zeller, who now held 10,475 shares out of the total number subscribed for of 12,805, was, at the date of the incorporation of the company, and for two years before that date had been, the real owner of the tannery; that Page was his manager at a fixed salary; and that the shares nominally allotted to Page were in fact, and always had been, the property of Van Zeller. The petition also contained, amongst other charges against Van Zeller, a charge of having persuaded the board, while the petitioner was ignorant of the true state of affairs, to cancel a large number of the shares allotted to Page, on the ground that Van Zeller had accepted them as a security for a debt owing to him from Page, and that it was a very hard case that his security should turn out a risk and nothing more. The petitioner further stated that at a meeting of the company, held on 7th May, 1866, it was resolved that the company should be wound up voluntarily, and that one Derbyshire (stated to have been a joint-promoter with Van Zeller of the company) should be appointed sole liquidator. The petitioner objected to this resolution, which had not been confirmed by any subsequent meeting, and, under the circumstances, asked that the Court would order a compulsory winding-up.

Van Zeller, in his affidavit, denied that, at the date of the incorporation of the company, and for two years previously, he was owner of the tannery; he stated that Page was in fact the owner as lessee of the tannery, and the absolute owner of the goodwill; and that the shares allotted to Page were bona fide so allotted. On the other hand he stated that for two years previously to the incorporation of the company the business of the tannery was, in fact, carried on by Page at a yearly salary for his (Van Zeller's) benefit, and at his expense. He also said that his statement of Page's having handed him the shares as a security was true. His affidavit, after setting forth a list of shareholders whereby it appeared that out of 12,805 shares subscribed for, after deducting his own, the petitioner's, and 500 other shares held jointly by himself and the petitioner in trust for the company, only 480 shares remained, concluded with the statement that he and all the other shareholders except the petitioner objected to a compulsory winding-up.

Cottrell for the petitioner.

Dickinson (Rolt, Q.C., with him) for Van Zeller and others.

Wood, V.C., said that it could not be contended that the matters stated in the petition, and attempted to be explained by Van Zeller's affidavit required no investigation, or that Mr. Van Zeller had not an overwhelming influence in the company. The petitioner had a very substantial interest in the company; but even if all the other shareholders except Mr. Van Zeller were with him he could not stand against Mr. Van Zeller's wishes. He thought it right therefore that the usual order for a compulsory winding-up should be made.

Winding-up—Alleged director—Contributory in respect of qualification shares—Costs.

COMPANY. M.—A. was invited to become a director of a company by a letter informing him what the qualification was. He said that he must first be satisfied on certain points, and went to the company's office to make inquiries. While there he attended a meeting of the board, and joined with a director in signing a cheque. He did not, however, sign the attendance-book, nor was his name entered in the minute-book. His inquiries proving unsatisfactory, he determined not to join the company. Shortly after his attendance at the meeting he received a letter of allotment of the qualification shares from the secretary, and his name was registered as a shareholder. Immediately on his receipt of the letter of allotment he returned it to the secretary, at the same time stating that he could not become a director. The secretary in reply said that his "resignation" had been accepted by the directors. He was never told that his name was on the register. Subsequently his name appeared, without protest, in the printed prospectus as that of a director.

On his application, during the winding up of the company, his name was struck off the register, but no costs were allowed to him.

This was an adjourned summons. The summons had been taken out by a Mr. Austin for the removal of his name from the list of contributories of the above-named company. The company was now in course of being wound-up, and the application was opposed by the official liquidator.

The necessary facts were as follows:—

On the 23rd July, 1864, soon after the establishment of the company, Sir Edwin Pearson, one of the first directors, wrote a letter to Mr. Austin, of which the following is the material part:—

“I have been very anxious to see you about the new Southern Bank, of which I spoke to you some time back, being desirous to obtain a seat for you on the board. I have done so if you would like to accept it. The qualification is nominal—ten shares only, on which it is proposed to call up only 10 per cent., which I have arranged shall be paid for you. If I hear nothing to the contrary from you by return of post I shall take it as an acceptance of the seat which I have much pleasure in offering to you.”

No written answer was returned to this letter, but shortly after its receipt Mr. Austin met Sir Edwin Pearson at Eastbourne, and had a conversation with him, in which he asked him whether a certain portion of the capital had been subscribed for by responsible persons. Pearson said that he was not sure whether such portion had been so subscribed for or not; and thereupon Austin said that before joining the company he must be satisfied on this point.

On the 12th September, 1864, Austin went to the offices of the company for the purpose, as he said, of examining into the point on which he required satisfaction. The result of his inquiries was unsatisfactory; but, notwithstanding this, while at the office, he attended a meeting of the board, and joined with a director in signing a cheque for 500*l.* He did not, however, enter his name in “the attendance book,” nor was his name inserted in “the minute book.” Nor did he then, or at any time afterwards, do any other act as an officer or member of the company. His name, however, subsequently appeared, without protest, among the names of the directors in the printed prospectus.

On the 16th September, 1864, Austin received from the company's secretary a letter of allotment of the directors' qualification of ten shares. He at once returned the letter of allotment in a letter in which he stated that he was unable to become a director, as he was not satisfied with the result of the inquiries he had made. The secretary wrote a reply to the last-mentioned letter, in which he merely said that the directors had received his “resignation” with regret, but did not say anything about the qualification.

In the register of the company, under the date of 16th August, 1864, Austin's name appeared as a shareholder; but he was never informed that his name had been so registered.

Giffard, Q.C., and Dickinson, for the applicant, relied on Re National Assurance, &c., Association, Marquis of Abercorn's case (10 W. R. 451, 548). That case had decided that a man could not be made a director on merely equitable grounds. Here the allotment was perfectly gratuitous, and rejected as soon as made. Suppose the shares were now valuable, could the applicant insist on having them on the mere ground of his having once signed a cheque as a director? Clearly not.

Cottrell, for the official liquidator.—The applicant knew the qualification for a director, and must have known that he was on the register. He should therefore have seen that it was rectified.

WOOD, V.C., said that this was a difficult case, but, on the whole, he was of opinion that the applicant's name should be struck out of the register. Of course a man could not be bound by receiving a letter telling him that if he did not refuse an offer of a seat at the board by return of post he would be assumed to have accepted it, and would be registered for the qualification shares. Certainly the applicant had taken a strong step in signing the cheque; but, on the other hand, the moment he received the letter of allotment he returned it, and declined in effect to have anything to do with the company. The applicant treated the matter as perfectly open up to that time, and no doubt he had a right so to treat it. The secretary's letter did not, indeed, acknowledge the return of the shares, but only what he called "the resignation" of the directorship. The applicant, however, would naturally look upon the thing as a whole, and consider that the acceptance of his refusal to become a director involved the acceptance of his refusal to take the qualification. His name, therefore, would be struck off the register, but regard being had to the signing of the cheque, no costs would be allowed to him. The official liquidator's costs would come out of the estate.

PORCHER v. WILSON.

14 W. R. 1011.

Mortgaged estate devised—Pecuniary legatees and annuitants—Marshalling since Locke King's Act.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where the mortgage debts of a testator are primarily payable out of his personal estate, the devisees of a mortgaged estate are not entitled to have the mortgage debt satisfied out of the personal estate until the pecuniary and specific legatees and annuitants are satisfied; the pecuniary legatees and annuitants being entitled to have the assets marshalled, so that any payment in respect of the mortgage debt out of the personal estate would have to be recouped by the mortgaged estate.

This cause, which was an ordinary administration suit, came on now by way of further consideration.

Charles Porcher, the testator in the cause, by his will, dated October 12th, 1860, devised all his freeholds to the use of the plaintiff, his wife, for life, with remainder to such uses as she should appoint, and in default of appointment to the uses therein declared. He then devised his copyholds and leaseholds to uses corresponding as nearly as might be with the uses of the freeholds. He then bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies and a specific legacy of 14,930*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* Reduced 3 per Cent. Annuities. He then gave and bequeathed all money, securities for money, arrears of rent, goods, chattels, credits, and personal estate, of or to which he should at his death be possessed or entitled, or of which he should at his death have power to dispose by will, except chattels real included in the devise thereinbefore contained of real estate, and except what else he otherwise disposed of by that his will, or any codicil thereto, unto trustees upon trust to call in, sell, and convert into money such part thereof as should not consist of money, and by and out of the money to arise thereby, and by and out of the arrears of rent and ready money of which he should be possessed at his death, to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, legacies, and debts, including a certain annuity therein mentioned, and the several bond debts in the said will mentioned, and a premium due annually to an insurance office; and he directed that, subject to the trusts aforesaid, they should stand possessed of the moneys to arise from the getting in, &c., of his residuary personalty, upon trust to invest and pay the income to the plaintiff for life, and after her decease to hold the principal and income upon such trusts as the plaintiff should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of appointment, upon the trusts in the said will mentioned.

The testator died on the 4th April, 1863, possessed of considerable real and personal estate. On the realty there was a mortgage of 19,339*l.* 15*s.*, created by a deed dated November 5th, 1856. He was also indebted to other persons in various sums, and some of his debts other than the said mortgage were secured by bonds and covenants.

The bill submitted that the will contained a direction to pay as well all simple contract debts and the said debts secured by bonds and covenants, as also the said mortgage debt, out of the personal estate of the said testator; and that as to such mortgage debt the testator had declared his intention of exonerating his real estate from the payment thereof. The bill further alleged that the testator's personalty not specifically bequeathed was insufficient for the payment of those debts, and there was no fund left for the payment of the general legacies or the annuities bequeathed by the will.

By the decree in the cause, which was dated July 6th, 1864, it was declared that the mortgage debts of the testator were primarily payable out of his personal estate; but that declaration was to be without prejudice to any question as to marshalling assets as between the devisees of the real estate of the said testator and pecuniary and specific legatees respectively.

The question of marshalling now came before the Court.

Rolt, Q.C., and Kekewick, for the plaintiff.

Bristowe for the legatees of the stock.

Giffard, Q.C., and Martin Ware, for the trustees.

Druce for parties entitled in remainder.

WOOD, V.C., made the following declaration:—Declare that the devisees of the mortgaged estate are not entitled to have the mortgage satisfied out of the personal estate until the pecuniary and specific legatees and annuitants are satisfied; the pecuniary legatees and annuitants being entitled to have the assets marshalled, so that any payment in respect of the mortgage debt out of the personal estate would have to be recouped by the mortgage estate.

ATWOOL v. FERRIER.

14 W. R. 1014; 14 L. T. 728.

Practice—Exceptions to bill for scandal.

PRACTICE.—In a suit for the winding up of a partnership long ago terminated, the ground for relief being the possession of the assets by the defendant and his unwillingness to account, the bill contained statements of fraudulent misrepresentations alleged to have been made by the defendant for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to join the business.

Such statements were ordered to be expunged as scandalous.

These were exceptions to the bill for scandal.

The bill was filed April 9th, 1866, for the winding-up of a partnership between the plaintiff and defendant, and it grounded the title to relief solely on the possession by the defendant of some of the assets of the business, and on his refusal to account with the plaintiff. The prayer was in the ordinary form.

The partnership in question was stated by the bill to have existed from September, 1856, to December, 1857. The bill began by setting forth the circumstances under which the plaintiff was induced to join the defendant in a business, which the latter carried on under the style of "Ferrier & Morgan." The defendant was stated to have continually urged upon the plaintiff the advantage which would accrue to him from joining the defendant in his business, and to have represented that one branch of his business alone, at a moderate estimate, produced 2,000*l.* a-year profit, and that his partner Morgan might be willing to withdraw in the plaintiff's favour. Induced, according to the bill, by these representations, the plaintiff, in September, 1856, joined the defendant in his business, which then began to be carried on under the style of "Ferrier & Atwool." The bill further stated that in the autumn of 1857 the partnership concern became seriously embarrassed, and then proceeded with the following statement, which was the portion of the bill now excepted to:—"The plaintiff then discovered that the representations made to him by the defendant as to the value and profits of the business were not correct, and that the defendant, instead of making the large profits alleged, had only shortly before commenced business with a capital of 25*l.*, and that he was, at the commencement of the said partnership, without means and in pecuniary difficulties. He also discovered that the Mr. Morgan, referred to as a partner, was only a clerk of the defendant's at a small weekly salary."

The defendant had answered the bill, but had refused to answer the interrogatories founded on the above passage.

Rolt, Q.C., and Bird, for the defendant, supported the exceptions. The bill does not ask to be relieved from the partnership. If it had, there might have been some relevancy in the charges contained in the passage excepted to. But the plaintiff insists on the partnership, and claims the benefit of it. No relief is asked on other grounds. The passage excepted to is a slur on the defendant's character, in no way relevant to the issue or to the costs of the suit. They cited Ex parte Simpson (15 Ves. 476).

Willcock, Q.C., and Higgins, for the plaintiff.

Wood, V.C., said that he could have no doubt that there was what amounted to a serious charge of fraud in the passage excepted to. That charge was a little disguised by the way in which it was expressed, but there was ground enough to hold that the plaintiff, "willing to wound, but yet afraid to strike," had on this occasion struck sufficiently for the Court to interpose. The whole passage was utterly irrelevant to the issue, and to the costs of the suit. For the plaintiff had not been obliged to file his bill in order to get rid of an odious partnership. He had got rid of the partnership more than eight years before the bill was filed. The only reason for the suit was the alleged unwillingness of the defendant to account. That being so the exceptions would be allowed, and the obnoxious passages would be ordered to be expunged. The usual order as to the costs of the exceptions.

Application for release—Adjournment of examination sitting sine die—Practice.

The Court will not order the release of a bankrupt who is arrested after an adjournment sine die, although the creditors may have proved the debt in respect to which he afterwards obtains judgment.

The bankrupt, who was a boot and shoe manufacturer, filed a petition for adjudication against himself on the 14th day of November last, and he was on the same day adjudicated a bankrupt. On the 20th of February, 1866, a meeting for examination and discharge was held under the bankruptcy, but in consequence of the bankrupt's non-attendance either in person or by counsel he was adjourned sine die, and protection disallowed. At this sitting Mr. Collins proved his debt. After the adjournment sine die Collins proceeded at law for the recovery of the amount of his claim, and, having obtained judgment, arrested the bankrupt on the 2nd June for debt, 88*l.* 6*s.*, and costs, 8*l.* 6*s.* This was an application for the bankrupt's release from custody at the suit of Mr. Collins.

Denney, in support of the application, explained the cause of the bankrupt's absence upon the day fixed for him to pass his examination, and contended that the detaining creditor had adopted a very irregular course by first proving his debts in the bankruptcy, and afterwards causing a writ of ca. sa. to be issued upon a fresh judgment for the same debt.

R. Griffiths for the detaining creditor, contended that the 112th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act gave the Court power to order the release in those cases only where the bankrupt was in custody at the period of the adjudication, and that the section was not intended to apply to a case where the arrest took place after the date of the bankruptcy. He referred to Re Kimberley (13 W. R. 565, 641).

HOLROYD, COMR.—If this had been the simple case of an arrest at the suit of a creditor who had proved his debt against the estate of the bankrupt I might have interfered, but the creditor seems here to have obtained judgment after an adjournment of the bankrupt sine die. The bankrupt having allowed the creditor to obtain judgment, notwithstanding the bankruptcy, I do not see how I can interpose. The application will be refused, but the bankrupt may have leave to apply to re-open the question of last examination.

SKILBECK v. HILTON.

14 W. R. 1017; L. R. 2 Eq. 587.

Dissolution of Partnership—Rights between partners—Concealment of dealings with assets—Laches.

DEED AND BOND.—A. and B., partners in trade, executed a deed to wind up the partnership, containing a mutual release. B. had, unknown to A., previously withdrawn a sum of money from the concern:—Held, that A.'s equity was not to have the money repaid, but to have the transaction set aside.

A. continued to act upon the deed for a year after he knew that B. had withdrawn the money:—Held, that he could not then have the transaction set aside.

This was a suit instituted to recover three sums of money with interest, drawn out on application by the defendant from the joint accounts of a partnership. Two of the sums, amounting to 575*l.*, were applied by the defendant to his own use, and the remaining sum of 180*l.* was paid to the defendant's nephew.

The plaintiff and defendant carried on business as cotton spinners at Manchester. The defendant undertook the management, and the plaintiff resided at Hull and supplied the money.

In October, 1864, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff to inform him that the concern was failing, and that the business could not be carried on any longer without great loss. The plaintiff thereupon instructed his solicitor with an accountant to go over and see the works and examine the accounts. The examination of the accounts turned out much more unfavourable than they had expected, and showed a balance due from the defendant.

The defendant offered to retire from the partnership on payment of 500*l.* This was refused by the plaintiff.

On the 28th of October, 1864, the solicitor of the plaintiff wrote to the defendant suggesting the alternative of the execution of a deed of dissolution of the partnership or a suit in equity, and ultimately, after some more discussion, on the 22nd of November, 1864, the plaintiff forwarded to the solicitors of the defendant the draft and engrossment of the deed of dissolution of the partnership. The effect of the deed was that Skilbeck should take upon himself the debts and obligations of the concern, and that the partners should mutually dissolve the partnership. It contained a release of actions, suits, claims, &c., and an assignment of the property.

In the beginning of December the mills, with the books and the like, were handed over to the plaintiff, when it appeared, from the entries therein contained, that the defendant, on the 28th of October, 1864, had drawn out for his own use 300*l.*; that on the 15th of November, 1864, he had drawn out for his own use the further sum of 275*l.*; and on the 21st of November, 1864, he had drawn out and paid to his nephew, F. C. Milton, a sum of 180*l.* These entries were made after the books had been examined by the plaintiff's solicitor and accountant, and it appeared by the evidence and the whole transaction that the plaintiff was wholly ignorant of the fact at the time when he sent the deed for execution.

Jessell, Q.C., and Smart, for the plaintiff, contended that it was not owing to any negligence on the part of plaintiff that the defendant had been able to abstract money from the partnership assets. By the partnership deed it was the duty of the defendant to see that the assets were properly applied.

Baggallay, Q.C., and Little, for the defendant, contended that the defendant had adopted the arrangement and could not, as the Scotch law expresses it, both approbate and reprobate the deed. He had acted under the deed after he had gained full knowledge of all the circumstances.

Jessell in reply.—This is a case of fraud, and the doctrine of laches and caveat emptor does not apply.

July 24.—LORD ROMILLY, M.R., after stating the facts above set out, continued.—On going through the evidence I do not find the slightest justification for the abstraction of these sums of money. It is simply 575*l.* taken out of the concern by the defendant and put in his own pocket to which he was not entitled, and 180*l.* paid to his nephew, who was as little entitled to it as he was to the 575*l.* The question is what were the rights of the plaintiff on the discovery of this fact in 1864? I think that the only equity he had was to annul the whole transaction. The agreement he entered into by mistake, in the belief that the books remained as they were when shewn to the accountant previously. There was not any communication of this fact made to the plaintiff, and though he might have inspected the books he never did so. But, at the same time, though the defendant knew of this when he accepted the proposal to execute the deed, he also knew what the state of the books was; he had taken the money openly, no concealment about it, only no proclamation of it, and he most probably acted on such knowledge, because, by the literal terms of the deed, he was secured in the possession of 575*l.* to himself, and 180*l.* to his nephew—i.e., 755*l.* in the whole. I am clearly of opinion that this would not bind the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff might immediately have recovered the whole amount notwithstanding the execution of the deed. But I do not think that he could compel the defendant to accept the conveyance (two of the terms of which in effect gave him, the defendant, 575*l.*, and his nephew 180*l.*) so altered as to make his conveyance stand without those two terms being in it; as if, in fact, the arrangement had been other than it was. The defendant abstracted the money openly. It appeared in the books. Any one might have inspected them on the plaintiff's behalf, and the defendant says he acted on the faith of the books being accepted, and the mutual release being executed in the state of the books as they stood. If the moneys had been in existence as part of the partnership assets,—as, for instance, in the shape of stock or bills—it is possible that the Court might have reached them in that character, as to which I abstain from giving any opinion: but in the way or form of an order to refund, it appears to me impossible. I could not direct that to be done without cancelling the whole arrangement, and causing an account to be taken on the footing of an ordinary dissolution of a partnership; that is, this Court cannot set aside the arrangement between the parties as to a portion of it, and uphold it as to the rest.

The next question then is, can I now upset the whole transaction? I would certainly have done so in December, 1864, and the plaintiff could not have been compelled to abide by an arrangement entered into by him in such a state of circumstances. But the plaintiff has by his acts precluded himself from obtaining that relief now. The taking of the money is admitted by the defendant, and no excuse offered, on the 8th December, 1864; and the bill of the plaintiff is filed in December, 1865, and it comes to be heard in July, 1866; but in the meantime the concern has been wound up. The plaintiff took possession of the mill in May, 1865, has sold the machinery, and all the matters connected with it—has put an end finally to the concern. If he had insisted on his not being bound by the transaction of November, 1864, he was bound to leave the matter exactly as it was, and then the concern would have been wound up by the Court with the concurrence of the defendant. It might have been sold as a going concern, the defendant would have had a voice in the sale of the machinery, and might have made it more profitable; but he neither did nor could interfere, for the plaintiff proceeded to act on the arrangement as if he were entitled under it to deal with the partnership property as he pleased, and yet, besides this, to make the defendant account for and repay the sums he had withdrawn, and to do so in strict violation of the clause for mutual release contained in the deed which constituted the arrangement.

The bill will be dismissed, but without costs.

STUART, V.C., July 16, 1866.

IMPERIAL GAS-LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY v. WEST LONDON JUNCTION GAS COMPANY (LIMITED) AND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.14 W. R. 1019; 15 L. T. 66: affirmed, [1887] E. R. A.; 56 L. J. Ch. 862 n.; 58 L. T. 900 (n). (L. JJ.).Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860—Construction.

GAS AND GASWORKS.—The effect of this Act is not to prevent companies who were not enumerated in it, and who were supplying gas to others than the public at the time of the passing of the Act, from continuing to do so.

Semble, railway companies, and hotels in connection with them, are not "the public" within the meaning of the 54th section.

The plaintiffs in this case were one of the gas companies enumerated in the Metropolitan Gas Act of 1860, to whom certain privileges were given by the Act, with reference to the supply of gas to the public within the metropolitan districts. The bill was filed to restrain the defendants, the West London Junction Gas Company, from supplying gas for sale to the Great Western Railway Company, or to any other company or person (more particularly the Great Western Hotel Company and the Bishop's Road station of the Metropolitan Railway Company), within the districts or limits in which the plaintiffs had an exclusive right to supply the public by the terms of the said Act. The circumstances of the case, and the provisions of the Act, under which the plaintiffs sought to restrain the defendants, were as follows:—In the year 1858 the Great Western Railway Company, who had previously been supplied with gas by the plaintiffs, entered into an agreement with a person of the name of Vaughan for the erection and management by him of private gas works, to be constructed on land belonging to the railway company, and to be used for supplying them with such gas as they might require at the Paddington station, including that which might be required for the Great Western Hotel, the site of which was leased to a company mainly composed of the railway company's directors and shareholders. Owing to Vaughan not having funds to carry out the agreement some further arrangements were made between the parties and a Mr. Vavas seur, and an indenture dated 7th February, 1860, was executed, by which the railway company agreed to advance money to enable Vaughan and Vavas seur to carry out the agreement of 1858. Meanwhile, and some months prior to the deed of 7th February, 1860, Vavas seur and other persons had agreed to form a joint-stock company for the purpose of purchasing Vaughan's and Vavas seur's interest in the contract with the Great Western Railway Company. This was done, and the West London Junction Gas Company so formed was duly registered on the 15th September, 1859, under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of 1856 and 1857. That company, with the exception of a short interval when the Great Western Railway Company entered into possession of their premises for non-performance of the contract with Vaughan & Vavas seur, continued to supply the railway company and the hotel company, to a larger or less extent, up to the date of the present proceedings.

From the opening of the Metropolitan Railway in 1863, the Great Western Railway Company supplied the Bishop's Road station and some of the carriages of that railway with gas made by the West London Junction Gas Company; the said station belonging to the Great Western Railway Company, subject only to certain rights and privileges of user thereof by the two companies in common.

In the year 1860, the Metropolitan Gas Act was passed, securing to the plaintiffs' and several other companies (amongst which the defendants, the West London Junction Gas Company, was not enumerated, certain privileges in reference to supplying the metropolis with gas, and regulating, as therein mentioned, the operations of the various companies referred to in it.

By section 6 it was enacted that the limits of each of the said companies should be the respective districts supplied with gas by such companies, as the same had been defined upon certain maps, approved by the authorities therein designated; provided that, at the expiration of every three years, certain alterations might be made in the boundaries of the said districts, upon the application and with the consent of the persons therein stated; and "that such last-mentioned map or maps should be binding upon all parties, and the provisions of this Act shall be held to apply to the several districts when so altered, and to the several companies affected thereby, as fully and effectually as if no alteration in such districts had been made. And no other company or person than the company to whom such limits are for the time being assigned, or shall hereafter be assigned, shall supply gas for sale within the said limits, unless authorized by Parliament so to do."

By the 54th section it was enacted that "nothing in this Act contained shall avoid prejudice or impair any of the powers now exercised by or vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, or in the Commissioners of Sewers of the city of London, and the liberties thereof; or any powers now vested in any local authority within the metropolis, or any powers now exercised or possessed in respect of the manufacture or supply of gas within the metropolis by any railway company, or by any other persons or person making or supplying gas for his or their own use, and not making or supplying gas to the public as a trade or business."

The plaintiffs now sought to restrain the defendants, as above stated, under the 6th section; and the defendants claimed to fall within the exceptions contained in the 54th section.

Bacon, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the plaintiffs.

Malins, Q.C., and W. P. Dickens, for the defendants the West London Gas Company, and, Osborne, Q.C., and Stevens, for the defendants the Great Western Railway Company, were not called upon.

STUART, V.C.—The case for the plaintiff totally fails. The question turns on the construction of an Act of Parliament, the purpose of which, as expressed in its recital, was to prevent any one of the companies who are named in the recital from encroaching on the districts allotted to another, and to prevent the too frequent opening of the public streets. But there is nothing in the recital as to the intention of the Legislature to interfere with the rights of the public to have gas from anybody who can supply it in the best and cheapest way. In the body of the Act the enactment goes greatly beyond the recital. The 6th section goes to restrain any person whatever from manufacturing or selling gas except the particular favoured companies whose names are recited in the Act. But the 54th section describes what the exceptions are and the language here is extremely plain. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the section.] Its purpose is not to interfere with any person who was engaged in manufacturing gas either for his own use or for the public, at the time when the Act was passed. Was the defendant so engaged at that time? The West London Gas Company did not supply the public, but the Great Western Railway Company and the Metropolitan Railway, which was so far a branch of it, and the Great Western Hotel Company, of which the Great Western Railway Company are landlords. Do these constitute the public? Certainly not. It is impossible to say that they do, and the case seems to me to come very clearly within the exceptions so properly described. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

ROMILLY, M.R., July 6, 7, 1865.

BRANDON v. BARLOW.

13 L. T. 6.

Marriage-settlement—Destruction of by husband—Bill to re-establish—Evidence.

EVIDENCE.—In 1860 a husband, through the intervention of his wife, obtained possession of their marriage-settlement from their trustee. The husband then, in order to raise money upon the property comprised in it, destroyed the settlement, mortgaged part of the settled property, and was proceeding to sell other parts of it. In April, 1864, the trustee filed a bill to restrain the intended sale, and prayed a declaration that the cancelled settlement should be established, and the trusts of it carried into effect. The husband did not deny the fact of his having destroyed the settlement; but the plaintiff and the wife denied many of his allegations, especially those with respect both to the circumstances under which the settlement was obtained by her from the trustee, and the precise contents of it. No draft or other copy of the settlement was produced to the court; but there was the evidence of the trustee and the wife on the one side, and that of the husband and other persons who were not parties to the settlement, but who had subsequently read it, on the other. There was also the evidence of the solicitor who had prepared the settlement, and who had acted as solicitor to the husband in the mortgage transaction, and in the proposed sale of part of the settled property:—Held, that, upon a full consideration of all the evidence in the case, the plaintiff was now entitled to the relief he sought.

The object of this suit was, principally, to revive a marriage-settlement, which it was admitted on all sides had been executed as alleged in the bill, but which had been destroyed some years since. The case rested upon the evidence adduced in it, and the consideration whether it was sufficiently clear to entitle the plaintiff who was a trustee of the original settlement, to the relief which he sought.

The facts of the case were shortly these:

The bill stated that the defendants Mr. and Mrs. Barlow were married on the 25th Dec., 1856, and that previous to and in contemplation of that marriage, but on the same day, an indenture of settlement was executed by Mr. Barlow. That settlement was made between Mr. Barlow of the first part, Mrs. Barlow (the daughter of the plaintiff) of the second part, and the plaintiff of the third part, and Mr. Barlow thereby conveyed to the plaintiff and his heirs seven freehold messuages and a considerable piece of land adjoining thereto, in Market Street and Cannon Street, in Fenton, in Staffordshire, to hold the said premises unto the plaintiff and his heirs upon certain trusts for the benefit of the defendants Mr. and Mrs. Barlow successively, for their respective lives, and from and after the decease of the survivor of them, upon trust for the benefit of such issue, upon trust for the benefit of the children of Mr. Barlow by a previous marriage.

Soon after the marriage, differences arose between Mr. and Mrs. Barlow, and she returned to her father's house. While there, it appeared that he gave into her hands the settlement, till then in his custody. After she had received it, Mr. Barlow, wishing to borrow money upon the property comprised in it, obtained possession of it and destroyed it. He then mortgaged part of the settled property, and was proceeding to sell other parts of it. This suit was instituted to restrain the projected sale, and to re-establish the lost settlement and carry out the trusts of it.

The settlement was prepared by a Mr. George Lockett Robinson, a solicitor, and one of the defendants to this suit; but no draft or other copy of it was produced to the court.

Mr. Barlow, by his answer, denied that the settlement comprised the piece of land adjoining the seven houses; and stated that it contained, in addition to the trusts mentioned or referred to in the bill, a power for him to sell or mortgage the settled property with the consent of his wife. At the date of the settlement the property comprised therein was subject to a mortgage to the Longton and Fenton Benefit Building Society, No. 4; and notice of the settlement was given to the society by Mr. Robinson.

The differences between Mr. and Mrs. Barlow arose some time before 1860, and in that year she returned to the house of the plaintiff. Mr. Barlow, by his answer, also stated that in the summer of that year he and his wife, who then had no prospects of a family, were desirous of building additional houses on the lands comprised in the settlement, and accordingly, and with a view to raise thereout the necessary funds, "Mrs. Barlow obtained from her father the said indenture of settlement, her father being, as Mr. Barlow believed, acquainted with the reason why it was required from him, and Mrs. Barlow took it to the said George Lockett Robinson, who then requested to have a private interview with Mrs. Barlow. Mr. Robinson had that interview with her, and on her return from it she told Mr. Barlow that she was willing to give up her interest under the settlement and to consent to Mr. Barlow's selling or mortgaging the property, and he subsequently, with the knowledge of his wife, saw Mr. Robinson in the matter. Mr. Barlow then again showed him the settlement, and he, after looking at its contents, said it could be given up with the consent of Mrs. Barlow and destroyed. Mr. Barlow said he understood by the expression 'given up' that the settlement could be cancelled. He accordingly burnt the settlement, and thereupon, through the intervention of Mr. Robinson, borrowed, on the 29th June, 1860, from the Methodist New Connection Beneficent Society, a further sum of 500*l.* on mortgage of the property comprised in the settlement. Mrs. Barlow was not a party to that mortgage. Mr. Barlow also stated that when he told his wife of the fact of his having burnt, as he did burn, the settlement in a furnace belonging to the works of some gentleman, named Glover, she expressed no displeasure thereat, but just the contrary."

The plaintiff, by an affidavit filed in support of the bill, stated (inter alia) that after a great deal of persuasion on the part of his daughter, and in the hope of her obtaining better treatment from her husband, he delivered the settlement to her in order that Mr. Barlow might have it in his possession; but without any suspicion on the part of the plaintiff that the settlement would be destroyed, suppressed, or improperly disposed of. Mrs. Barlow, in an affidavit filed by her in support of the bill, confirmed the evidence of the plaintiff, adding that she never supposed her husband meant to destroy or suppress the deed, and that she said nothing to the plaintiff that could lead him to any suspicion of that kind. Mrs. Barlow further stated that she believed the settlement contained no such power of sale or mortgage as was alleged by her husband; that he never explained to her that if the settlement was given up—meaning thereby, in effect, cancelled—that he would be able to raise money on the property comprised in it; that she never expressed her willingness to give up, and never wished to give up, the settlement to him; that it was taken out of her box which was locked up, and the key kept by her in her own possession; that she never assented to the destruction of the settlement; and that she knew nothing afterwards of the mode adopted by her husband to raise the money.

Mr. Barlow, in an affidavit filed by him in support of his case, stated that, prior to the marriage, there was a meeting of the parties at the house of the plaintiff; that at that meeting a draft of the then intended settlement was read; that the power to sell or mortgage the property was after some discussion directed to be inserted by Mr. Robinson in the settlement, and the draft was left with the plaintiff. He also stated that the power was in the parchment copy of the settlement; and he admitted that he did take the settlement out of a box belonging to his wife, but that the box was unlocked at the time he did so. There was also the evidence of other parties, not parties to the settlement, who had read it, and spoke to the fact of its containing the power of sale or mortgage.

The defendant George Lockett Robinson, by his answer in the suit, relied mainly on the privilege of his position as solicitor to the parties to exonerate him from much of the information required from him; but in an affidavit filed by him he stated "that the settlement contained in default of children of Mr. Barlow's marriage with Miss Brandon a general power for Mr. Barlow to appoint the settled property as he pleased. The whole of that property belonged to Mr. Barlow; and the deponent's practice had always been in such cases (and he had no doubt he did so in this case) to leave the property, in default of issue of the marriage, at the sole disposal of the husband. Immediately before the date and execution of the mortgage to the Methodist New Connection Beneficent Society mentioned in the bill, the hereditaments and premises comprised in the said settlement were in mortgage to the Longton Fourth Benefit Building Society; and to James Glover, of Longton, common brewer, for sums together amounting to the sum of 252*l*. The whole of the 500*l*. advanced by the said Beneficent society was applied partly in payment to the said James Glover of the amount due to him on mortgage as aforesaid; and the remainder of such 500*l*. was used by the said George Barlow, as the deponent had been informed by him and believed to be true, in or towards erecting on vacant ground at Fenton six cottages. The said vacant ground was comprised in the said mortgage to the said Beneficent Society, and also comprised in or adjoined to the premises comprised in the said settlement. In or about the month of May, 1860, when the said George Barlow first applied to the deponent to obtain for him the first 500*l*., he proposed to give a mortgage of (with other hereditaments and premises) the premises included in the said settlement. The deponent thereupon reminded him of their being so included; whereupon he replied that the settlement was as nothing, as all parties had agreed to set it aside, and that the plaintiff had given up the said indenture to him. The defendant George Barlow and his said wife were then living together, she assisting in the receipt of his rents and the management of his property, and so far as the deponent knew, they lived together in mutual affection. The deponent then informed the said George Barlow that he could not consent to treat the said settlement as null or void, unless the deponent was perfectly satisfied of the willingness of his said wife to its being so treated. He then said that he was sure his said wife was willing, and that he would send her up to the deponent, that from a personal interview with her he might be satisfied. In a day or two afterwards he brought up to deponent's office the said settlement, and made an appointment with him for the said interview with his said wife. She accordingly alone, without the said George Barlow, attended at deponent's office, and he well remembered when at the corner of his own table in his own office she stood while he conversed with her on the subject. The said settlement then lay on his said table, but was not opened before her, and he showed it to her. He told her of her husband's application to him, and that he had informed deponent that all parties had agreed to disregard the settlement; but deponent said that he could not agree to go on with the business unless she assured him that she was willing. Being a perpetual commissioner deponent considered it due to the said Mary Barlow to examine her privately and apart from her husband, and by some of the questions usually put to married women by perpetual commissioners to test her freeness and willingness. From her answers, her intelligence, she being a woman of mature age and strong mind, and all the circumstances of the case, deponent believed, and had since believed, and now believed, that she knowingly, freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion on the part of the said George Barlow, consented to the said settlement being treated as null and void. She never afterwards inquired for or mentioned the settlement to him until after she had for the last time left her said husband and he had refused, as deponent was informed, to allow her a separate maintenance; although deponent had often seen her in the meantime. Shortly after the said private interview with the said Mary Barlow the said George Barlow called upon deponent, and took from his said office the said settlement. He afterwards told deponent that he had destroyed it as being useless. Believing, as deponent did, that he had power with his wife's concurrence to put an end to it, and believing, as deponent did, that she did concur in putting an end thereto, he treated it as practically revoked. The only reason, and object, and purpose as mentioned by the said George Barlow to deponent for the destruction of the said settlement was, that all parties had consented to its destruction.

Mr. Robinson also denied many of the allegations made by Mr. Barlow, his co-defendant, as to the circumstances connected with the mortgage transaction and the intended sale; but the nature and effect of that part of the evidence will, for the purpose of this report, sufficiently appear from the judgment of the M. R.

The bill prayed for an injunction to restrain the proposed sale, and then for (inter alia) a declaration that the defendants might be decreed to deliver up to the plaintiff all documents in their possession or power relating to the indenture of settlement, and manifesting the right and title of the plaintiff as trustee thereof; that the uses and trusts of the said indenture of settlement might be ascertained and declared and carried into execution by the court; and that the said indenture of settlement might be declared to have priority over the mortgage securities hereinbefore mentioned.

July 6.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I shall read the whole of the evidence in this case. My present impression of it may be stated in a few words; but, of course, that impression may be modified when I have read the evidence. I am of opinion that it is clearly and distinctly proved that there was a settlement; and, in fact, nobody can doubt that a settlement was made. I am also of opinion, at the present moment, that the settlement contained an estate for life in favour of George Barlow; an estate for life in favour of his intended wife; a limitation in favour of the children; and that, after that, it contained a general power to George Barlow to sell or mortgage the property, and if he did not do either of those acts, there was inserted a trust in favour of the children of the first marriage. Mr. Robinson, in his affidavit, expressly swears that that is what he believes was the power contained in the settlement. In the first paragraph of his affidavit he says: "The indenture of settlement referred to in the plaintiff's bill of complaint in this suit contained (as I verily believe) a general power, in default of children of his marriage with Mary Brandon, for the said George Barlow to appoint the settled property as he pleased." It was only in default of children. He also says that he was in the habit of putting that power into settlements; and there is no doubt he did so on the present occasion. If so, the case would, even there, be perfectly clear and consistent, and one in which it would be easy for me to declare that in my opinion that was what the settlement contained, together with all usual and proper and necessary clauses for carrying it into effect. But the evidence appears to me to strictly confirm that view. The evidence shows this: the husband got possession of the settlement. He intended to raise money upon it. Mr. George Lockett Robinson knew that, That gentleman assisted him in raising the money; he was his solicitor, and also the solicitor for the persons who lent the money upon it. Moreover, he knew the contents of the settlement. There were in existence, not only the settlement itself, but the original draft and copy of the settlement. They have all disappeared. The husband, it is admitted, burnt the settlement himself in a furnace of some works. He threw it in. But why should he have done that, unless the settlement fettered him? It is a necessary rule of law that every inference is to be taken most strongly against the person who conceals evidence, or who destroys the means of evidence. It is not necessary for me to refer to any case in support of that proposition, for it is well known to every one that the general rule of law whenever any person keeps back evidence is as I have stated it to be. I am of opinion, therefore, that there was a provision in this settlement which made it impossible for the husband, so long as the settlement existed, to dispose, during the life of the wife and the uncertainty of there being issue of the marriage, of this property. I am also of opinion that Mr. George Lockett Robinson was perfectly well aware of that fact, and that the settlement was within his knowledge at the time the money was raised. But a question which required consideration was very pointedly put by Mr. Baggallay. It was this, whether that which would be evidence against certain persons would also be evidence as against others? Undoubtedly there are very nice distinctions to be drawn from many cases with respect to the extent to which the evidence given by certain persons is evidence against others. I think there is in this case evidence against the whole world of the existence of this settlement. I think that, if the facts to which I have referred in the evidence had been proved by the testimony of a witness in the witness-box, a jury would have found that there was such a settlement against any person whatever. I am of opinion also that they would have found that there were those clauses in the settlement to which I have also referred. I am, therefore, of opinion that all the persons who had notice of the settlement are bound by it. It is certain that all the mortgagees in this case had notice of the settlement. It is true that Mr. George Lockett Robinson had actual and positive notice of it. The trustee of the mortgagees had only constructive notice of it. They are, therefore, in no respect morally implicated in the transaction itself. With respect to them it is quite clear the settlement must have priority over their charges. They are entitled to have every power given to them against the settlement, which could have been conferred upon them by George Barlow; and they will also be entitled to have the costs of the suit added to their charges. The same observation will apply to the second mortgagees—the takers subsequent to the trust. With respect to the rest of the case I will examine it more carefully. I place very little reliance upon such affidavits as those of persons who read the settlement casually afterwards, and who come now to speak to the contents of it. Statements of that nature as to the contents of the settlement, made by persons who were not parties to it, who are brought here to speak with respect to the power of sale contained in it, and to say whether such power of sale overrides all the trusts of the settlement, or was only exercisable in default of there being issue, constitute matters on which I place very little reliance. So much so that my impression is, when I come to read all the affidavits, I shall find it necessary to set off one of them against the other. I have also to consider what property is included in the settlement. I will look at that also more fully. I am perfectly clear that the settlement contained the seven messuages, even if it did not also contain the piece of land adjoining them; but of that first proposition there is no question. I am at present disposed to think that from the ambiguous passage in Mr. Robinson's evidence, the settlement did contain the piece of land adjoining. It was contained in the mortgage; but as to that I will consider the case a little more fully. I must also consider the costs of the suit. This case is, however, undoubtedly one in which it is impossible to say, whether I make Mr. Robinson pay or withhold from him the costs of the suit, that personally there is not a great deal of blame attributable to him. He allowed his clients to advance money upon property which was not a valid security. The story which he tells with respect to the consent of the lady, independently of the contradiction of it by the lady herself, is, in my opinion, highly improbable. I do not forget the comments which were made by Mr. De Gex upon it; but her affidavit distinctly and positively denies it. Mr. Robinson must have known that her consent given to him across the table—although he might be a commissioner to take the consent of married women—was worth nothing at all. He must have known that it was necessary for her to acknowledge the deed under the Statute of Fines and Recoveries in the regular form; and for him to say that he called this lady into his room (whether it was his house or his office is immaterial) and showed her the settlement lying upon the table, asked her whether she had really and truly consented to it, and examined her in the form that commissioners for taking the acknowledgments of married women would examine married women, is really a story which it is hardly possible for me to consider of any validity. I say that I could scarcely regard it, even if it had actually taken place; but there is a considerable amount of contradiction of it on the part of the lady herself. I am also a little surprised at this state of things; I am at a loss to understand why the draft or the copy of the settlement has not been produced before me. Undoubtedly the usual practice of solicitors is to preserve all their drafts; and a very useful practice it is. I am not sure whether it has been settled that they ought to do so; but it is a very beneficial thing that they should. Nothing of the sort, however, is produced in evidence on the subject. Now, having made those in this case, and there is an anxious withholding of observations, I will carefully read over the whole of the evidence, and I will bear in my mind the observations of Mr. De Gex (which were very pertinent) in the course of his argument, viz., that the case against George Lockett Robinson was in great measure one between co-defendants, and one in which the court cannot properly deal with the case as it now stands. As the case was originally framed, it was one which expressly charged George Lockett Robinson with having been culpably inculpated in the breach of the trust. Those allegations were struck out by amendment. The only charges that remain are those to which I directed Mr. Surragé's attention, when he was addressing me, and in which it is stated that Mr. Robinson acted in concert with George Barlow for the purpose of defeating the settlement, and also as a trustee in committing a breach of trust. Having made those observations I will dispose of the rest of the case to-morrow morning.

July 7.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have nothing to add to the observations which I made upon this case yesterday, beyond this: that Mr. Barlow must pay the costs of the suit, including the costs (if there are any) of the separate appearance of his wife. With respect to the mortgagees, they must add their costs to their securities. I shall make no distinction between Mr. George Lockett Robinson and their trustees. You may, therefore, Mr. Prendergast, take a declaration to this effect: Declare that a settlement was duly executed on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Barlow; that that marriage-settlement settled the seven messuages in the bill mentioned, and the piece of land thereunto adjoining; that the settlement contained, first, a life-estate to George Barlow, then a life-estate to his wife if she survived him, and then a direction that the property was to be divided amongst the children of the marriage (if any) as the father should appoint; and in default of appointment equally among the children; and that if there were no children there was to be a power of sale or mortgage given to George Barlow, and in default of his exercising it there was a trust for the children of the first marriage as he should appoint; and in default of such appointment, for them equally; and that the settlement contained all the necessary provisoes and clauses for the purpose of carrying it into effect. I am convinced, from the evidence in the suit, that the substance of what I have stated was in the settlement; and at all events there should be added to the provisions of the settlement whatever is usual and common in such cases. I make that declaration upon a careful examination of the whole of the evidence, particularly that of Mr. George Lockett Robinson, and in the absence of the document itself, or of any copy of it. If the document itself, or any copy of it, should be produced, then I may be able to modify the declaration. As I stated before, I place very great reliance upon the evidence of those persons in whose favour the settlement was made, of the father of the lady, and of the person who prepared the settlement; but I place very little reliance indeed upon the evidence of those persons who, having seen the settlement afterwards undertook to say what, in their opinion, it contained. Affirming the observations which I made yesterday, I think, Mr. Prendergast, that the decree to which you are entitled is such an one as I have this morning mentioned.

SUMMER ASSIZES.—HOME CIRCUIT.

CROMPTON, J., Aug 10, 1865.

PREVOST v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

13 L. T. 20.

Liability of railway company to passengers for late arrival of trains—Effect of rules and regulations contained in time-tables—Evidence of negligence—Damages.

CARRIERS.—The time-table of a railway company stated that a train would leave L. station at 2.37 p.m., and arrive at M. at 2.54. The plaintiff entered L. station during the Whitsuntide holidays at 2.20 p.m., and procured a ticket for M., after being told by the ticket-porter and a guard that a train which was nearly due would stop there. The train in question did not arrive at L. till three p.m. The plaintiff entered the carriage, and, after considerable delays in consequence of stoppages, arrived at S., a station beyond M., at a quarter to five p.m. The train had not stopped at M. The plaintiff, who had an appointment for half-past three at a place about ten minutes' walk from M., took a cab and arrived there at five, but too late for his appointment. The time-table of the company contained the words following: "These tables show the times at which the trains may be expected to arrive and depart from the several stations; every exertion will be used to insure punctuality, but the departure or arrival of trains at the time stated will not be guaranteed, nor will the company hold themselves responsible for delay, or any consequences arising therefrom."

The jury, in answer to questions from the learned judge, found that there was no negligence or want of care on the part of the company:—Held, that no contract or duty had been proved by which the company could be made liable.

This was an action against the defendants for damages sustained by the plaintiff owing to delay in the arrival of one of the company's trains.

The plaintiff was called, and stated that on the 5th June (Whit-Monday) he went to the Lea Bridge station from Walthamstow in order to return to London. It was then about twenty minutes past two, and it appeared from the company's time-table, which was put in by the plaintiff's counsel, that a train would leave Lea Bridge at 2.37, and arrive at Mile End at 2.54. The plaintiff, who had an appointment for half-past three at Mile End Road, about ten minutes' walk from the station, asked a guard and the clerk who sold the tickets if the next train would stop at Mile End, and was told that it would. He then took a ticket and waited for the train, which did not arrive till five minutes past three. He entered the carriage and the train proceeded, but stopped on the road between Leyton and Stratford, and was delayed for about twenty-five minutes. It then went on, and after another delay of a quarter of an hour at Stratford, arrived at Shoreditch at a quarter to five, without ever having stopped at Mile End. The plaintiff then, according to his statement, got out, went to the superintendent, and asked to be taken back to Mile End. He was told that it would be an hour before there would be another train for Mile End, and that he must do the best he could. He then took a cab and started for Mile End Road, where he arrived at about five o'clock. He found, however, that he had lost his appointment, and thereupon brought this action against the company.

It appeared from the opening statement of the plaintiff's counsel, that damages were asked for in respect of the loss of this appointment; but CROMPTON, J., having interposed and stated that such damages were not, in his opinion, recoverable, the claim was abandoned.

Bovill, Q.C., for the defendants (G. P. Bidder with him), now referred to p. 4 of the company's time-tables (which were in evidence), which contained the words following: "These tables show the time at which the trains may be expected to arrive and depart from the several stations. Every exertion will be used to insure punctuality, but the departure or arrival of trains at the time stated will not be guaranteed, nor will the company hold themselves responsible for delay or any consequences arising therefrom." He submitted upon the authority of Hurst v. The Great Western Railway Company (12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 634), where it was held by the Court of C.P. that the mere taking of a ticket did not prove a contract or duty on the part of the railway company, that the train should be at the station at the time when the passenger expected it, that the plaintiff had made out no case.

CROMPTON, J.—Then the company say in their rules and regulations, "Every exertion will be used to insure punctuality, but the arrival or departure of trains at the time stated will not be guaranteed." The company very properly decline to guarantee the time of the arrival or departure of trains, because there may be accidents or other matters which render punctuality impossible. It is, however, the duty of the company to use due and proper care with the view of insuring punctuality. The duty or the contract (for a duty arises out of the contract, and whether the action is founded on a promise or a duty is a question of pleading) is to use due and proper care. The company expressly say, "We will not contract and it shall not be taken as part of our duty to guarantee the arrival of trains," but (they go on to say) we will take the greatest care to insure punctuality. I think that the contract and duty is simply this, that they will use proper care and not be negligent.

Bovill, Q.C., then addressed the jury on the question of negligence, and they found that there was no proof of any such negligence.

CROMPTON, J.—Then I rule that in this case the plaintiff can only recover on the ground that there has been negligence or want of care on the part of the company. Negligence or a breach of duty must be proved to entitle the plaintiff to recover. The jury say that there was none, and the plaintiff must be non-suited.

Plaintiff non-suited.

The Right Hon. Dr. LUSHINGTON, May 18, 23, 30, June 20, 1865.

THE VICTOR.

13 L. T. 21.

Possession—Repairs—Sale.

The necessity which gives the master an implied authority to sell his vessel abroad must be created by, and depend upon, the particular circumstances of each case.

SHIPPING.—The vessel was at the Cape of Good Hope, and in need of extensive repairs. The master had no credit, and the ship's agents there had a claim of 300l. against her, and threatened arrest. The master was unable to repair the ship, even temporarily, so as to bring her to England, and the necessary delay of three months to enable the master to communicate with the owner in England would have been prejudicial to the vessel. The master therefore sold her at the Cape:—Held, that, under the circumstances, an adequate necessity existed for the sale, and that therefore the transfer was valid.

In 1862 the schooner Victor, belonging to her master, Jarvis, was lying in Table Bay in need of repairs, and the master, having no means of repairing her, left her there and came to England, where he sold the vessel for 150l. to his brother, the plaintiff William Jarvis, a wine-merchant in the Minories, who immediately caused himself to be registered as sole owner, appointed his brother as master, and sent him back to the Cape with instructions to employ the vessel in the coasting trade there. On arrival at the Cape the master sold the vessel for 135l., at public auction, to the defendant Capt. Hawksley, who brought her to this country, and the present suit was then instituted by the plaintiff William Jarvis, to obtain possession of the vessel notwithstanding the sale at the Cape.

Deane, Q.C., and V. Lushington for plaintiff.

Brett, Q.C. and A. Cohen for defendant.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—In this case Mr. W. Jarvis, of the Minories, seeks to recover possession of the vessel Victor from Mr. Hawksley, of Peckham, who was actually in possession of the vessel when she was arrested by process from the court. Mr. W. Jarvis claims to be owner by a purchase from his brother, Thomas R. Jarvis, whom I shall hereafter call Capt. Jarvis, and that purchase took place on the 5th Feb., 1863, for 150l., whilst the vessel was at the Cape. Mr. Jarvis alleges that he sent his brother (Capt. Jarvis) to the Cape to take possession and navigate her as master according to his directions, and that Capt. Jarvis, without necessity, sold the vessel to the defendant. Of course this last statement, that the ship was sold without necessity, is denied by the defendant, but he also raises what I may call a preliminary defence in the following terms: "The purchase of the schooner Victor, alleged to have been made by the plaintiff, was not such an absolute and bonâ fide purchase by the plaintiff as to give him a good title to the schooner as against the defendant." It is clear, then, that there are two questions: first, the title of the plaintiff to maintain the action; second, the validity of the sale to the defendant at the Cape of Good Hope. I must consider the right of the plaintiff to sue as the first question to be disposed of, for if I decide it against the plaintiff, there is an end of the case. There is, I think, some obscurity as to the terms in which the defendant states the defect of the plaintiff's title. I perfectly understand that the title of the plaintiff may be denied altogether; but I do not understand how this can be; if I dare use the expression, a mitigated title, not absolute, not bonâ fide, not altogether bad, but only bad as relates to the present defendant. I consider that I have no means of deciding this point, but by proceeding straightforward to the question—Did Mr. W. Jarvis really and bonâ fide purchase this vessel, or is the alleged sale from his brother to him an empty form, or only a security for the debt Capt. Jarvis owed to W. Jarvis, or was it collusive? Capt. Jarvis is dead; we must not look, then, for other testimony. What was the probability of the case, looking to all the facts, the undisputed facts? I am of opinion that it was probable that Capt. Jarvis should wish to sell the vessel. The vessel had lain at the Cape from Oct. 1862, unemployed, in a state of great disrepair, producing no return, but entailing great expense. She was lying in Table Bay, without any protection, if not in danger, respecting which there is a conflict of evidence, and a certain degree of deterioration must have taken place. The owner (Capt. Jarvis) was considerably in debt to Searight and Co., merchants, at the Cape. Whether or no there was a lien on the vessel is another consideration. Capt. Jarvis, it is clear from the evidence, had no means to repair her, no credit with Searight and Co., who were his agents. I have no evidence why he did not proceed to sell at the Cape, and to liquidate Searight's demand, and I must not act upon conjecture. I have also no direct evidence why he came from the Cape to England; but I think that all the correspondence, and all the res gestæ, show that he was in difficulty and embarrassment. It seems to me, then, quite consistent with probability that Capt. Jarvis should be willing to sell the ship, nor do I see any improbability in the plaintiff Mr. W. Jarvis being the purchaser. Who, except a brother, would purchase a ship in the condition this was, which had been lying at Table Bay from Oct. 1862? Capt. Jarvis was in embarrassment—indeed, without such a sale his prospects were absolutely desperate; and, moreover, his embarrassment, as his brother believed, had been brought about by his own extravagance and improvidence. Then, were the terms of the purchase so extortionate as would justify the court in holding the sale void on that account? It might be difficult to say what was the value of a ship in this predicament. The price was 150*l.* Five months later she sold at auction for 135*l.* This fact alone, I think, would rebut any supposition that the price was so much below the value as to savour of extortion. Moreover, it must have been rather a bold experiment to purchase a ship known to be out of repair, lying exposed at Table Bay. In truth, if by the law of the Cape Messrs. Searight could have arrested and sold her for their debt, the ship was of no value at all. I certainly cannot hold that this transfer from Capt. Jarvis to his brother was void on account of the small amount of the price. Then, as to the payment of the consideration. It is said that no money was paid down, which I believe to be the truth. The consideration on behalf of the plaintiff is alleged to have been, first, a certain quantity of ale sent to the Cape, the proceeds of which were to become the property of Capt. Jarvis, the value being estimated at 85*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; secondly, the cancelling of a debt of 50*l.* due to W. Jarvis for moneys advanced to Capt. Jarvis and his wife; and thirdly, a sum of 15*l.* paid for Capt. Jarvis's passage to the Cape. These sums make up altogether about 150*l.* Upon the whole, I am of opinion that this was a sale by necessity, and that neither by law nor by justice am I bound to deprive the defendant of the property of which he was the bonâ fide purchaser. My decree must be in favour of the defendant, and necessarily with costs.

Wages—Accounts—Master part owner—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191—Admiralty Court Act 1861—24 Vict. c. 10, sect. 10.

SHIPPING. A.—In a suit for wages between an owner and the master, who is also a part owner, the court can take no cognisance of a claim by the master to an equitable share in the vessel.

This case raised the question whether, in taking the accounts in a suit for wages between a master and his owner, the court can take cognisance of an equitable claim by the master to a share in the vessel. The suit was originally for wages, and the owners having set up a counter-claim, the accounts were referred in the usual manner to the registrar and merchants, and, pending this reference, the court was, on the 13th inst., moved on behalf of the plaintiff, the master, for leave to amend his claim in respect of an equitable share and interest in the vessel, and so increase the amount of the action. The following are the sections referred to in the title.

"Every master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages which by this Act, or by any law or custom, any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages; and if, in any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty, or Vice-Admiralty touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due: (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191.)

"The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship, provided always, that if in any such cause the plaintiff do not recover fifty pounds, he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court." (Admiralty Court Act 1861, 24 Vict. c. 10.)

V. Lushington for the plaintiff.

Deane, Q.C. for the defendant.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This was originally a cause of wages, and there was a reference to the registrar and merchants to take accounts. A motion is now made to the court by the plaintiff for leave to amend his claim by adding a claim in respect of his equitable share and interest in the vessel D. Jex, and furthermore, to increase the amount of the action in a decree warrant, and arrest the vessel. This vessel was originally built in New York, in the year 1858. She was owned to the extent of seven-eighths by Josiah Jex, who lived in New York, the remaining eighth belonging to Manuel Guide. Guide sailed as master with this vessel, and in the year 1861 it was deemed convenient by Josiah Jex that this vessel should assume a British character, and accordingly he conveyed to his brother John Jex, of Honduras, his seven-eighth share, and, according to the affidavit of Guide, sworn on May 4, Josiah Jex also conveyed the remaining eighth share without Guide having received any consideration therefrom. Such is the statement of the 5th paragraph. The vessel was accordingly registered as a British vessel, and as such came to this country in Nov. 1864. Mr. Josiah Jex caused the master to be deprived of his command. The master then instituted this suit for his wages, and the question is for the court to decide whether it can permit him to sue for the value of his one-eighth share mentioned in his affidavit. On behalf of the plaintiff reference is made to the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act. [His Honour then read the section.] Now what is the meaning of the words "to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding?" It will be observed that it was only in case of a set-off or counter-claim that this power was conferred upon the court. It is true that in this case there has been a counter-claim, but it appears to me that the intention of the Legislature was not to refer to this court the decision of all questions which might exist between the parties on matters entirely foreign either to wages or disbursements. The object of this section was to enable the court to do justice where the owners set up a counter-claim with reference to the ship or her disbursements. All these are matters properly cognisable by the Court of Admiralty; but the wide exposition set up by the plaintiff might include matters wholly foreign to its jurisdiction and to the decision of which it is unaccustomed. I am of opinion, therefore, that this motion cannot be supported under the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act. The 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), has reference only to disbursements, under which head this cannot be classed. The motion therefore must be rejected, but without costs.

Will—Specific bequest—Ademption of legacy.

WILL.—Testator by his will, dated 25th September, 1860, made a bequest of "all his Lake Erie bonds and debentures" and other property, to certain persons, "according to the nature and qualities thereof respectively." At this date he was possessed of some bonds of a company called "The New York and Erie Railroad Company," but an exchange was then being carried out by the holders of the bonds of this company for shares to a like amount in a new company to be called "The Erie Railway Company," and a contract for such transfer had been signed in October, 1859. It did not appear that the testator knew of the negotiations or contract at the date of his will; but he became acquainted with them on or before the 20th July, 1861. On the 5th October, 1861, the testator made a codicil, which did not refer in any way to the above bequest, and on the 27th November, 1861, he died:—Held, that the shares of the Erie Railway Company, of which the testator was possessed at the time of his decease, passed under the specific devise of the testator's "Lake Erie bonds and debentures."

This petition was presented by the executors of the will of Thomas Pilkington, late of Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, Esq., to obtain the decision of the court on the following question.

The testator, by his will dated the 25th September, 1860, amongst other things, gave, devised, and bequeathed "all his Lake Erie bonds and debentures" to the petitioners by the description of his friends George Edmunds Williams, of Cheltenham aforesaid, gentleman, and Henry Darvill, of Windsor, gentleman, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, "according to the nature and qualities thereof respectively," upon certain trusts for sale as therein mentioned, and the testator appointed the said petitioners his executors.

The testator made a codicil to his will, dated the 5th October, 1861, but not in any manner referring to the above specific bequest.

The testator died on the 27th November, 1861, without having altered or revoked his said will save by the codicil, and without having altered or revoked the codicil, and the will and codicil were, on the 31st December, 1861, duly proved by the petitioners.

It appeared that the testator, at the date of his will, was possessed of five 1000 dollar unsecured bonds of the New York and Erie Railroad Company, and that this company afterwards becoming insolvent, a new company was founded, called the Erie Railway Company. By the arrangements made on that occasion, the holders of bonds of the New York and Erie Railroad Company became entitled, upon surrendering their unsecured bonds, to shares in the preferred capital stock of the Erie Railway Company in respect of those bonds.

The testator accordingly surrendered his said bonds, and received in exchange fifty-eight shares in the preferred capital stock of the Erie Railway Company, and seventy-five dollars in the same stock. Of these fifty-eight shares and seventy-five dollars the testator was at the time of his death possessed; for which he held two certificates of the company, dated at New York, the 20th July, 1861, and he was not, at the time of his death, possessed, or entitled, of or to any bonds or debentures answering to the term "Lake Erie bonds and debentures," or to any debentures, bonds, stock, or other securities in any railway in North America, except the shares and stock above mentioned.

The sole question now was, whether by the alteration of the security, and the non-existence of any property at the testator's death, which could answer the description of "Lake Erie bonds and debentures," the above legacy had become adeemed.

The contract by which the property of the New York and Erie Railroad Company was transferred to the Erie Railway Company was dated the 22nd October, 1859. By that contract the bondholders of the former company agreed to exchange their bonds for preferred stock of like amount in the latter. It did not appear that the testator at the date of his will, 25th September, 1860, was aware of this negotiation and contract, but it was abundantly clear that he assented to it, because he paid to the Erie Railway Company on or before the 20th July, 1861, his share, amounting to 145 dollars, of an "assessment" or contribution of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon all the holders of unsecured bonds, assenting to the contract, for cash necessary to complete the purchase, as appeared by a receipt which was produced.

Craig, Q.C., and Tripp appeared for the petitioners; and contended that the voluntary conversion of the bonds into shares of a new company was an ademption by the testator of the legacy given by his will. They cited—Oakes v. Oakes, 9 Hare, 664.

By the Wills Act, every will is to speak as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention should appear. Applying that rule to this case, the testator purported to give that which he once had, but which before his death he knew he possessed no longer in the same shape, or capable of description by the same name. Hence, the language could not be treated as merely a mistaken or inaccurate description on his part.

Malins, Q.C., and Renshaw, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—When the subject-matter of a specific bequest is a debt due to the testator, if that debt is paid in the testator's lifetime, there is a complete annihilation of the whole subject-matter of the bequest. A specific bequest is a thing which must be answered by something in specie, and there would be nothing in specie or existing as a specific thing to which the bequest could apply. Therefore it is that the principle was thus stated by Lord Thurlow, that where the subject is annihilated, and nothing remains specifically upon which the terms of the bequest can operate, the bequest necessarily fails. It is quite another sort of case where a gift is made a specific thing by description, and another specific thing is found to exist, which it is said is the specific thing which was the subject of the bequest. Now, there may be cases in which a testator gives a specific chattel or a specific thing, and there is found to be another specific thing which is said to answer the terms of the bequest, but in which the specific thing fixed upon by the legatee as answering the description of what is given to him cannot be allowed to pass to him by specific description; for if by the mere voluntary act of the testator, with no motive whatever but the motive of changing the thing for his own purposes, he sells the specific chattel and invests the exact sum of money in another specific chattel, the result is, that by his own voluntary act he annihilates the specific thing which was the subject of the gift, and it can never be held that what he by his own act voluntarily and without any motive but the purpose of a change had thus altered in specie, was covered by the description of the specific thing given by the will. In the present case, what was done, although in a sense a voluntary act of the testator, was a thing done with reference to a peculiar quality of the subject of the bequest which made the operation, if not essential, an act of importance, with a view to the value of the particular chattel which was given. It is of great importance to observe here that the testator by his will inaccurately describes those specific bonds which were the subject of his bequest as "debentures," which they were not. He speaks of all his "bonds and debentures," debentures being only another term for bonds. But, at the date of his will, which was in 1860, those particular bonds, by an arrangement made more than a year before the date of the will (no matter whether that arrangement was known to the testator or not), had attached to them a particular quality which induced the testator afterwards, in order to preserve the value of them as his own property in another specific shape, to take shares in that other railway, which is certainly not the railway, the bonds of which he purports to give, but which was most certainly that railway, the shares in which were, by an act, which was not the act of the testator, created for the purpose of representing the former bonds in another shape, and the bonds were impressed with the quality that they might be converted into the shares of this railway. Now, it is of great importance, I think, to observe that, at the time when the will was made, the bonds were impressed with this quality, for there are some remarkable words in the will that have not been commented upon with reference to this. The testator says that he gives these bonds to the legatees named "according to the nature and qualities thereof respectively." Now, the nature of the bonds at this time was very peculiar, from the circumstances I have stated; but before he made his codicil, which unquestionably confirms his will, and most unquestionably brings the gift of these bonds, which he had given "according to their nature and qualities," down to the date of the codicil, that peculiarity in their nature and quality had accomplished their change into the other specific things now in question, namely, the shares in that particular railway. This is a case, therefore, in which, the testator having given a specific thing with a peculiar nature and quality impressed upon it, not by the testator, but by a power paramount to his, that specific thing, between the date of the testator's will and of his codicil, undergoes that change in its nature, or rather in its description, which probably was contemplated by the testator at the date of his will. It must have been known to him at the date of his codicil; for at the date of his codicil, unless the bonds were understood to be given according to their nature and quality such as they were at the date of his will, when he refers to their peculiar nature and quality, it is allowing the description to remain in his will. and the circumstance of the testator having placed himself in that situation which gave him possession of the other specific things into which the bonds had been converted, keeps the case entirely free from what is stated by Lord Thurlow, and by every other judge who has accurately defined the principle upon which specific legacies are adeemed, that there must be an annihilation of the specific thing, and nothing remaining upon which the terms of the bequest can operate. How can it be said that there is here nothing remaining upon which the terms of the bequest can operate, when, by the peculiar quality of the thing described, it was capable of undergoing a change which it did undergo, and had undergone, at the time when the testator made his codicil? It seems to me, therefore, it would be contravening that important principle, and the recognised definition of that principle, if we were to overlook the distinction between the utter annihilation of the subject-matter of the bequest, when nothing specific can be found answering the bequest, and the other class of cases where there is a change in the specific nature of the thing bequeathed, arising, not from anything inherent in the nature or quality of the thing given, but from some voluntary act of the testator, which takes away and annihilates in its specific character the thing which he describes as the subject-matter of his bequest. Here I think the quality of these bonds, and the way in which they were dealt with by the testator before the date of his codicil, shew conclusively that the thing which is averred to answer the description of the bequest was really intended by the words of the will; and hence that, upon the true construction of the will, the bequest is good, and the court is bound to give effect to it. No doubt there is this difficulty (and I wish it to be understood that I do not overlook it), that these bonds were for a specific sum, defined by the language of the bonds themselves. By the quality impressed upon them at the time when the testator made his will, it was necessary for him to pay more money in order to acquire that other specific thing, which seems to me sufficiently to answer the description of the subject-matter of the gift. But it seems to me that that cannot alter the construction to be put upon the will, for I think there is here a sufficient description of that specific thing into which it was the testator's wish these bonds, which he had specifically given, should be converted (though by no act of his own), and that he intended they should pass by the description in his will. The shares, therefore, must be declared to have passed by the description of the bonds and debentures. I have not thought it necessary to observe upon the Wills Act, but I do not in the least degree discountenance Mr. Craig's argument as to the application of the Wills Act to the present case; because my impression is that the Wills Act does apply to the case, and that this will must be held as speaking from the death of the testator. It appears that there is not only nothing in the Wills Act opposed to this construction, but the language of the will and the nature of the subject-matter of the bequest seem to me, not to contradict, but to support, the doctrine of the statute, that the will is to speak from the death of the testator.

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.]

CRANWORTH, L.C., July 24, 1865.

BEECHER v. MAJOR.

18 L. T. 54; 13 W. R. 1054; 6 N. R. 370.

Separate estate—Purchase in the name of another—Savings.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—A married woman, having a separate income, invested 1000l. in Consols in the name of her niece. She afterwards wrote to the niece, stating that she intended her to have the 1000l. stock for herself, but that she (the aunt) was to have the interest of it during her life. She at the same time desired the niece to execute a power of attorney, enabling the aunt to receive the dividends, also to sell and transfer the stock. The niece complied with this request, and shortly afterwards the aunt died, having received the dividends, but not having otherwise dealt with the fund:—Held, that the niece was entitled to hold the stock for her own benefit.

A husband furnished a house over which his wife had a general power of appointment, and subject thereto a life-interest in the rents for her separate use. The wife, with the husband's consent, managed the property, and received all the profits of letting the house in lodgings:—Held, that the husband, after the wife's death, was not entitled to an inquiry as to how much of the profits of the lodgings arose from the furniture.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kindersley, V.C., reported 12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 562, where the facts with respect to the main point on the appeal argued are fully stated.

Two further questions were now raised, which render necessary the following additional particulars.

Mary Beecher, the wife of the plaintiff John Beecher, had a general power of appointment by deed or will over a fund, and subject thereto had a life-interest in the same to her separate use. Her separate income was about 140*l.* a-year, besides which she received the rents of a house in Margaret Street, Marylebone, which was part of the separate estate. This house was let out in lodgings, of which Mrs. Beecher had the sole management, but which had been furnished by the plaintiff.

Mrs. Beecher had been married a little over eight years (as appears above) when she died, having made the investment of 1000*l.* stock in the name of her niece, Mary Major, under the circumstances stated in the previous report.

It now appeared that parts of the two sums of 400*l.* (originally purchased in the name of Helen Stone) and 600*l.* stock, of which this sum of 1000*l.* was made up, consisted of a sum of 50*l.* belonging to Helen Stone, and of a sum of 10*l.* borrowed from a sister of Mrs. Beecher.

Schomberg and Surragé supported the appeal on behalf of the plaintiff. —With respect to the 1000*l.* stock, the contention of Mary Major would probably be that it was an advance made to her by her aunt, standing in the relation of a parent to her; but this doctrine has no application where the quasi parent is a female. The Vice Chancellor's view was, that the evidence was sufficient to shew an intention on the part of Mrs. Beecher to benefit her niece; but this view would be found to be not sustainable on the evidence. Mrs. Beecher's letter had been lost; and though Colonel and Mrs. Crofton had deposed to its contents, yet it was clear that Colonel Crofton made one mistake as to the purport of the power, and so much depended on a correct report of the wording of a document of that nature, as was observed by Wood, V.C., in Paterson v. Murphy (11 Hare, 92), that their evidence, though unimpeachable in honour and conscience, was practically of little value. Even if Mrs. Beecher had made a promise to give the property, which promise she had afterwards left unfulfilled, this would be a nudum pactum, and would not amount to a declaration of trust—

Dipple v. Corles, 11 Hare, 188. Prankerd v. Prankerd, 1 Sim. & Sm. 1. Rider v. Kidder, 10 Ves. 360. Soar v. Foster, 4 K. & J. 152.

Mrs. Beecher had a general power of appointment over this fund; hence it must be considered as her property, and liable to the payment of her debts—

Stead v. Clay, 4 Russ. 556. Eccles v. Cheyne, 2 K. & J. 676. Hulme v. Tenant, 1 Bro. C. C. 16. Thomas v. Jones, 1 De G. J. & Sm. 77; 7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 610.

There ought to be an inquiry as to how much of the 1000*l.* stock arose from the separate estate; and it was quite clear that Mary Major could not lay claim to the two sums of 50*l.* and 10*l.*

J. H. Palmer, Q.C., and Swanston, for the defendant Mary Major, were called upon only as to the two latter points.—It was manifest that Mrs. Beecher might easily have saved the value of 1000*l.* stock in eight years, and as to the profits of lodgings, part of her separate estate, they were clearly her own: Barrack v. McCulloch (3 K. & J. 110). As to the debts, some act on the part of Mrs. Beecher (which was not shewn) was necessary in order to charge her separate estate with them—

Vaughan v. Vanderstegen, 2 Drew. 165, 289, 408. Johnson v. Gallagher, 4 L. T. Rep. N.S. 72.

Schomberg, in reply.—The bill prayed relief for the plaintiff, either in his marital right, or as administrator, hence it was competent to the court to direct on inquiry as to Mrs. Beecher's debts: Owens v. Dickenson (Cr. & Ph. 48). The plaintiff was entitled to an inquiry as to how much of the 1000*l.* stock arose out of separate estate; if not, at least to a direction that a sufficient portion should be made applicable to the payment of the 50*l.* and the 10*l.*

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The main question raised by this cause is, as to whether or not the defendant Mary Major is to be considered as the absolute owner of a sum of 1000*l.* Consols which has been purchased in her name, or is to be considered only as a trustee of it for the plaintiff, either in his own right or as representative of his wife. It appears that in February of last year Mrs. Beecher purchased in the name of Mary Major 1000*l.* Consols, 400*l.* of which were transferred from the name of Helen Stone, and 600*l.* purchased with her own moneys. The first question is, did she purchase this sum of stock for herself or for her niece? The law upon this subject has been long settled. If a person purchases stock in the name of another, primâ facie that other person is only a trustee for the purchaser. But there are exceptions to this rule, namely, when the purchase is made by a father or parent in the name of a son, then primâ facie the investment is for the benefit of the son. The same rule prevails in the case of a son-in-law. But in both instances, whether the purchase be in the name of a stranger or of a child, the facts of the case may be varied by evidence. It may be shewn that, although the person in whose name the stock stands is primâ facie a trustee, as in the case of a stranger, the purchase may be intended for his benefit; or that, although the purchase is in the name of a child, it was not intended as an advancement. Here the purchase was in favour of a niece, and a niece not of an uncle, but of an aunt; and it has been said, and I dare say correctly said, that the person standing in loco parentis must be an uncle, grandfather, or some male relative. That question seems to have been argued in the court below, but has been abandoned on the appeal, and I think there is no evidence to shew that Mrs. Beecher intended to stand in loco parentis towards her niece. But it has been now contended that, although there is no evidence to shew that the aunt stood in loco parentis to her niece, yet there is abundance of evidence to shew that these sums were intended to be for her benefit. Upon that point the evidence is, to my mind, perfectly irresistible. Mr. Schomberg did not contend that there was any mala fides on the part of the witnesses, but contended that they might have been mistaken as to the effect of Mrs. Beecher's letter. But they are admitted to be witnesses of the truth, and I think it must be acknowledged that Mrs. Beecher meant to make this purchase for the benefit of her niece. The evidence, corroborated as it is by the testimony of Colonel and Mrs. Crofton, amounts to this, that Mary Major was on friendly terms with her aunt, and used to receive little presents from her. In February, 1864, she received a letter from her aunt, in which her aunt informed her that she had been very unwell, and that her asthma had given her a great deal of trouble; and shortly after, in the same month of February, she received another letter, with a printed and written paper. The letter informed her that her aunt had put 1000*l.* stock in her name, which she intended her to have for herself; only that, during the aunt's life, she was to have the interest of it, and therefore she (the niece) was requested to sign the inclosed paper, and to get it witnessed by Colonel and Mrs. Crofton. The aunt's letter also requested that Mary Major would at once destroy the letter, which acting upon Colonel and Mrs. Crofton's advice, she afterwards did. It has been suggested that it was a very extraordinary thing that the niece should have been advised to destroy the letter, and should have done so; but I dare say that Colonel and Mrs. Crofton thought she had no need of any further evidence of the nature of the transaction. [His Lordship read the evidence of Mary Major and Colonel and Mrs. Crofton, and proceeded:] I do not think a case could be clearer. But then Mr. Schomberg thinks the evidence is not to be trusted, because Colonel Crofton describes this power as a power to receive the dividends, whereas it was a power also to sell and transfer the stock. But it was not incorrectly described as a power to receive the dividends, although it was also a power authorising a sale and transfer of the fund. Therefore, as to the main point, it is clear to my mind beyond doubt that the Vice Chancellor came to a correct conclusion—namely, that there was an intention to benefit Mary Major to the extent of the 1000*l.* stock. Then, it was said that this was a purchase by a married woman, and if the purchase were not made out of her savings it was not one that she could make so as to bind her husband or anybody else. It is quite clear, however, that this lady had property settled to her separate use, out of which savings might have been made. It has been argued, however, that the husband furnished the house, and that he is entitled to such of the profits as arose from the letting of the furniture. But the husband suffered the wife to remain in the sole management of the property. How, then, can the husband now raise a question arising out of his own act, and say, "Because I chose to leave my wife in the sole management of property which was partly mine as well as hers, therefore I am entitled to an inquiry as to how much of the profits are due to me, and how much to her"? Such an inquiry would now be impossible to prosecute, and when the husband chooses to let the wife take the whole of the rents and deal with it as she pleases, she has, in my opinion, a right to treat the whole as part of her separate estate. The remaining point is a very small one. It appears that just before the investment Mrs. Beecher borrowed of her niece Helen Stone a sum of 50*l.*, and it appears also that she was indebted to her sister in a sum of 10*l.*; when borrowed does not appear. Mr. Schomberg contends that these were debts of this lady in the sense in which married women may be made liable in respect of their separate estate, and hence that these were payable out of her separate estate, and that his Honour, Kindersley, V.C., ought to have directed a general account of her estate. It is clear that nothing would be liable to an account but the separate estate, and the only existing separate estate was this sum of 1000*l.* stock, which she had invested in her lifetime, and put out of her own possession. There may be a question as to how far that fund may be liable to legacy duty; but I will not go into that. She had no other separate estate beyond her own lifetime; but inasmuch as she had a general power of appointment over the property, and might have exercised the power in such a way as to make the property separate estate, therefore it is said that the same principle is applicable to her as to persons entitled sui juri, namely, that her property is liable to pay her debts. But I cannot think that this question is raised upon these pleadings. It is true that Mrs. Beecher had a general power of appointment, but I very much doubt whether that would warrant any such inquiry as is asked for here. The nature of the obligations of a married woman, or of her separate estate, to be liable for debts, is not one that can be raised and disposed of in this incidental manner. But beyond that, it has been distinctly ruled by learned judges, that this doctrine as to a married woman's debts is inapplicable where there is only a general power of disposition, because, although where a man, being sui juris, has absolute power over a fund the Court has said, "We will deal with you as a sole owner," it is very different when you come to apply the doctrine to a wife merely because she might, if she had chosen, have made the property her own by appointing it to her separate use. That distinction is to be found laid down in other cases, as well as in that of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen. The case of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen seems to me to have been entirely recognised in the later decision of Johnson v. Gallagher, and I am not disposed to question its soundness. I can only come to the conclusion that the decision of Kindersley, V.C., was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed. I may add, that I should have been better pleased to have heard some intimation that the defendant was willing to consent that these sums should be paid out of the fund coming to her; but, upon the questions that have been argued before me, I must dismiss this appeal with costs.

Injunction—Obstruction of ancient lights.

EASEMENTS AND PRESCRIPTION.—Decree of Wood, V.C., granting an injunction to restrain the defendants from raising buildings beyond their former height in such a manner as to interfere with the plaintiffs' ancient lights, affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wood, V.C., which is fully reported at 12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 602.

The question was as to the right of the plaintiffs, who carried on business as wholesale ironmongers, at Nos. 11 and 12, Clement's Lane, a narrow thoroughfare in the City, to the interference of the court, restraining the defendants by injunction from raising buildings to a greater height than that at which they formerly stood, in such a way as to darken the plaintiffs' ancient lights.

His Honour granted the injunction, with liberty to the defendants to apply to the judge at chambers with reference to any scheme they might think fit to bring forward as to the erection of their building.

Amphlett, Q.C., and Druce supported the appeal on behalf of the defendants.—They referred to the recent cases, down to and inclusive of—

Jackson v. The Duke of Newcastle, 10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 635.

Giffard, Q.C., and G. N. Colt, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Mr. Giffard, I need not trouble you in this case. I have considered the case, and my opinion is that the order of the Vice Chancellor is right. I regret to say that I think so, because the truth is that, in the course of our social progress, everybody has got into a system of building houses much higher than they used to be built, and I suppose it is the same in the city of London as it is in the west-end of the town. But, unless the Legislature interferes, I cannot say that, because it is very common, and very happily common, I think, to build much better houses, more spacious and airy, and, in consequence, more lofty houses than formerly, that that entitles anybody materially to interfere with the right of his neighbour; and the question really in this case is, whether or not there has been, or is in course of erection, such building, or row of buildings as will materially interfere with the use to the plaintiff of his counting-house and different warehouses and matters connected with his business, as will justify his applying to this court. Now, this is a question of a nature which is always the most difficult of any to deal with, and for this reason it is a question always of degree. Nobody can say, probably, that, if my opposite neighbour raises his house one foot, I could not recover any damages at all at law, but, whether I could or not, this court would never grant an injunction. That is always an exceedingly difficult question. We are obliged, therefore, to deal with it in very vague language, couched, perhaps, for the very purpose of concealing the difficulty we are in laying down any specific rule upon the subject. I think that the only practical rule we can act upon is this, that, if what is proposed to be done is such as to materially interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of a house for a private residence, or its utility for carrying on trade if it be a manufactory, or a warehouse, when this is done to a material extent, this court will interfere. Now, under the statute passed a few years ago, in some cases this court may not interfere by injunction, but may give compensation—not such compensation as you get at law, which is an action toties quoties for all interference with your light, but once for all a compensation for having your light permanently obstructed. I should have great difficulty in doing that, where what is done is really an interference, so that it may be doubtful whether the business could be carried on afterwards; or, even, short of that, if it has materially rendered it less convenient and less profitable to the parties who are seeking it, I should have great difficulty in saying that the parties ought to have anything else but an injunction. But it would be impossible to give that sort of relief here, because these parties are only tenants twelve or thirteen years, and then their landlord, who is to have it in reversion, is no party to this proceeding, and consequently that course of dealing with the subject would be out of the question. Equally am I precluded from acting at all in the mode in which Lord Westbury acted in the case of the Duke of Newcastle, because what Lord Westbury said there was, that there was no injury to the house in its then state—that is, no injury while it was used as it was then used; and though, if it could be used for other purposes afterwards, what was proposed to be done by the Duke of Newcastle might cause an injury, Lord Westbury did not think that that prospective possible injury from a use of the premises, the light of which was obstructed, necessarily called upon him to grant an injunction. Now here the two matters that I fix upon as shewing to me that this is a case in which relief ought to be given are these. In the first place, I think it is quite clear that this is a bonâ fide application. This is a very old-established wholesale ironmongery business, the returns of which are sworn to be upon an average of from 90,000*l.* to 100,000*l.* a-year—not profit, but returns; and, further than that, it is quite clear that the apprehension of these parties is a bonâ fide apprehension. Now I come to that conclusion not merely upon their affidavits, but upon the fact that I see that all the contrivances they have to secure what light they now get are made with great care and attention. The counting-house is glazed all round into the warehouse, so as to catch every possible ray of light which they would fail to catch from the out-of-doors ordinary light. I think the back of the counting-house is all glazed, in addition to which they have a contrivance by reflectors to get every ray of light they can to be thrown upon the interior of that warehouse, which otherwise is very insufficiently supplied with light. As the buildings now exist (using the word “now” to mean as they were before the projected alterations; because now, as I understand it, they are levelled to the ground), taking them as they were, and the height at which they were, there is this evidence, which I cannot find at all satisfactorily contradicted, namely, that if you draw a line so as to get the ray of light which would be intercepted at the opposite corner of the building into your own premises, it would form a ray of light falling upon the ground in the interior of their building five feet three inches, I think, from the outer wall; therefore that gives a direct ray of light five feet three inches into the warehouse or building. That gives a perfect light upon the counter where the goods are to be seen, because those five feet three inches on the floor of the warehouse would leave the counter quite free and quite exposed to the light. If the opposite houses are raised from the height of thirty-six feet, which they were before, or thirty-five feet and a fraction, I call it thirty-six feet—if they are raised twenty-four feet more, which is two-thirds in addition, from thirty-six to sixty feet, I think it requires no architect to tell us—a common mechanic could draw a line and shew where light would fall. I think it would fall within one foot six inches, or something like that, of the wall; and not only would it not go on to the flooring of the warehouse at all, but it would actually strike, impinge, upon the counter itself; so that even the whole of the counter itself would not be exposed to the outer light. It appears to me, considering this to be a bonâ fide application of persons using their utmost endeavours to secure every possible ray of light they can for their business, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that raising the opposite houses in a street only twenty feet wide, from thirty-six feet to sixty feet, or to fifty-nine feet and a half—I call it from thirty-six to sixty feet—is likely to be such a material interference with the reasonable enjoyment of their own premises for the purpose of their trade that they are entitled to the injunction which the Vice Chancellor has granted. I may observe that a good deal of the argument, though I do not mean to say that the case was put upon that, is entirely out of place, namely, the argument that upon the whole this will benefit the plaintiffs, because it will make a better thoroughfare, and so on—that is out of the question; nor is it at all to be considered that there are other places in the city of London where they have no better light. It may be one of the great advantages of any particular place, that, by reason of the opposite buildings being low, they get better light, and they may pay a higher rent upon that account. I think that the Vice Chancellor has taken a proper view of this case. In my opinion his conclusion is perfectly right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DEAN v. HANDLEY.

13 L. T. 89; 6 N. R. 95; 11 Jur. N.S. 686.

Will—Construction—Gift over in case of death without leaving issue.

WILL.—Real and personal property was devised and bequeathed in trust to pay an annuity, out of the income, to the testator's widow during her life, and after her decease the property was devised to the testator's son; but, if he should die without leaving issue, the trustees of the will were directed to distribute the property among certain persons:—Held, that the gift over only contemplated the death of the son in the lifetime of his mother.

Ralph Handley, of Fenton, in the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, coalmaster, by his will, dated the 16th October, 1858 (after directing payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses), devised all his real estate to the plaintiffs, James Dean and Henry Hopkins, upon the trusts thereafter declared concerning the same; and (after making various bequests) he bequeathed his business to the plaintiffs, and directed them to carry it on. And he also bequeathed to the plaintiffs all other his personal estate upon trust to get in the same, and (after applying such sums as might be necessary to carry on his business) invest the residue. And he declared that his said trustees should stand possessed of his real and personal estate upon trust, out of the rents, profits, and annual produce thereof, and the profits of his business, to pay his wife Martha Handley, during her life, an annuity of 120*l.* for the maintenance and support of herself and of his (the testator's) son William Handley the younger; and from and after the decease of his wife he devised all his real and personal estate and effects, including all accumulations, and also including his business and all engines, machinery, and other effects employed therein, unto his said son William, to hold to him, his heirs, executors, and assigns for ever. Provided always, and his will and mind further was, that in case his said son William should depart this life without leaving lawful issue him surviving, then he directed his said trustees to sell and dispose of, and call in and convert into money his real and personal estate, and to stand possessed of the moneys to arise from such calling in and conversion, upon trust, as to one equal half part of or share thereof, to pay the sum of 100*l.*, part thereof, unto his brother William Handley, his heirs, executors, and assigns; and he further gave unto the plaintiffs for their personal use the sum of 50*l.* each, and as to the residue of the said moiety, to pay the same to his next-of-kin to be divided amongst them according to the Statutes of Distributions; and as to the remaining moiety, to pay the same to such person or persons in such shares and proportions, and in such manner as his said wife should, by any deed, will, or other instrument legally executed, appoint; and in default of such appointment the testator bequeathed the remaining moiety to his next-of-kin, to be paid and divided amongst them according to the Statutes of Distributions.

On the 7th March, 1864, the testator's widow, Martha Handley, died, having made her will dated the 21st February, 1862, whereby, in pursuance of the power given to her by her said husband's will, in the event of her son, the said William Handley, dying without leaving lawful issue him surviving, she appointed, gave, and bequeathed all the moneys and estate, over which, under or by virtue of her said husband's will, she had any disposing power, as therein stated.

Batten, for William Handley, contended, that the gift over was limited to William Handley's dying without leaving issue in Mrs. Handley's lifetime. He cited—

Amphlett, Q.C., and Fry, for Mrs. Handley's appointees, contended that the gift over was intended to take effect if William Handley died without leaving issue either in Mrs. Handley's lifetime or afterwards. They cited—

Batten, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that he had considered all the authorities, and he was of opinion that a general rule of construction had been built up from them applicable to a case like the present—a rule which did not depend on any minute indications of intention in the particular will. But of course the whole will ought to be looked to, and due weight given to everything in it which seemed to militate against the proposed construction. The rule which had been established by the authorities was, that if the gift of the whole income of a fund during a lifetime (and the rule would probably be held to extend to a gift for any period) was followed by an absolute gift to A., with a gift over in the event of A.'s dying without children or without issue, the court would take the death of a tenant for life (or other period of distribution) as the point of bifurcation, and construe the gift over as a direction to the trustees of the fund to distribute it in one way if A. died before the period of distribution, and in another way if he died afterwards. Sir Thomas Plumer appeared to have first dealt with the case in reference to this general principle in Galland v. Leonard (1 Swan. 161). The case was followed by a series of other similar decisions; and the result of all the cases had been summed up very carefully by the M. R. in Edwards v. Edwards (loc. cit.), and Kindersley, V.C. had adopted the decision of the M. R. in Re Allen's Estate (loc. cit.). The case of Smith v. Spencer (loc. cit.) at first sight appeared to be an authority the other way; but independently of its not being a gift for life, with a distribution at a given epoch, there was a gift over of certain accumulations in the event of the same person dying under twenty-one without leaving issue. It was apparent, on the face of the will, that the testator meant dying without leaving children at any period whatever. The principal question argued in that case was, whether F. S. Spencer took a vested interest on the testator's death. The Warwick Street property was devised upon trust to apply the rents for the benefit of F. S. Spencer until he attained twenty-one, and then in trust for him. This, in accordance with Boraston's case (3 Rep. 19), was held to give him a vested interest from the testator's death, and the case was thus brought within the second rule in Edwards v. Edwards, that a gift over on death without issue, following an immediate absolute gift, was to be construed as referring to death at any time. This was a well-established rule, though it was difficult to reconcile it with that now under consideration. In the present case the testator had given an annuity to his wife, and directed the surplus income to be accumulated during her life. It was possible that the effect of the will was, to give these accumulations absolutely to his son; but no solid distinction could be founded on the fact of the annuity of 120*l.* being given, and the rest directed to be accumulated; and he must deal with the estate for life exactly as if an estate for life had been given to the widow, or to some one else during her life. He preferred to rely upon the general rule, but the provisions of the particular will were strongly in favour of the rule being applied. By the provisions of the will two courses were open to the trustees. In the one event they were to divest themselves of the whole property, and hand it over bodily to the son. In the other event, namely, his dying without issue, they were to dispose of it as described by the will. Therefore, upon the particular will, he had no hesitation in holding that William, having survived his mother, was absolutely entitled to the property.

Will — Construction — Accruing shares — Survivorship — Share becoming payable.

VESTED, CONTINGENT AND FUTURE INTERESTS.—A., by will, directed the proceeds of his real and personal estate to be divided between and amongst his four children by name, "but if any one or more of his said children should die before his or her share should become payable, leaving no lawful issue, then such share or shares should devolve and go to his surviving child or children":—Held, that the time when the survivorship took effect was to be the death of the particular legatee, and that an accruing share went over in the same manner as an original one.

John Dean by his will, dated the 5th October, 1847, gave all his personal estate to his wife for life, and after her decease among his four children, Catherine, William, Samuel, and Thomas, as tenants in common. And he devised all his real estate to trustees upon trust to permit his said wife to receive the rents, &c., during her life, and after her death upon trust to sell the same, and to stand possessed of the moneys to arise from such sale upon trust to pay and divide the same amongst the said four children, Catherine, William, Samuel, and Thomas, as tenants in common; but if any one or more of his said children should die before his or her share or shares of and in the said trust moneys, or in his, her, or their respective share or shares of his said personal estate thereinbefore by him bequeathed to them on the decease of his said wife, should have become payable, leaving lawful issue, then such issue should take and be entitled to his, her, or their respective parents' share or shares of and in the said trust-moneys, and also of and in the said personal estate by him bequeathed as aforesaid; but if any one or more of his said children should die before his or her share or shares become payable, leaving no lawful issue, then such share or shares should devolve and go to his surviving child or children, and if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common.

The wife and the four children named survived the testator, who died in 1847. Samuel and William died unmarried in the life of their mother, the tenant for life.

Thomas died in 1863, having married and left one child, Amy Dean, and also his widow, Sophia Clifford Dean, him surviving.

The testator's widow died in March, 1864, leaving only one of the testator's four children surviving, viz., Catherine, who had married defendant, William Flewitt.

The bill was now filed by the surviving trustee under the will to have the opinion of the court, and a declaration of the rights of the several parties in the proceeds of the real and personal estate of the testator which had been sold and converted.

Buchanan, for the plaintiff, the surviving trustee, submitted the question to the court.

H. Cadman Jones, for Mr. and Mrs. Flewitt, contended that the survivorship of the four children was to be governed by the time of the death of the widow, the tenant for life, and that, consequently, the shares of William and Samuel survived to his client Mrs. Flewitt, she being the only surviving child at that time. He relied principally upon Young v. Robertson, 4 Macq. H. L. C. 314; and referred to White v. Baker, 2 De G. F. & J. 55; 1 L. T. Rep. N.S. 475. Crowder v. Stone, 3 Russ. 217. Crips v. Woodcott, 4 Madd. 11: Ive v. King, 16 Beav. 46. Littlejohns v. Household, 21 Beav. 29. Bright v. Rowe, 3 My. & K. 316. Cambridge v. Rous, 25 Beav. 409. Re Pell's Trusts, 3 De G. F. & J. 291.

Willcock, Q.C., for Sophia Clifford Dean, the child of Thomas, contended that Thomas, in the events which had happened, became entitled to one moiety of the proceeds of the testator's estate, but that on his death the accrued shares did not go over to his issue like the original share, but became part of his personal estate.

J. Phear, for Amy Dean, contended that the interest of Thomas, both in the original and accrued shares, went over to his issue. He cited—

Hodgson v. Smithson, 8 De G. M. & G. 604. Eyre v. Marsden, 4 Myl. & Cr. 231.

H. C. Jones, in reply, referred to 2 Jarm. on Wills, 714.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, the effect of the authorities cited was to establish a very nice distinction. The authority of White v. Baker, which had been decided by the full court of appeal, but which had been shaken by the decision of the House of Lords in Young v. Robertson, if not expressly overruled by it, would have governed the present case unless some distinction could be shown. It was admitted that if there was a gift to A. for life, and after his death to B., C., and D., or the survivors of them, the death of the tenant for life was the period of ascertaining the survivorship. In such cases as Crowder v. Stone, and others, it was equally established that if the gift was to A. for life, and then to several persons, with a divesting clause giving over the shares of any one dying to the survivors, unless there were words which bring the period down to a later time, the word "survivor" related to the last event mentioned, viz., the death of the legatee dying. Another class of cases, such as Littlejohns v. Household, were instances where under the special words of the will the court had held that the words of survivorship must be referred to the period of distribution. In the Scotch case of Young v. Robertson, there was no gift over to the issue of those who died leaving issue. In the present case the court, looking accurately to the grammar of the will, saw quite clearly of what period the testator was thinking. He speaks of two events, a legatee dying leaving issue, and a legatee dying without issue, both of which were to take place in the lifetime of the tenant for life. With respect to the former event, it was clear that the gift was to the issue immediately, but with respect to the other event, of the legatee dying without issue, there was this remarkable expression, "Then such share or shares shall devolve and go to my surviving child or children." Here were no words directing a division, but the share of a legatee leaving issue being given directly to the issue, the question was whether the survivorship in the other event did not point to the same period of time, viz., the death of the legatee so dying. The case had been very ably argued by Mr. Cadman Jones, who had said that too much stress ought not to be laid upon the words quoted, according to the later authorities, and in this he agreed. No doubt the words would be more plain if "share or shares" were read as applying to a plurality of shares coming to one individual. On the whole, therefore, he thought that that was the sounder construction. The language of the will was not very accurate. If he had said in each case "his, her, or their share or shares," the words might have been interpreted reddendo singula singulis; but in the clause on which the whole question turned his or her "share or shares" indicated a plurality of shares in one individual. This distinguished the case from Young v. Robertson. He should, therefore, follow the decision in White v. Baker, and hold that the accrued shares went over in the same way as the original shares. The declaration would be that, in the events which had happened, the fund was divisible in equal moieties between Amy Dean and Catherine Flewitt.

Decree accordingly.

[PRIVY COUNCIL.]

The RIGHT HON. LORD CHELMSFORD, and KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ.,

July 27, 1865.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

13 L. T. 105.

Railway company—Authority to borrow money—Liability of shareholders —Power to borrow by bond—Authority of directors.

COMPANY.—The G. railway company had by their original statute of incor- poration no power given to borrow money, but a subsequent statute gave power to borrow money from time to time for maintaining and working their railroad, to pledge the lands, tolls, and revenues for due payment thereof, and to make bonds or debentures for securing the repayment of any sums so borrowed in certain terms:—Held, first, that the securities on which the company had power to borrow were not restricted to bonds or debentures; Secondly, that a statute having passed to legalise a loan of money already illegally made by the G. company to another company, it became as lawful to apply the funds of the G. company for that other company as for maintaining the G. company's own railway.

A statute legalised a loan already made of 250,000*l.* by the G. company to another company, and also authorised the G. company to use its funds by loan or otherwise to facilitate access to other railways, provided no such expenditure should be incurred unless sanctioned by a vote of two-thirds of the G. shareholders:—Held, that a bank, in advancing money to the directors of the G. company, was bound to ascertain for itself, at its own risk, whether the loan was authorised by the G. shareholders, and had no right to assume that the G. directors must have authority to borrow.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Error and Appeal of Upper Canada.

The action was brought by the appellants to recover moneys alleged to have been lent to the respondents, and the defence generally was, that the respondents had no power to borrow money for the purposes for which it was advanced.

The Court of Queen's Bench of Upper Canada decided in favour of the appellants; but, on appeal to the Court of Error, this judgment was affirmed only as to two loans of 150,000*l.* and 100,000*l.*; as to the rest of the claim the court gave judgment for the respondents, and ordered a new trial. The present appeal was then brought to Her Majesty in Council.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Bovill, Q.C., and G. Shaw Lefevre, for the appellants.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Error and Appeal in Upper Canada, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of that province, and ordering a new trial in an action by the appellants against the respondents. The action, which was upon the common money counts, was brought to recover the balance alleged to be due to the appellants for money lent and advanced to the respondents. The respondents pleaded that they were not indebted. The appellants, the Commercial Bank, were incorporated under an Act of the Colonial Legislature, and have their principal office at the city of Kingston, with a branch office at Hamilton, and other branches in Canada. The respondents, the Great Western Railway Company, were incorporated under a statute of Upper Canada, 4 Will. 4, c. 29, but the extent of the undertaking and their powers have been since modified and enlarged by several other Acts of the Canadian Legislature. Under these Acts the company constructed its main line of railway from the suspension bridge on the Niagara river to the town of Windsor on the Canadian side of the river. Detroit. On the opposite bank of the river was the terminus of a railway in the United States, called the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway, which, when completed, was to extend across the State of Michigan in a westerly direction so as to secure a large portion of the traffic of the Western States of America. Prior to 1857 the directors of the Great Western Railway Company had become impressed with the importance of securing the completion of the Detroit and Milwaukee line, with a view to the increase of the traffic upon their own railway. Accordingly a traffic arrangement had been entered into between the two companies, and the shareholders of the Great Western Railway Company had invested in bonds of the Detroit and Milwaukee Company to the extent of 200,000*l.* In 1857 the Detroit and Milwaukee Company being in difficulties and wanting funds to complete their line, they entered into negotiations with the directors of the respondents' company for a loan of 150,000*l.* The subject of this loan was brought before the shareholders of the company on the 8th October, 1857, when a resolution was passed, "that the directors be authorised to advance to the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company such an amount not exceeding 150,000*l.* sterling, as may be necessary to insure the completion of the railway across Michigan, in connection with the Great Western Railway of Canada, such advance being made as a temporary loan, and on sufficient security, the expenditure of the same being subject to the control of the Great Western Railway Company." On the 1st January, 1858, a mortgage-deed was executed, transferring to Mr. Charles John Brydges, the managing director, Mr. Thomas Reynolds, the financial director, and Mr. Beecher, one of the general directors of the respondents' company, as trustees, all the property, both real and chattel, acquired and to be acquired by the Detroit and Milwaukee Company, so far as they were not affected by previous mortgages, and vesting the entire control of the expenditure of funds to complete the line in the trustees, and also the management of the railway, and the disposal of the net income for assuring the repayment of the money advanced or to be advanced by the Great Western Railway Company, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. By a resolution of the English board of the respondents' company, the expenditure of funds advanced by them for the works upon the Detroit and Milwaukee line was to be wholly under the direction and control of Mr. Brydges and Mr. Reynolds, and the respondents having by agreement with the Detroit and Milwaukee Company the power to nominate the members of the board of that company, and having named (amongst others) Mr. Brydges and Mr. Reynolds, they were respectively elected president and vice-president of the Detroit and Milwaukee Company. On the 7th October, 1858, at a meeting of the proprietors of the Great Western Railway Company, a resolution was passed "that the directors be authorised to advance to the Detroit and Milwaukee Company a further sum of money not exceeding 100,000*l.* sterling to be expended by and under the control of the Great Western Railway board of directors." In order to carry out the resolutions for the advance of the funds of the Great Western Company to the Detroit and Milwaukee Company, Messrs. Brydges and Reynolds on the 29th December, 1857, entered into an arrangement with the appellants, the Commercial Bank. The respondents' company had in August, 1857, transferred their banking account from the Bank of Upper Canada to the appellants' bank upon an arrangement that the company was to have an overdrawing credit of 50,000*l.*, to be available when required by the company for ordinary expenditure of whatever nature, and upon other terms unnecessary to be noticed. For the purpose of the proposed expenditure on the Detroit and Milwaukee line it was arranged that a separate account for the Great Western Railway should be opened at the branch Commercial Bank at Hamilton, so that the expenditure might be kept distinct from the ordinary cash transactions of the Great Western Railway, that the account should be headed and known as the "Detroit and Milwaukee account, Great Western Railway," that the bank should make advances from time to time on this account and that such advances should be covered monthly by sterling bills on the Great Western Railway Company, London, and that the available traffic receipts of the Detroit and Milwaukee line should also be applied in reduction of these advances. This account was accordingly opened on the 30th December, 1857, and operations upon it continued down to December 30th, 1859. In the course of the transactions the following letter was written by Messrs. Brydges and Reynolds to Mr. Park, the manager of the bank, at Hamilton, dated 16th December, 1858: "With reference to the conversation which took place yesterday between you and Mr. Campbell and Mr. Reynolds, upon the subject of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company's account with the Commercial Bank, we beg leave to state that the Great Western Railway holds itself liable to the Commercial Bank for all over-draught on the Detroit and Milwaukee Company's account with the said bank. This is quite understood by us; but as you expressed a wish to have it placed on record, we now do so by means of this letter." At the close of this account a balance was alleged to be due to the bank amounting to upwards of 945,000 dollars, upon which the action was brought. At the trial it was agreed that, if the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict, the amount for which it should be entered should be ascertained by reference, and an indorsement to that effect was made upon the record, which will be the subject of future consideration. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case, the counsel for the defendants applied for a nonsuit upon various objections to the action in point of law, and leave was reserved to move the court to enter a nonsuit. The defendants then called witnesses, and after a discussion between the learned Judge and the counsel on both sides as to the question of fact to be submitted to the jury, the following questions were put to them and answered as follows: 1. To which company was credit given by the bank—to the Great Western or to the Detroit and Milwaukee, or was credit given upon the responsibility of Messrs. Brydges and Walker? Answer.—To the Great Western. 2. Had Messrs. Reynolds and Brydges authority from the Great Western Company to make financial arrangements for the Detroit and Milwaukee Company, on account of the Great Western Company, to the extent of 250,000*l.*, agreed to be loaned by the Great Western Company to the Detroit and Milwaukee Company, and was the account of the Commercial Bank opened and conducted by them in pursuance of such authority?—Answer. They had the authority, and the account was opened and conducted by them in pursuance of that authority. 3. Had the Commercial Bank notice at any time while the account was going on that Messrs. Brydges and Reynolds had exceeded their authority, or that more than two loans amounting to 250,000*l.* had been expended?—Answer. The bank had no notice that Messrs. Brydges and Reynolds exceeded their authority. 4. Suppose the original credit was given by the bank to the Great Western Company on the opening of the account, was there any understood limitation between the parties as to the question of liability at the time the letter of the 16th Dec. 1858 was given, either to the extent of the second loan of 100,000*l.* sterling or otherwise, or was the account continued on after that period in the same manner as before by the parties?—Answer. There was no limitation, and the account was continued in the same manner as before the letter of the 16th Dec. 1858 was given. 5. Did the Great Western Company by its dealings with the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company reap the benefit of the expenditure made by the Commercial Bank on the Detroit and Milwaukee account?—Answer. They did. The verdict was accordingly entered for the plaintiffs subject to a reference as to the amount in the following terms indorsed by the learned Judge on the record: "It is agreed by the counsel for the parties in this case that the amount for which a verdict shall be entered, if the plaintiffs shall be entitled to a verdict, shall be ascertained by a referee or referees to be chosen by the parties respectively in term or otherwise, and if the parties cannot agree upon a person or persons for that purpose, then it is agreed between the parties that I shall nominate the referee as upon a compulsory reference. The referee to have power, at the request of either party, to report upon the different classes of the account; such as amounts paid upon coupons, upon cheques, upon promissory notes or otherwise, and to draw up a statement of facts for the opinion of the court." In the following term the defendants moved the Court of Queen's Bench for a nonsuit upon the leave reserved for that purpose, and also for a new trial for misdirection and want of direction on the part of the learned Judge, before whom the cause was tried, and for the reception of improper evidence. This latter ground, however, was abandoned by the counsel for the appellants in the course of the argument upon the present appeal. In considering the grounds upon which it was insisted that there should be either a nonsuit or a new trial ordered, it will be convenient to confine attention to those points which have been relied upon in the argument before their Lordships. These, as to the nonsuit, were said to be the 4th and 5th points in the rule nisi for setting aside the verdict and entering a nonsuit, viz. : 4th. That Messrs. Brydges and Reynolds could not bind the defendants at all, even though under the formality of a seal, as they had no power to borrow money on behalf of the defendants for the present purpose, the plaintiffs being aware that it was for the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company that the money was required. 5th. The act allowing the defendants to lend to the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company does not authorise a borrowing, and contemplates having the funds in hand before lending, and so the borrowing was ultra vires, and the plaintiffs being aiders in the illegal object of the borrowing cannot recover against the defendants. Leaving aside for the present the question of how the funds were obtained by means of which the first advance of 150,000*l.* was made to the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company, there can be no doubt that this advance being for a purpose foreign to the objects of the incorporation, would be ultra vires and not in itself binding upon the shareholders of the respondents' company. But with respect to this loan all objection is removed by the Act of the Canadian Legislature, 22 Vict. c. 116, by the 11th section of which it is provided that the loan of "seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars (150,000*l.*) already made by the said company to the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company is hereby declared to be lawful." So with respect to the advance of the 100,000*l.* to the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company, which was made after the passing of the Canadian Act just mentioned, that advance is not objectionable on the mere ground that it was made for purposes foreign to the undertaking of the Great Western Railway Company, because by the same 11th section of the 22 Vict. c. 116, it is enacted that "the Great Western Railway Company shall have full power and authority to use its funds by way of loan or otherwise in providing proper connections, and in promoting its traffic with railways in the United States of North America, provided that no such expenditure shall be incurred unless sanctioned by a vote to that end of two-thirds of the shareholders voting in person, or by proxy, at a general meeting of the shareholders specially called for that purpose." It is not disputed that the proper authority was obtained from the shareholders before this advance was made. But it is said with respect to the advance of 150,000*l.*, the Act only renders the loan itself lawful, but does not legalise the borrowing by which it was made. And as to the 100,000*l.* that the Act merely gives power and authority to the company to use its own funds in providing connection with or promoting the traffic of foreign railways but gives them no power of borrowing for these purposes. If the company had no borrowing powers, or none which could be employed upon such advances as those in question, it might be necessary to consider whether a distinction might not be taken between the loan of 150,000*l.* which having been already made was expressly sanctioned by the Legislature with (as it might be contended) all its circumstances, and the statutable power of applying the company's funds in future, the terms of which would require to be strictly pursued. But when the question upon the borrowing powers of the company comes to be considered, there will be found to be no necessity for making a distinction between the two advances. It is extraordinary that (as appears from the statement of counsel) there were no borrowing powers conferred upon the respondents' company by the original Act of incorporation; but these powers are only to be found in a subsequent Act for increasing the capital stock of the company, and in a section expressed in a declaratory form. This section is the 16th of the Canadian Act of the 16 Vict. c. 99, by which it is declared and enacted that the company have had and shall have power and authority to borrow money from time to time for making, completing, maintaining, and working the said railroad as they might or may think advisable, and to pledge the lands, toils, revenues, and other property of the company for the due payment thereof, and might or may make the bonds or debentures issued by them for securing the repayment of any sums so borrowed or to be borrowed convertible into stock of the said company, on the terms and conditions expressed or to be expressed in such bonds and debentures or in the bye-laws of the company." It was said by the counsel for the respondents that this section gave them power to borrow only on bonds and debentures; and from the language of the section it may fairly be argued that the Legislature supposed that all the borrowings of the company would be upon securities of this description. But it is not said that they shall not have power to borrow except upon "bonds or debentures issued by them for securing the repayment of the sums so borrowed." If, therefore, money were borrowed by the company for the legitimate purposes of the undertaking, it would be no answer to the lender seeking to recover his money to say that he had no bond or debenture as a security for his loan. The 11th section of the Act of the 22 Vict. c. 116, makes it lawful to apply the funds of the company to promote the traffic of other railways. The money lent for this purpose is just as legitimately employed as if it were spent in maintaining and working their own line; and if they have a right to borrow for the one purpose, they have equally a right to borrow for the other. And although the first loan of 150,000*l.* to the Detroit and Milwaukee Company was originally unlawful, yet when it was made lawful by the 22 Vict. c. 116, it was in the same predicament as if it had been so from the first, and consequently no sound distinction can be made between the borrowing from the bank in respect of this loan, and the borrowing for the advance of 100,000*l.* There seems to be no ground, therefore, for holding that a nonsuit ought to have been entered. The rule for a new trial for misdirection, or want of direction, presents much more difficulty. The questions to be submitted to the jury were, with two exceptions, acquiesced in by the counsel on both sides. It is unnecessary to consider these questions in detail. The Court of Queen's Bench held that there was no misdirection or want of direction involved in any of them. And although the judges in the Court of Error and Appeal did not enter into examination of the mode in which the case went to the jury, they must have been of opinion that there was nothing in the form of the questions which amounted to misdirection. In this opinion their Lordships concur, and are satisfied that, as far as the direction went, the facts to be tried were substantially left to the jury. But the Court of Error and Appeal proceeded upon a ground which (as the Chancellor of Upper Canada said) "was not presented to the court below, not prominently discussed before them," reversed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and directed a new trial. This ground was, that "there was neither previous sanction nor knowledge from time to time, nor subsequent ratification by the shareholders, or even by the directors of the railway company, of the dealings between Messrs. Reynolds and Brydges and the Commercial Bank, in respect of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway account, beyond the 250,000*l.*, and therefore that the company were not liable beyond that amount. And the Court of Error thought that the extent of the company's liability upon the evidence furnished should have been declared by the court, and that in this view there ought to be a new trial." It certainly appears that the opinion of the Judge as to the liability of the company beyond the 250,000*l.* was not in any way expressed upon the trial. The point was incidentally noticed in the third and fourth questions submitted to the jury, the third being, "Had the Commercial Bank notice at any time while the account was going on that Messrs. Brydges had exceeded their authority, or that more than the two loans, amounting to 250,000*l.* sterling, had been expended?" and the fourth, "Suppose the original credit was given to the bank by the Great Western Company on the opening of the account, was there any understood limitation between the parties as to the question of liability at the time the letter of the 16th Dec. 1858 was given, either to the extent of the second loan of 100,000*l.* sterling or otherwise; or was the account continued on after that period in the same manner as before by the parties?" But the learned Judge gave no intimation of his opinion upon the question as to the extent of the company's liability, which was an essential element in the determination of the amount which the bank was entitled to recover in the action. The point was raised, though not so distinctly as it might have been, upon the motion for a new trial; for in the rule one of the objections to the Judge's charge was in his not directing that the expenditure of money by the defendants on the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway was a matter beyond the scope and power of the defendants, except to an extent authorised by a vote of the shareholders, and so illegal." And the question seems to have been discussed, though, as the Chancellor says, "not prominently discussed," before the Court of Error and Appeal. The counsel for the appellants object to the judgment of the Court of Error and Appeal, ordering a new trial, upon the ground that the company are liable to the bank in respect of their dealings beyond the 250,000*l.*, as the bank had no notice of any excess of authority, supposing any to have taken place; and also that the extent of the company's liability can be determined in the reference of the amount of the verdict agreed to at the trial without sending the parties before another jury. If the question as to the dealings beyond the 250,000*l.* had arisen between the shareholders and the directors of the respondents' company, there would be very little difficulty in deciding that the shareholders were not liable. The objects to which the moneys were applied would not have been a legitimate application of the funds of the company without the Act of 22 Vict. c. 116, and that Act expressly provides that no such expenditure shall be incurred unless sanctioned by a vote to that end of two-thirds of the shareholders voting in person, or by proxy, at a general meeting of the shareholders specially called for that purpose. If the conditions of the statutable power are not complied with, it is not lawfully exercised. But it is said that the bank is in a different position from the shareholders of the company; that, according to the case of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 E. & B. 327), the bank had a right to presume that there had been a resolution of the shareholders authorising the borrowing beyond the amount of the 250,000*l.*, and the jury at the trial expressly found that "the bank had no notice that Messrs. Brydges and Reynolds exceeded their authority." It must be observed, however, that the bank had the fullest information that the account which was opened on behalf of the Great Western Company was for the purpose of their making advances for the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway. They must have known that the company could not apply its funds in aid of another company without the authority of the Legislature. They must, therefore, upon the opening of the account, have been directed at once to the source of this extraordinary power, and must have learnt the conditions under which it was to be exercised. The words of the Act are negative and prohibitory: "No such expenditure shall be incurred unless by a vote to that end of two-thirds of the shareholders." The case differs in this respect from The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, for there the clause of the deed of settlement was an empowering clause, enabling the directors to borrow on bond such sums as should from time to time by a general resolution of the company be authorised to be borrowed; and this very distinction was taken by Jervis, C.J., in that case, for after observing that parties dealing with the bank were not bound to do more than to read the statute and deed of settlement, "he adds, "And the party here, on reading the deed of settlement, would find not a prohibition from borrowing, but a permission to do so on certain conditions." The right of the bank to claim in respect of the dealings beyond the 250,000*l.* was clearly a question which ought to have been decided as a guide to the referee in ascertaining the amount of the claim, and as there was a miscarriage in this respect on the part of the Judge, there must necessarily be a new trial, unless under the terms of the reference as to the amount of the verdict, the question can be raised for the decision of the court. Upon this point, however, their Lordships, with every desire to save the parties the expense of another trial, are compelled to come to a conclusion adverse to the view presented by the appellants. The reference, which is evidently framed upon the provisions of the Canadian C. L. P. A., is to ascertain the amount for which a nominal verdict for the plaintiffs ought ultimately to be entered. The duty of the referee under this reference would be to call for vouchers and proof of the different items contained in the particulars of demand. The referee is to have power to report upon the different classes of the account, such as amounts paid upon coupons, upon cheques, upon promissory notes or otherwise, and to draw up a statement of facts upon each for the opinion of the court. There is nothing in this language which enables the referee to say, "I will not look at the account beyond a certain date, because I think there was no liability of the railway company after that date;" and any report upon the limit to the liability which he could make would not be "upon classes of the account, such as amounts paid upon coupons, &c.," but it would be a statement as to the provisions of the Act empowering the loan to the foreign railway the resolutions of the shareholders of the respondents company, and the facts which would prove knowledge, or want of knowledge, on the part of the bank of the excess of authority. This consideration will be sufficient to show that the extent of the liability of the respondents was not intended to be within the province of the referee, and that it is not comprehended in the terms of the reference. A new trial seems to be the inevitable result of the omission to decide this question, and their Lordships will therefore recommend to Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Court of Error and Appeal, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

[HOUSE OF LORDS.]

June 13, 1865.

HUNTER v. EARL OF HOPETOUN.

13 L. T. 130.

Landlord and tenant—Covenant for perpetual renewal—Equitable relief of tenant—Waiver of condition.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—T., a tenant under a lease for nineteen years perpetually renewable on twelve months' previous notice before the expiration of each term, instituted a suit to compel L. the landlord to renew from 1842 to 1861. In defence L. pleaded that the lease had been forfeited for breach of covenants. The suit, however, was allowed to stand still, and the parties then began to negotiate about a draft of a renewal, L. proposing alterations and threatening, if they were not accepted, he would insist on his original defence of forfeiture. Pending these negotiations, and the delay not being caused by T., the time arrived for T. giving notice of renewal of another term from 1861 to 1880, which T. did not give:—Held, that while the lis pendens as to the existence of the former lease existed, T. was excused from making demand for a further renewal, and had not lost his right of renewal, it being inequitable in L. to insist on compliance with a covenant of which he denied the existence.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Session made in a suit brought by the landlord (the respondent) against his tenant (the appellant) to have it declared that the appellant was not entitled to a renewal of a lease in terms of a covenant for perpetual renewal.

By lease of 1747 George Cockburn let to Andrew Wight the lands of Westfield, of Ormstown, alias Cotterwell, for a term of nineteen years, at a rent of 53*l.*, with entry at Whitsunday (15th May) 1747. The lease contained the following covenant:

That upon the said Andrew (Wight), &c. tendering and paying to him, the said George (Cockburn), the sum of 53*l.* sterling money, as a year's rent of the said farm, by way of fine and consideration to the said George, &c., over and above the yearly rent after mentioned, and demanding a new lease from the said George, &c., in a legal manner, before a notary and two witnesses, at least twelve months before the expiry of the said term of nineteen years, that then, upon the said Andrew, &c., making such tender, payment, and demand, the said George, &c. shall reiterate and renew this lease or tack in favours of the said Andrew, &c., upon his or their proper charges or expenses, for other nineteen years longer, for payment of the same yearly rent, at the same terms, and with and under the same conditions, provisions, and qualifications contained in this present lease, and so forth thereafter the said lease of the foresaid farm and others above mentioned shall be renewable in favours of the said Andrew, his heirs, &c., from nineteen years to nineteen years for ever, upon their making the like tender, payment, and demand at the end of every nineteen years, and in the terms above mentioned, and observing and performing the conditions, provisions, and prestations contained in this present tack.

The lease was duly renewed up to 1842. At that time the respondent, the Earl of Hopetoun, had become the landlord, and the father of the appellant the tenant. On 12th May, 1841, a demand was duly made for a renewal for another term of nineteen years from May, 1842, to May, 1861. The landlord, however, refused to grant a renewal in consequence of some dispute as to repairs and timber. But though no renewal was granted the tenant remained in possession, and paid rent during certain negotiations for a new stipulation in the lease. In consequence of the landlord's refusal, the tenant, in 1845, instituted a suit to compel specific performance of the covenant to renew. The landlord set up the defence that the tenant had violated the conditions and obligations of the lease, and that the lease had thereby been forfeited; at all events, that the lease should be varied in its terms. The suit remained in dependence, and had never been brought to a conclusion. Soon after the above defence was made by the landlord the parties began to negotiate about a draft renewal of the lease, and great delay occurred in the correspondence chiefly on the part of the landlord, as to the settlement of its clauses. The landlord's solicitor, during the course of the correspondence, several times reminded the tenant's solicitor that if the tenant did not accept the proposed alterations in the draft lease the landlord would fall back on his original defence to the suit, viz., that the lease had been forfeited.

During this correspondence, and when the parties were supposed to be nearly arriving at some agreement, the 15th May, 1860, arrived, when it behoved the tenant to demand and the landlord to agree to a renewal of the term from 1842 to 1861. The tenant said he did not make the tender and demand at that time in consequence of the lease for the previous term of nineteen years not having been yet adjusted. But after that date the landlord resolved to take advantage of the want of this demand of renewal in 1860, and accordingly announced that he was not now bound to grant a renewal.

The landlord accordingly commenced the present suit to have it declared that in consequence of the tenant having failed in 1860 to demand a renewal the lease was forfeited, and the plaintiff was no longer bound to grant a renewal. The Court of Session held that the failure of the tenant to demand a renewal at the stipulated time was fatal, and made a decree in favour of the plaintiff (the landlord).

The tenant now appealed against that decree.

Rolt, Q.C., and Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., for the appellant, contended that it was inequitable in the landlord to insist on the tenant making a formal demand of renewal, seeing that the lease for the previous term of nineteen years had not been adjusted, and was matter of negotiation at the time, especially as the landlord had pleaded to the former suit that the lease was forfeited at that time. The landlord could not be allowed at one and the same time to deny the existence of any relation of landlord and tenant, and insist on the terms of the lease being carried out:

Cur. adv. vult.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the last lease granted by the Earl of Hopetoun, the father of the present plaintiff, was executed in April and May, 1825. It was for a term of nineteen years from Whitsunday, 1823, and was granted in pursuance of the covenant for renewal contained in the original lease. But the covenant for renewal contained in the last granted lease of 1825 is somewhat differently expressed from the covenant contained in the original lease of 1747. For the purposes of this cause, however, I think the difference is immaterial. The right to a renewal must be regulated by the terms of the covenant in the lease of 1825. In conformity with this covenant the late Mr. Hunter, to whom the lease of 1825 had been assigned, did on the 12th May, 1841, being more than twelve months before the expiration of the lease, duly demand a renewal in his favour. With this demand the landlord refused to comply, and insisted that, by reason of certain alleged breaches of the covenant contained in the lease of 1825, Mr. Hunter was not entitled to a renewal, or to continue in the tenancy of the farm. In consequence of this refusal, Mr. Hunter, in the month of December, 1845, commenced an action against the Earl of Hopetoun, concluding to have it declared that the earl should renew the lease for the term of nineteen years from Whitsunday, 1842, on payment of the same rent, on the same terms, and with and under the same conditions, provisions, and qualifications as were contained in the lease of 1825. In his defence to this action the earl insisted that the obligation to renew was dependent not only on the tenants making tender and demand at least twelve months before the end of every term of nineteen years, but also on the tenants observing and performing the conditions contained in the lease, and the earl proceeded to specify various breaches of covenant, concluding in these words: "First, In consequence of the violation of the conditions and obligations imposed on the tenant by the lease, the plaintiff, as assignee of the lease, and as standing in right of the original tenant, is not entitled to demand a renewal. The original right of lease is forfeited. Secondly, even if the plaintiff were entitled to obtain a renewal of the lease of 1825, he is not entitled to insist that the renewed lease shall be drawn up so as to make the obligation as to furnishing timber for the repair of houses, &c., apply to buildings recently erected upon the farm." This suit has never been disposed of, no further step having been taken since the defences were lodged, but it is still lis pendens. This is admitted by the respondent in his answer. From the issues raised in this action by the respondent two things are plain: firstly, that the landlord denied the existence of any tenancy, and refused to grant the lease which, if granted, would have contained that covenant to renew which the appellants would have then been entitled to exercise. Secondly, that until the second defence and the question thereby raised was disposed of, the tenant could not know what would be the exact terms of lease to be granted by the landlord, and what he would be entitled to receive under the covenant. The question is whether, pending this denial by the landlord of the relation of landlord and tenant, and his refusal to grant a new lease, which it is now in effect admitted was unfounded, the landlord has a right to insist that it was the duty of the tenant to have treated the refused lease as granted, and to have given notice of renewal twelve months before the day on which the lease so refused by the landlord would have expired. It is difficult to understand how the landlord, refusing the lease and insisting that the relation of landlord and tenant was at an end, can yet be heard to allege that he has a right to that lease as if it had been granted instead of being withheld, and to require the lessee to fulfil the obligations which would have attached to him if the relation of landlord and tenant had been admitted, and the lease had been executed in pursuance of the covenant to renew. The landlord seeks to avail himself of two inconsistent defences. If the tenant gives notice to renew, the landlord claims the benefit of his defences to the action, and denies the tenancy, and if the tenant, by reason of the suit, does not give notice, he immediately treats him as a tenant, and insists on the want of notice in conformity with the covenant. Such conduct is plainly inequitable. Until the lease of 1841 was duly constituted, no legal formal notice could be given. In fact, there was nothing in existence that could be the subject of renewal, or of a demand of renewal. That Mr. Hunter's action was not more actively prosecuted, must be attributed to the evasive conduct of Lord Hopetoun's agent. It is true that in his letter of the 18th April, 1846, and also in his letter of the 4th November, 1846, the agent, Mr. Hope, carefully reserves and saves all the benefit of the defences put in by the earl to Mr. Hunter's action. But the correspondence of Mr. Hope, and the acts done by him, are such as to induce Mr. Hunter and his representatives to believe that the lease claimed would be granted, and this is continued until the death of Mr. Hunter. There had been much correspondence between the agents as to the form of the intended lease, the draft of which had been prepared by Mr. Hope, and, with some alterations, had been remitted to him by Mr. Hunter's agent for final adjustment. This draft lease remained in the possession of Mr. Hope, and Mr. Hunter's agent was unable to obtain from him any answer as to completion of the lease. After the death of Mr. Hunter, the trustees of his will applied to Mr. Hope for Lord Hopetoun's consent to their sub-letting the farm. This was on the 14th December, 1860. A correspondence ensued, in which there is no intimation by Lord Hopetoun's agent that the earl would refuse to renew. At length, on the 12th February, 1861, the agent of Mr. Hunter's trustees wrote to Mr. Hope, the agent of Lord Hopetoun, a letter containing the following passage: "As to Cotterwell lease, the draft of which you have not yet adjusted, I see the term of it expires at Whitsunday. I made no tender and demand, as the lease had not been adjusted; but I have now to submit that the draft be altered so as to include another nineteen years. The present fine and interest as well as the former one, are of course ready to be paid whenever you please." The mask is then thrown off by Mr. Hope, who, by a letter of the 16th February, 1861, stated in answer: "Cotterwell. As no demand for renewal of this lease has been made by the tenant, the obligation to renew has come to an end." This assertion, however, is, in my judgment, founded on a mistake in law. The relative position of the parties at the time when, as the landlord now alleges, notice ought to have been given, is to be considered. At that time the landlord had cautiously preserved the benefit of his defences in the suit by which the existence of the relation of landlord had been repudiated and denied. The demand made by the tenant of the lease of 1841 was of course a demand of the covenant for renewal which that lease, if constituted, would have contained. Until that covenant was granted, the tenant had no power, nor was under any obligation, to make any other demand for renewal than that involved in the subsisting suit. I concur in the observations of Lord Neaves, where his Lordship uses the following words: "The pursuer's present plea is that the defender has lost his right to any renewal from his failing to fulfil with strict accuracy the conditions which would have been inserted in the lease of 1842, if the pursuer had granted it, but which are not to be found in any such lease, which in point of fact he did not grant. The lease of 1825 did not contain any obligation to grant a lease in 1861, and the defender held no such formal obligation granted in 1825 to grant another obligation in 1842, which would have inferred such a renewal in 1861. The defender was insisting on getting that obligation from the pursuer, but without success, and as long as the pursuer was in default in that respect, I do not think he can maintain the present action, by which he seeks to prejudice the defender for not complying with a contract which had no actual and formal existence in consequence of the pursuer's default." There is an attempt by the respondents in the present suit to show that the objections to granting the lease of 1861 were tacitly withdrawn by the landlord, and that it was understood that Mr. Hunter and his representatives should hold and enjoy the farm as if the renewed lease had been actually granted. It is a sufficient answer to say that at the commencement and throughout the whole of the correspondence and treaty, the agent of the landlord carefully saved and reserved the benefit of the defences in the pending action. The agent, of course, knew that the principal object in demanding the renewed lease was the covenant for renewal that would be contained in it. But if his object had been to keep Mr. Hunter in play, and induce him not to prosecute his suit until after the time for demanding a renewal had expired, he could not have acted more effectually. This is exemplified by Mr. Turnbull's letter of the 15th October, 1847, and Mr. Hope's answer of the 16th October, 1847, and again by Mr. Turnbull's letter of 29th December, 1847, and Mr. Hope's answer of the 1st April, 1848. Under these circumstances the Earl of Hopetoun commenced the present action on the 2nd April, 1861, by which he seeks to have it found and declared that all right of renewal of the lease has ceased and determined, and that the defenders, the present appellants, had no right to require the earl to grant any lease or any renewal of any lease of the farm. To this action the action commenced by Mr. Hunter in 1841, and still pending and undisposed of, was in reality, in my judgment, a defence. If the landlord ought to have complied with the demand of the tenant in 1841, and granted a renewed lease, his refusal to do so was, in my judgment, an answer to the present action. The court below, however, has apparently assumed that the lease of 1841 ought to have been granted, and that the case must be treated as if it had been actually granted; and on that basis it has pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the conclusions of the summons. For the reasons I have given, I submit to your Lordships that this view of the case is not the correct one. I must therefore advise your Lordships, by your order on this appeal, to declare that, having regard to the action commenced by Mr. Hunter in 1841, which is still undisposed of, and to the defences to that action, and the subsequent treaty and correspondence between the agents of the pursuer and the defender respectively, this House doth reverse the decree complained of, but without prejudice to any question that may fall to be determined in the said other action.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, it is not in dispute that before Whitsunday, 1841, Mr. Hunter duly tendered his fine, and applied for a new lease for nineteen years from Whitsunday, 1842. He did not tender the fine before the end of nineteen years from Whitsunday, 1841, and the question whether he is entitled to the lease seems to me to depend upon this, whether by the conduct of the parties, it had or had not been agreed that the new lease should be considered as granted, and that the parties should stand in the same light as if they had legally constituted between them the relation of landlord and tenant. Whether they had or had not so done depends upon the effect of the correspondence which passed between them. I have gone very carefully through the correspondence, and have come to the same conclusion with my noble and learned friend. The fair import of what passed is, that Mr. Hunter, after his tender in 1841, pressed the landlord to send the draft of a new lease, and that after a delay of above four years, during which several letters passed, he raised an action to compel implement of the covenant to grant a lease. The landlord's agent answered that he was not bound to grant a lease. Nevertheless he eventually sent the draft of a lease which he was willing to grant, desiring the tenant to consider it. This he did, and returned it with several alterations, to all of which, except three, the landlord agreed. The tenant pointed out reasons why he could not agree on the three points, but proposed an arbitration. After two letters from the tenant's agent, the landlord's agent, after nine months, apologised for his delay, and six months afterwards he wrote that he hoped matters might now be settled. But in spite of a further application from the tenant, he eventually let the matter drop. I think the blame of the delay is to be attributed to the landlord's agent, and that till the landlord had granted, or acknowledged his obligation to grant, a lease on the terms agreed upon, he has no right to complain that the tenant has not tendered money, and done acts which, if the lease had been granted, he would have been bound to tender and do, but his obligation to tender and do which did not exist until the lease was made. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion (without going further into detail) that the conclusion at which my noble and learned friend has arrived is that which your Lordships ought to adopt.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—My lords, the grounds on which the appellant relies in this case are: first, that the respondent had denied his liability to grant any lease at all, and had insisted that the tenant had forfeited his right to demand one. It is contended that, under those circumstances, the tenant was relieved from the obligation to give a notice which he was entitled to consider that the landlord had by anticipation refused to comply with; second, that if the appellant were bound to give the notice, he was lulled into security, and prevented from doing so by the acts or neglect of the respondent. With respect to the first point, it must be remembered that, in Hunter's suits, two questions were at issue: first, whether the plaintiff was entitled to a lease at all; and, secondly, what were to be the terms of the lease, if one were granted? Now it seems to me that if this case is to be decided according to strict law (as the respondent insists, and has a right to insist that it shall be), the appellant may, with reason, say that, before he exercised his option as to requiring a renewal of the lease, he was entitled to know what the terms of it were to be. That point had been settled by the decree in Wight's case. No doubt, in Hunter's case, it was really as immaterial to Hunter to have the terms settled, as to Lord Hopetoun to receive the notice. He was sure to desire a renewal in either case; but if form be insisted upon on one side, it must also be allowed to prevail on the other. It seems to me that the old lease being the foundation of the right to the renewal, and the defendant having denied the right to the old lease, he could not complain of a failure on the part of the plaintiff to comply with any condition which could be capable of performance only on the foundation of the old lease; and further, until the terms of the old lease were settled (unless the omission to settle them could be attributed to the fault or default of the tenant), he could not be required to exercise his opinion. In this view of the case the question would be, by whose default was it that these points were not settled before the time for giving the notice had expired? Upon this question I think no doubt can be entertained. On looking at the whole effect of the evidence, I think that Lord Hopetoun must be considered to have retained to the last the position which he had assumed in the suit with Hunter, and to have insisted on the pleas which he has filed, and which his agent, by his letter of the 18th April, 1846, had expressly declared were to be treated as reserved, notwithstanding any correspondence which might take place till a lease was actually signed, and on which he had again insisted after the draft lease had been sent, and had been the subject of discussion in his letter of the 4th November, 1846. I think, therefore, that notwithstanding Lord Hopetoun received the rent according to the lease, and did not attempt to disturb the possession of the tenant, he has no right to say that he acknowledged the right of the tenant to have such a lease granted. On the contrary, I think that he must be treated as having repudiated his obligation to grant any lease, and to have insisted on the forfeiture which he had set up in the suit, which, although it had fallen asleep, was, when the notice should have been given, and I imagine still is, a lis pendens. If Lord Hopetoun denied the right to any renewed lease, the immediate lease sought was the foundation of the right to the renewal. He cannot, therefore, in my opinion, complain that a claim was not formally made, which, in fact, could not arise till the right to the immediate lease was either decreed or admitted. I think further, that before the tenant exercised his option as to claiming a renewal, he had a right to have the terms of the immediate lease, which would have settled at the same time the terms of the renewed lease. It appears to me that it was owing entirely to the fault of my Lord Hopetoun's agents that these terms were not settled long before the time for giving the notice had passed. Under these circumstances, I think that Lord Hopetoun is precluded in equity from availing himself of the plea that the notice was not given in proper time; and I therefore concur in the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Decree reversed.

CROKER v. KREEFT.

KREEFT v. CROKER.

13 L. T. 136.

Partnership articles—Construction—Guarantee—Accounts.

PARTNERSHIP.—By articles of partnership between the plaintiff and two defendants it was agreed that the plaintiff should reside and manage the business abroad, and that he might draw for his private use to the extent of 500*l.* until the yearly balance-sheet was made, and the amount of profit ascertained. After payment of specified expenses, the partners were declared entitled to the gains and profits of the business in the following proportions: the defendant K. to four-tenths, the defendant H. to two-tenths, and the plaintiff to four-tenths. In case the gains should be found insufficient to pay the expenses, the deficiency was to be borne in the same proportions; and, in consideration of the plaintiff devoting his whole time to the business, the defendants agreed to guarantee to the plaintiff "that the said four-tenths shares in the profits to be received by him during the first two years should not be less than 500*l.* per annum; and further, that, if the net profits should at any time, upon the division thereof, exceed 1500*l.* a year, the plaintiff should receive an additional bonus of 10*l.* per cent. upon the gross earnings."

Wood, V.C., having considered the construction of the above clause to be that, come profit or come loss, the plaintiff was to receive 500*l.* a year during the first two years:—Held, upon the construction of the articles (reversing the decision of the V.C.), that the true construction was, that if there should be a profit, and four-tenths of that profit should be less than 500*l.*, the plaintiff was to take 500*l.*, but if there should be no profit, then that the guarantee was not to emerge.

Upon the dissolution of the partnership, the chief clerk found the plaintiff to be indebted to his co-partners in certain sums on the authority of partnership books kept by the defendants. The plaintiff having alleged that the books were erroneously and fraudulently compiled, and that the debts were not partnership debts, it was referred back to the chief clerk to ascertain and certify the amounts due from and to the plaintiff and defendants respectively, with liberty to state special circumstances.

This was an appeal against an order made by Wood, V.C., on the 30th May last. The motion before his Honour was an application to vary the certificate on behalf of the plaintiff Bland William Croker.

The questions were twofold, one turning upon the construction of a deed of partnership, the other involving the principle whether, in taking accounts between partners, the books appearing to contain the partnership accounts are in all cases to be adopted as conclusive, although kept by two out of three partners at their private office, and challenged by the third partner (who in accordance with the terms of the partnership-deed was living abroad) as being fraudulent, and, in fact, compiled since the dissolution.

The plaintiff, describing himself as of Vienna, a civil engineer, by his bill alleged that in 1857 he entered into a negotiation with the defendants Siegerich Christopher Kreeft and John Howard with a view of establishing a partnership to carry on the business of commission and general agents at Vienna and in London.

On the 16th June, 1857, articles of partnership were entered into, whereby, after reciting that the plaintiff and defendants had agreed to establish themselves as a firm at Vienna under the style of Kreeft, Croker, & Co., for the transaction of the above business, and that the plaintiff should reside and conduct the business at Vienna, and the defendants in London, it was agreed (omitting the immaterial portions) as follows :

1. That the partnership should continue for seven years from the date, subject to sooner determination after the first five years as therein mentioned.
3. That the plaintiff should reside at Vienna, and devote his whole time to the business; provided nevertheless that nothing therein contained should prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his business of consulting civil engineer, in which case it was agreed that all profits arising therefrom should be divided as follows: one half to plaintiff, and two-thirds of the remaining half to the defendant Kreeft, and one-third to the defendant Howard.
4. That the plaintiff might draw for his private use to the extent of 500*l.* per annum, and not more, until the yearly balance-sheet was made, and the amount of profit ascertained.
5. That all interest of capital, rent, taxes, insurance, wages of clerks, and other servants, and all other trade expenses, and all debts and duties which should be owing, and all losses and damages from bad debts or otherwise, should be sustained and borne out of the gains and profits of the business; and after payment thereof the parties should be entitled to the balance of the gains and profits of the business in the following proportions; the defendant Kreeft to four-tenths, the defendant Howard to two-tenths, and the plaintiff to four-tenths; but in case the gains and profits of such business should be found insufficient for the payment of the said trade expenses, wages, losses, or damages, such deficiency should be borne by the parties in the same proportions as they took the profits of the business, viz., Kreeft four-tenths, Howard two-tenths, and Croker four-tenths; and in consideration of the plaintiff Croker devoting the whole of his time and attention to the said business, the defendants Kreeft and Howard thereby, for themselves and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, "agreed to guarantee" unto the plaintiff, his executors and administrators, "that the said four-tenths share in the profits of the said business to be received by him during the first two years of the existence of that agreement should not be less than 500*l.* per annum; and further, that if the net profits of the business should at any time, upon the division thereof, exceed the sum of 1,500*l.* per annum, the plaintiff should be entitled to, and should receive, a bonus of 10*l.*

(ten pounds per cent.) upon the gross earnings, in addition to his said fourteenth share of the said profits." 6. That proper books should be kept both in Vienna and London, wherein should be made full and true entries of all moneys received or paid, and of all contracts or other matters necessary for the full manifestation of the state or proceedings of the business. 7. That on the 31st December in every year during the partnership, or within three calendar months following, a general account or rest in writing should be taken of the partnership business, &c., and such account should from time to time be reduced to a general balance, and be written in a book which should be signed and subscribed by the partners, who should be bound and concluded thereby, unless some manifest error should be made therein to the amount of 20*l.* or upwards. 8. That if either of the partners should at any time, after the determination of the first five years of the term, be desirous of putting an end to the partnership, he should be at liberty to do so on giving six months' notice.

The plaintiff went to Vienna and proceeded to carry on business under a power of attorney from the defendants which was rendered necessary by the laws of Vienna, the plaintiff being a British subject. In May, 1858, the plaintiff advanced 1,000*l.* to the general capital of the firm, which was duly acknowledged by the defendants. A great portion of the business consisted of iron contracts, some of which were not fulfilled at the date of the dissolution below mentioned. The plaintiff alleged that the profit which would accrue from these contracts would exceed 30,000*l.*

The plaintiff alleged that he sent monthly accounts to the defendants, but did not receive any from them. In October 1858, however, he received from them what purported to be a balance-sheet up to June, 1858, with which the plaintiff expressed himself dissatisfied in some particulars, and on the 12th Jan, 1859, he came to England at defendants' request, and had an interview with them, when the defendants insisted upon the correctness of the account, and asked the plaintiff to advance the firm more capital. This the plaintiff refused to do, unless he were satisfied as to the account, whereupon on the 13th January, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff informing him of their intention to cancel by circular the authority they had given him, alleging gross and wilful disregard of the defendants' wishes and instructions. On the same day, by another letter, defendants gave notice of their intention to dissolve, and a circular was issued by them in German, to the effect that they had withdrawn their power of attorney to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff thereupon filed a bill for an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing or interfering with the plaintiff in the conduct of the partnership business; an interim injunction was granted; and an agreement was entered into on the 29th January, 1859, upon the following terms:

First, that the Chancery proceedings should be abandoned; secondly, the plaintiff to be reinstated in his position at Vienna; thirdly, the letters above mentioned to be withdrawn; fourthly, that the plaintiff should retire from the partnership within three months from the date, the plaintiff to retain his interest in the remaining contracts and order, and "to share the profits and loss thereof according to the terms of the articles of partnership;" and also to be allowed to draw 500*l.* per annum out of the business until the final settlement of accounts; fifthly, any disputes connected with the accounts to be referred to an accountant, and the plaintiff to have full liberty to inspect all books, papers and documents connected with the contracts and orders then in existence."

The plaintiff returned to Vienna; but, as he was about to retire, the defendant Kreeft also went to Vienna, and assumed the exclusive management of the affairs of the business. The plaintiff then became anxious lest he should be excluded from the benefit of the bonus of 10*l.* per cent., on the ground that he was not managing the business, and a correspondence ensued to have this point settled.

On the 16th April, 1859, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff a letter to the effect that, "as he (the plaintiff) said he was ready to sign notice of dissolution of partnership the next day, and carry out the agreement of the 29th January at once, provided defendants wrote to say that the construction of article 4 should be defined as meaning that the plaintiff should share profits and losses according to the deed of partnership, and take the commission of 10l. per cent. entirely as stipulated therein, should it accrue; and, moreover, that plaintiff should be entitled to the same participation in all business or contracts existing or taken by the defendants there up to the 29th instant," the defendants thereby confirmed that construction.

Plaintiff accordingly, on the 18th April, 1859, signed the notice of dissolution.

Plaintiff then stated that he claimed on the balance of accounts for the year ending June 31, 1858, a sum of 1,400l. as due to him in addition to the 1,000l. advanced by him, and that he had retained a sum of 2,130l. partnership moneys, which had come to his hands before the dissolution, in respect of his claim.

Defendants brought an action to recover this sum, but were nonsuited; and the plaintiff then (16th November, 1860) filed this bill alleging that the defendants refused to adjust and settle the partnership accounts, and praying for an account on the terms of the partnership articles, the agreement of January, 1859, and the letter of the 29th April, 1859, and other relief.

The chief clerk, by the certificate (11th March, 1865) found that there was nothing due to the plaintiff for commission on the gross earnings of the partnership, on the footing of the articles of partnership, the agreement, and the letters. He also found that there was a balance due from the plaintiff to the defendants of 4,404l. 11s. 8d.; and that there were also due from the three copartners to certain alleged creditors named in the certificate, sums amounting to 5,963l. 13s. 1d.; that the defendants had already paid, in respect of the debts, losses, and expenses of the firm, and beyond the sum of 4,104l. 11s. 8d., sums in proportion to their liability equal to the said sum of 5,936l. 13s. 1d., and that therefore this latter sum was, as between the copartners, payable by the plaintiff.

The accounts were taken in the following way. A balance was struck at the end of the first year of the partnership, the 30th June, 1858, upon which there appeared a profit, of which the share due to the plaintiff was found to be 1,324l. 9s. 5d. Then a second balance was struck at the date of the dissolution, the 18th April, 1859, for the intermediate period of ten months, shewing a loss, upon which there was found to be due from the plaintiff a sum of 638l. 10s. 4d. On the debtor side of this account, however, was inserted a sum of 4,827l. 8s. 10d., "reserved to meet the contingent loss by exchange." An account was further prepared of the trading of the firm with respect to the matters in which the plaintiff retained an interest by the terms of the dissolution in respect of unfinished contracts from the 18th April, 1859, to the 5th July, 1862, the date of the decree, upon which there appeared a balance of capital of the two defendants of the sum of 2,673l. 14s. 7d., and that the plaintiff was a debtor to the estate in the sum of 9,351l. 0s. 9d. A further account of trading with respect to matters in which the plaintiff retained an interest from the 5th July, 1862, to the 31st December, 1863, shewed a balance of capital due to the London partners of 4,203l. 9s., and that the plaintiff was indebted to the estate in the sum of 10,560l. 2s. 1d.

The plaintiff's contention was that, although the accounts as brought in by the defendants shewed a profit for the first year to an extent which did not bring the clause as to guarantee into operation, yet that the allegation of losses during the second year raised the question of the construction of that clause. He protested against a rest being made in the accounts at the period of dissolution, and against the debit of the sum of 4,827*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* as a reserved fund for contingent loss by exchange. He also contended that, although the withdrawal of the last-mentioned debit would probably turn the loss into a profit, and thereby exclude the operation of the guarantee clause, yet that there were very heavy losses after the dissolution, and that, at all events, assuming that the accounts of the defendant were correct, they shewed a loss on the whole business up to the time of carrying in these accounts. He also contended that, the partnership having been dissolved by mutual consent within the first two years, all the subsequent business must be considered as a winding-up, and that the accounts must be taken on the principle that all the losses on such winding-up were losses accruing during the existence of the partnership. Also that the guarantee given to the plaintiff by the fifth clause of the articles of partnership was in effect a guarantee against all loss on the first two years' trading, and also a guarantee that there should be profits to the plaintiff on each of those years of not less than 500*l.* per annum; in fact, that there should be profit to him to that amount, and no loss, on those two years. Further that, although the fifth clause was based upon a consideration of the services of the plaintiff in devoting his time and attention to the business, those services were confined by that clause to the existence of the partnership. He had rendered those services up to the dissolution, and the agreement for dissolution expressly absolved him from future services of that nature after the dissolution; and although in the words of the agreement for dissolution it was declared that the plaintiff should retain his interest in the existing contracts and orders, and share the profit and loss thereof, according to the articles of partnership, such declaration could only be considered as what the law would have implied, and not as intending to render Croker liable to "loss," which he was not then liable to under the articles of partnership. The real explanation of the provision just adverted to was, that the parties were doubtful as to the actual rights of each, and meant to declare that, whatever were those rights as to profit and loss, the dissolution should not prejudice or affect those rights.

His Honour, the V.C., in delivering judgment upon the points above stated, expressed himself as follows: "I think with reference to the question of guarantee the clause is by no means difficult to be construed, because it stands thus: by articles of the company the guarantee is not to be less than a certain sum which we may consider as income. The fifth clause of the articles of the company is, that all interest of capital, taxes, wages of clerks and servants, and all other trade expenses, shall be sustained and borne out of the gains and profits of the said business, and then after payment thereof, the said parties are to be entitled to the balance of the gains and profits in the following proportions, viz., Kreeft shall be entitled to four-tenths, Howard to two-tenths, and Croker to four-tenths, but that in case the gains and profits of the said business shall be found insufficient for the payment of the said trade expenses, such insufficiency shall be borne by them in the same proportions. Now comes, what is given very often, some benefit or other to a man who takes the active lead in the business, and there is some contrivance or other for remunerating him. The contrivance in consideration of Croker devoting the whole of his time and attention to the business, was that he was to have four-tenths of the profits, and then Kreeft and Howard were to guarantee to him that such four-tenths share of the profit to be received by him during the first two years of the existence of this agreement should not be less than 500*l.* per annum. Therefore, that in an indirect way was not at all indemnity for loss given, but given as an indirect advantage to him for being the manager. It would result no doubt in an indemnity for loss if any loss had resulted during the first two years, but they in effect say, 'Come profit, or come loss, you shall have for the first two years of the existence of the agreement (the consideration being that you are the person who will devote your whole time and attention) you shall have 500*l.* per annum.' He would still have the 500*l.*, because, whether there are profits or loss, he is to get 500*l.* per annum. That is very important to bear in mind when you come to the words of the agreement for dissolution. It may be given as profit in the one case, and it is given as guarantee whether there be profits or whether there be loss, taking the circumstances into consideration. At the least, he would have more profit deducted from his share of the profit; and therefore, in that view, he is only to get four-tenths (subject to the second question about the 10*l.* per cent. for anything over the 1,500*l.*). He is to get the 500*l.* during the existence of the agreement, and then comes the article of dissolution, which of course puts an end to that arrangement, except so far as it may be embodied in this clause of the subsequent agreement. The important clause is this. [His Honour read article 4 of the agreement of January, 1859.] The date falls short of the two years. Mr. Croker is to retire from the partnership within three months from that date. The three months would not be up until the end of April, and the two years would certainly not end until June. 'Mr. Croker is to retain his interest in the existing contracts and orders, and to share the profits and loss thereof, according to the terms of the articles of partnership.' Mr. Tatham suggested—and I do not say that it was otherwise than an ingenious suggestion—that it comes under the articles of partnership, and that therefore he is to share the profit or loss according to the articles of partnership, viz., that, inasmuch as there was a contract going on, or in the course of being entered into, within the two years, it was a matter within the two years, and that you must look at the loss on these existing contracts, and must consider all things entered into during the two years as bearing upon it, and that they must be taken into profit and loss according to the terms of the articles of partnership, and that any losses are included in the guarantee, during the first two years, of 500*l.* It appears to me to be a very forced construction, and for this reason: the way in which it is first put is this, that it is not 500*l.* given quid profit, or given in that way at all. It is a sum given to him for his benefit in consequence of his taking the management, and it is to be his, whether there be any profit or not, as remuneration paid to him even if there should be a loss. It is made pending the existence of the agreement, which agreement is determined by the articles of dissolution, and therefore it was determined because it only depended upon the existence of the agreement for the partnership which was terminated by the subsequent dissolution. I think it is most important to observe what it is given to him for. It is to be given in consideration of his devoting his whole time and attention to the business. There is also another thing, I think, not unimportant in construing this agreement. He is to be allowed to draw 500*l.* in anticipation of the final settlement of accounts. That is a different payment altogether, because it is no longer anything to do with his giving his time and attention. But it is a drawing of 500*l.* a-year, which is another matter. There is also another thing of some importance. The Pola Roofs contract is to be exclusively the property and liability of Mr. Croker, so that, according to this view, he takes out of the existing contract something which would have been under the articles of partnership, and which, if they had been existing, would have gone towards establishing his 500*l.*, and would go towards compensating the others for loss. That shews that it is a forced argument to say that it is profit according to the articles of partnership. It is modified by the articles, now that it appears he is no longer to devote his whole time and attention. Another argument which goes to shew the termination of the 500*l.* is here given, because it takes out a profitable contract from the share of the profits, viz., the Pola Roofs contract; and he has that still, notwithstanding these articles of dissolution. It is also said to be plain that the 500*l.* a-year for the first two years must extend to the second year, but it never did extend to the two years, and therefore the 500*l.* must be considered as a mode of remuneration during the existence of that partnership, and that the 500*l.* a-year determined as soon as the partnership determined, which is before the two years were out, and that, I think, disposes of the first question."

Rolt, Q.C., and Fooks supported the appeal.

Giffard, Q.C., and Speed appeared for the defendants.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case of Croker v. Kreeft, the first question that has been argued before me is one of some nicety. It turns upon the construction of the partnership articles. Three gentlemen entered into partnership, and it seems that it had been agreed between them that one of them, the plaintiff, should be resident at Vienna, and conduct the business at that capital. The profits or losses of the partnership are to be divided among them in definite shares; four-tenths of the gains of the partnership are to be received by the plaintiff, and the losses are to be borne by him in the same proportion; four other tenths to the defendant Kreeft, and the remaining two-tenths to the defendant Howard. Now there is a positive contract that the profit or loss should be borne in those proportions. There is another collateral contract founding itself upon those divisions of profit, and which is peculiarly worded. It assumes the shape of a guarantee by Kreeft and Howard to the other partner Croker, the plaintiff, and the guarantee is thus expressed—that Croker shall receive 500*l.* a-year, or at all events have 500*l.* a-year; but the expression is, that his four-tenths of the share of the profits of the business to be received by him during the first two years shall not be less than 500*l.* per annum. That was to be augmented, if not; so that 500*l.* a-year is his share of the profit. If there be a share of the profit less than 500*l.* per annum, the guarantee emerges, and takes effect; if there be no portion of the profit there is nothing to which the guarantee is applicable. It is founded, of necessity, upon the basis of there being a share of profit attributable to Croker during each of the first two years, because the two years are to be taken separately and distributively. I must, accordingly, find something to answer the description of the plaintiff Croker's four-tenth share, and if I find that to be less than 500*l.*, then I apply the guarantee to augment it to 500*l.* Now, it was very correctly observed by Mr. Rolt, that of necessity four-tenths share of the profit implies that the losses, or rather that the debts and liabilities of the partnership have been first discharged; but, inasmuch as this operation of ascertaining the four-tenths share is to be performed at the expiration of each of the two years, some reasonable limit must be put upon the word "profit." There may be contracts involving very great and serious liability, partially performed during the first year, but as to the major part, or the obligation remaining to be performed during successive years, the money received and the money expended in respect of that contract may shew a profit; but, if the whole of the contract was taken into account to the completion of it, the result of the entire contract might be a considerable loss. But, inasmuch as this was intended to give to Mr. Croker, probably as part of his means of support, a certain definite income of 500*l.* per annum, provided there was a profit, I must of course ascertain, before I can apply the guarantee, that there was a realised profit during each of the two years. Now, what I understand the accountant to have done has been this: he has attributed to the first year a very large profit indeed to Mr. Croker. The four-tenths of the share of the profit, if it had been actually realised, would have prevented the guarantee from arising, because it would have been more than 500*l.* But I am told (and that representation seems to be confirmed by the state of the accounts) that that sum of money has been attributed to Mr. Croker in the account as profit, by means of a computation or estimate in the account at the end of the first year upon the engagements and dealings of the concern. The estimate that has been put was of course conjectural; and an estimate, merely conjectural, if it be made the basis of the account of the profits, puts the account upon a mere hypothetical basis. It may possibly happen, therefore, in reality, that

Mr. Croker, instead of having attributed to him 1,800*l.* odd as his profit during the first year, may be found entitled upon the realised profit to a sum less than 500*l.*; and if it turned out that he was entitled upon the realised profit to less than 500*l.*, then the guarantee would attach, and enable him to claim from his copartners 500*l.* I am of opinion that any money received by him under the guarantee, or rather I am of opinion that the 500*l.*, if received by him through the operation of the guarantee, cannot be detracted from or affected by any subsequent loss. I am not at all, therefore, satisfied with the state of accounts, nor can I adopt the construction which I am told is the construction that was given to this clause by the Vice Chancellor, which I must take of course for the purpose of having it ascertained what was the actual sum of realised profit during the first year of the partnership, and during the ten months after the first year which preceded the dissolution of the partnership, the partnership having lasted only one year and ten months. That being so, it would affect, and it might affect very materially, the subsequent account of the losses of the partnership, because, if Mr. Croker was entitled to have the four-tenths share of realised profit, if it had been less than 500*l.*, made good to him, he may be entitled to credit as against his copartner based upon that guarantee, which guarantee has not been allowed to him in the form in which the accounts have been taken, because the accounts have been taken upon the following basis: proceeding upon the estimate to which I have referred of partnership credits, a sum of 1,800*l.* (which may turn out to be a merely nominal sum) has been attributed to Mr. Croker as profit. In reality, for the reasons I have given, the realised profit, the sum of 1,800*l.*, may perhaps be reduced to 200*l.* or to 300*l.*, and the like operation has been pursued with regard to the ten months. I desire, in order to know whether the guarantee emerges at all, to have it ascertained what was the actual realised profit, independently of any estimate of credits actually received by the partnership during the first year and during the second year, down to the dissolution thereof. There is another circumstance also which materially affects the state of the accounts as they appear in the chief clerk's certificate. Upon the whole account of these partnership dealings, in taking the accounts of the partners inter se, the chief clerk's certificate declares that Mr. Croker is indebted to his copartners in two distinct sums of 5,946*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* and 4,404*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* Those sums are put together, and the total is represented as the debt due from Mr. Croker to the partnership. Now it appears to me that, of this entire sum, the largest portion, viz., the 5,936*l.*, is the amount of debts at present alleged by the defendants to be still due and owing from the partnership; but I apprehend it is quite wrong to enter those sums of money in the accounts as if they had been ascertained debts of the partnership and paid by the other partners. What the ultimate result of the state of accounts may be I cannot altogether ascertain; but I think that was an erroneous mode of taking the accounts, and that in that respect the sum certified as due from Mr. Croker to his partners must be corrected, and in lieu thereof the 5,936*l.* should be stated, according to what is the truth, namely, as the amount of debts alleged to be still due from the partnership. There remains the question with regard to the 4,404*l.*, which is the subject of the "four-day" order. Now it is an exceedingly vexing and embarrassing thing, when there has been any mistake in taking complicated accounts of this nature, that one is obliged to suspend acting upon the result, though one may feel morally convinced that that result will remain still, notwithstanding the directions that must be given for the purpose of rectifying the process that has been gone through. But it is impossible, I think, for one to allow the defendants to act upon this "four-day" order, seeing that this 4,404*l.* is the result of the accounts in which it has been assumed that all the losses that have been sustained will be losses of which Mr. Croker is to bear four-tenths, and against which he will not be entitled to set off as between him and his partners any sum of money in respect of that guarantee of 500*l.* a-year. All that unfortunately has arisen from the accounts having been taken upon the basis of a construction put upon the articles with which unfortunately I am unable to agree; the Vice Chancellor having come to the conclusion that the articles were to be construed as a guarantee to Mr. Croker of 500*l.* a-year for the duration of the partnership, independently of the question whether there was a profit or not. Then he has attributed all the losses that have accrued under the process of winding-up the affairs of the partnership, and has held them to be governed by the memorandum of dissolution made on the occasion of the partnership coming to an end, and under which memorandum, without any repetition of the guarantee or reference to the guarantee, it is agreed between Mr. Croker and his partners, that all the losses shall be borne between them in the same shares in which they were to bear the losses of the dissolved partnership. The effect of that course has been to throw upon Mr. Croker the whole amount of four-tenths of the losses incurred in the partnership, treating the losses as having arisen and having been realised since the dissolution of the partnership. Now I think I must have it ascertained what Mr. Croker was entitled to in respect of this guarantee; and whether, having regard to my construction, the guarantee of 500*l.* did or did not arise during the copartnership, and what sum of money Mr. Croker was entitled to have credited to him in respect of that guarantee. That may affect the question of the 4,404*l.* I am very sorry to have arrived at a conclusion which will render it necessary to retrace the accounts of the partnership; but I do not mean to send it back to the Vice Chancellor. I mean to make an order founding myself upon that part of the agreement in the dissolution by which the parties have mutually stipulated that any dispute connected with the accounts shall be referred to an accountant to be agreed upon. I mean, therefore, to refer it to an accountant to answer me from the accounts these specific questions, and it will not be difficult to apply the result of those questions to the balance that has been found due. I have still to state what is the proper order or direction that ought to be substituted for what I find in the certificate with regard to the 5,936*l.* The facts appear to be of a very singular character. It is alleged on the part of the plaintiff that this sum of money has arisen from the separate dealings of the defendants, and it is alleged on the part of the defendants, that these debts have arisen from the partnership dealings. Now, it does not appear to have been sufficiently investigated in chambers, and in chambers it appears to have been taken that the whole of those sums were debts of the partnership. It appears that one of the alleged creditors, the principal one, brought an action against the three partners. To that action Mr. Croker, the plaintiff, appeared, and thereupon the alleged creditor has taken no further proceedings. That evidently is a circumstance involving a great deal of suspicion with regard to that debt being a partnership debt of the firm. I must, of course, alter that part of the certificate, or direct that part of the certificate to be altered; and I must either direct an inquiry into the constitution of those debts, which would be probably an expensive and dilatory thing to do, or I must leave the finding in the certificate that there are those debts outstanding and must require the plaintiff to indemnify the defendants against the costs of any proceeding that may be taken by the creditors, which the plaintiff may think proper to defend. There remains another point which has been very much insisted upon before me, namely, that there has been no sufficient examination of the general accounts of the partnership. It has been said, first of all, that these books themselves are not prima facie evidence, and then that the books have been allowed as conclusive evidence with regard to items that do not fall under that rule of the books being prima facie evidence, or that, with regard to items that were so challenged or disputed, some further testimony ought to have been given. Now, it is an exceedingly difficult thing to sit in judgment upon proceedings in chambers in taking a very long and complicated account, when the objections to the result of the account so taken have not been stated first of all with great precision and accuracy, in chambers, and when the exact process adopted with regard to each item in chambers cannot be ascertained and presented to the appellate tribunal in such a manner as the appellate tribunal can know what were the rationes decidendi of evidence, upon which the decision was founded that came before the court in chambers. I shall not, however, interfere with the accounts in that respect, because I do not find on the part of the plaintiff that there were anything like definite specified objections to certain items in this account, which objections were brought before the Vice Chancellor with as much accuracy and precision as would require from the Vice Chancellor a distinct and definite statement of the manner and the grounds upon which he allowed the items in favour of the defendants. In a word, the plaintiff has not furnished me with sufficient materials to enable me to come to the conclusion that items that ought not to have been allowed upon the faith of the books have been allowed upon the faith of those books, and to which the books were not properly applicable, and which were so far contrary as that some additional testimony in aid of the books ought to have been given. I cannot at all relieve the plaintiff from the observations that have been made on the ground of the great delay that has taken place. The decree is made in July, 1862; the accounts are not carried in until the 2nd January, 1864, and copies are sent to the plaintiff in the month of February. No effective steps appear to have been taken by the plaintiff until nearly the middle of the month of July. He had an opportunity of examination during the whole of the long vacation, of which he has not availed himself. He reserved the process of giving evidence on his behalf by filing affidavits in the month of November, and also in the month of December. There appears to have been on the part of the Vice Chancellor a dedication of an unusual amount of time to the investigation of these accounts, personally on the 13th December, on the 17th January, and again on the 27th January; and those items about which I was disposed to have inquired appear to have been sifted and examined before the Vice Chancellor. I must assume, therefore, as the contrary is not shewn, that there were sufficient grounds brought before the Vice Chancellor for his allowing those items, and therefore I do not entertain any part of the complaint that the books have been improperly allowed where they were not evidence, or that there is anything in that part of the account that requires my interference. I limit my interference first, to declaring the construction of the fifth (I think) article of the contract of partnership; consequently upon that construction it becomes necessary to inquire into the profit during the partnership. I put upon the word "profit" the interpretation of actual realised profit. I desire to have that ascertained without the process of going back to chambers. On the other hand, the statement in the certificate of the debts of the partnership, I think, is irregular, and I think that permitting those debts to enter into the balance alleged to be due from the plaintiff was also irregular. I think they should have been stated in a separate finding, namely, the fact of there being such debts, not stated as actually due from the partnership, but stated as alleged by the defendants to be due, but as to which the plaintiff disputed the liability of the partnership. I think that no further directions should be given upon that point, the plaintiff indemnifying the defendants against the costs of any proceedings that might be taken by these alleged outstanding creditors. And with regard to the "four-day" order, I suspend the operation of it until the result of the inquiries that I have directed, because I am by no means sure that the result of that inquiry might not alter the balance of the 4,404l.

The declarations were finally settled in the following shape: Suspend all proceedings against the plaintiff under the four-day order. Declare that if there were profits actually realised during the first year of the partnership, and the plaintiff's four-tenths share thereof fell short of 500l., he is entitled to have the same made good by his copartners, or one of them, to the extent of the deficiency. Declare that if there were profits actually realised during the ten months succeeding the first year of the partnership, and the plaintiff's four-tenths share thereof fell short of five-sixths of 500*l.*, he is entitled to have the sum made good by the said defendants, or one of them, to the extent of the deficiency; and the Lord Chancellor having appointed Messrs. Pullen and Young for the purpose, refer it to them to inquire and state whether, &c. (following the declaration). Declare that the chief clerk in his certificate ought not to have found that there were due from the three copartners to certain alleged creditors sums amounting to 5,936*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*; but that he ought to have stated that these sums were alleged to be due from the partnership to the said persons, and ought not to have allowed the same as debts. Having regard to the last-mentioned declaration, refer it to the chief clerk to ascertain and certify what is the amount which is due from or to the plaintiff and defendants respectively to or from each other; with liberty to state special circumstances.

WILLOUGHBY v. BRIDEOAKE.

13 L. T. 141; 13 W. R. 1056; 11 Jur. N.S. 706.

Reversionary interest—Sale of by a son to father—Rentals—Lapse of time.

COMPROMISE.—*In 1847 the plaintiff assigned to his father (since deceased) a vested revisionary interest in a sum of 1000*l.* stock, to which he would become entitled on the death of his mother, then aged sixty-seven. The plaintiff was at the time imprisoned for debt, and the manner in which the purchase-money (500*l.* in all) was made up and paid was recited in the assignment. No receipt for the consideration money was indorsed upon the deed. In Nov. 1849 the father assigned the reversion to the testatrix of the defendants, who died in 1859. The plaintiff's father and mother were now both dead, and the bill was filed to set aside the sale on the grounds of pressure, untruth in the recitals, nonpayment of alleged consideration according to the tenor of the deed, and inadequacy of consideration:—Held, that, as between the purchaser from the father and the plaintiff, and particularly having regard to the lapse of time, the consideration must be taken to have been duly paid or satisfied, and that the testatrix was entitled to believe, as against the plaintiff, that the recitals in the original assignment were true; and as the evidence shewed no inadequacy of price in the original sale.*

The decree of Stuart, V.C., dismissing the bill, was affirmed.

This was an appeal from the plaintiff from a decision of Stuart, V.C., dismissing his bill with costs. The original hearing is reported at 12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 173, where the circumstances are sufficiently stated.

Bacon, Q.C. and Rowcliffe, for the plaintiff supported the appeal.

Malins, Q.C. and Sargant, for the representatives of Mrs. Brideoake, supported his Honour's decision.

Lonsdale appeared for the trustees of the assigned fund.

Their Lordships reserved judgment until the 3rd August, when

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said:—The first question in this case is, whether as between the representatives of the late Mrs. Brideoake, the purchaser from the late Mr. Joseph Willoughby, on the one hand, and the plaintiff Mr. Thomas Willoughby on the other, the 500*l.*, the alleged consideration for the purchase deed of 1847, impeached by Mr. Thomas Willoughby's suit, ought to be considered as having been fully and bonâ fide paid or satisfied to him by his father according to the tenor of the deed of 1847? And considering the lapse of time between the execution of that purchase-deed and the institution of Mr. Thos. Willoughby's suit, a period of more than fourteen years, during which Mr. Joseph Willoughby had died, considering also the language of that purchase-deed, I think that this question must be answered in the affirmative. Mr. Thos. Willoughby is not entitled, I think, to contend, against Mrs. Brideoake's representatives, that she, in 1849, ought not to have believed the allegations of fact contained on his part in the deed of 1847, which, upon the materials before us, she must, I conceive, be taken to have done. The particular form and language of that deed appear to me to render the absence from it of an indorsed receipt not material for any present purpose, and the present controversy stands substantially upon the same footing with respect to Mrs. Brideoake's representatives as if Mr. Thomas Willoughby had been an actually assenting party to the assignment of 1849. But then arises the question whether, on the assumption in favour of Mrs. Brideoake's representatives of the payment or satisfaction of the 500*l.* by Joseph to Thomas Willoughby according to the tenor of the deed of 1847, that amount was less than their fair market value at the time of the reversionary interest for which it was the expressed consideration? And looking at the evidence on both sides, and particularly that of Mr. Marsh, which seems to me entitled to much attention, I am of opinion that the fair market value of the reversionary interest sold in 1847 did not at the time of that sale exceed 500*l.*, or amount indeed to so much; and this without laying any stress against Mr. Thomas Willoughby on the provision for repurchase contained in the deed of 1847—a provision upon which I conceive it to be impossible to lay any stress in his favour. This conclusion seems to me not to conflict with the decision in Edwards v. Burt, cited more than once during the argument, or to be opposed to any rule or principle there laid down. The decree, therefore, under appeal in the present instance seems to me to be right, but it may be as well to add to it a declaration, that it is to be without prejudice to any question between Thomas Willoughby and the estate of his deceased father, which is, I apprehend, not represented in either of the cases now before us.

Lord Justice TURNER said:—I agree and for the same reasons.

DANGERFIELD v. JONES.

13 L. T. 142.

Patent—Injunction—Application of a general principle in mechanics as an improvement—Licence.

PATENT.—If, having a particular purpose in view, a person takes the general principles of mechanics, and applies one or other of them to a manufacture to which it has not before been applied, this is sufficient ground to warrant an application for a patent; assuming such manufacture to be new, desirable, and of public utility.

ESTOPPEL. PATENT.—A licensee under another's patent is not estopped thereby from contesting the novelty, &c., of such patent.

This was a bill filed by Wm. Dangerfield, a patentee, for an injunction to restrain the infringement of his patent by the defendants Joshua and Richd. Daniel Jones.

The letters patent had been granted, and bore date the 5th March 1864, for "an improved mode of, and apparatus for, bending wood for the handles of walking-sticks, umbrella and parasol sticks, and other purposes:

The specification was as follows:

My invention of an improved mode of bending wood has for its object to bend into a curved or hook shape the ends of sticks and canes suitable for walking-sticks, parasol or umbrella sticks, and various other articles in which bent forms of wood are required.

The invention consists principally in a novel mode of applying heat to the wood for the purpose of softening its fibres, and then bending down the stick and securing it in place by means of a clamp and a flexible piece of metal.

In carrying out my invention I find it convenient to soften the ends of the sticks which are to be bent, by placing them in moist sand, and which may be heated if required. After remaining in the sand for a suitable time, the sticks are to be removed to the bending apparatus. That end of the stick which is to be bent to form the handle is to be held securely in the jaws of a clamp or vice, and the extremity of the stick is then drawn round or bent over a tube or hollow mandril, provided with an annular half-round recess. The diameter of this mandril should correspond with the hook or curve the stick is intended to receive, and the groove should be of a size to suit the diameter of the stick. Inside this tube or hollow mandril a gas jet or burner is introduced for imparting heat to the tube or mandril, which heat is transmitted to the stick from its being drawn in close contact therewith. The stick is kept in this position by means of a band of steel, which is bent over the stick to retain it in a bent position. This steel band is held in the vice in contact with the stick to be bent, and it is fitted at one end with a handle for operating it, and at the other with a stud for carrying a catch or hook, which drops over the handle of the steel band when the same is lapped round the mandril, and thereby retains it together with the bent end of the stick in the curved position. Heat may be applied externally to the stick if thought desirable, by causing a jet of ignited gas to play upon the steel band.

As an obvious modification of the above described apparatus, a hollow chamber of suitable shape may be used as the "former," and heated by gas as described, and in place of the flexible band, a solid piece or block of metal of suitable form may be applied to the outside of the curved stick and heated from the outside in any convenient manner. When the end or handle of the stick has remained sufficiently long in this bent position to receive a permanent set, it is released from the apparatus, and the operation may be repeated. Having now described my invention of "an improved mode of, and apparatus for, bending wood for the handles of walking-sticks, umbrella and parasol sticks and other purposes," and having explained the manner of carrying the same into effect, I claim the application of a flame of gas or other combustible fluid or liquid as described, for softening the fibres of the wood while being bent in combination with a clamping apparatus for securing the wood in its bent form until the fibres are set, so that the hook may remain permanent as herein set forth.

The bill then went on to state the usual allegations of profit being made by the plaintiff, and the circumstances of the alleged infringement of his patent; that defendants had, on the 3rd February, 1865, accepted a licence from the plaintiff to use his invention, and the revocation of this licence on the 24th February; that defendants had since made similar machines for the purpose of bending sticks, &c., and undersold him in the market; and prayed an injunction and account.

The defendants, by their answer, alleged principally that, before the date of the plaintiff's patent, "they had been in the habit of using a vice for the purpose of holding the stick intended to be bent, and of bending a plant or shoot cut from a root by drawing the same round a solid mandril, and for the purpose of bending wood cut out of a plank, and had used a band of steel which was fitted at one end with a handle, and the other end secured to the vice; after pulling the stick round within the band of steel, it was held in the required position by means of a piece of string or wire; and during the process of bending heat was applied externally to the stick and to the band of steel, for the purpose of hardening the fibres, and making the same set in the required position by causing a jet of gas to be played upon the said steel band; and that the object of applying heat to sticks during this process of bending was to dry the fibres of the wood, and cause them permanently to set, and not, as in plaintiff's specification, to soften the fibres; and a general denial of the validity of the plaintiff's patent.

The cause now came on as a motion for decree.

Giffard, Q.C., J. J. Powell, Q.C. (common law bar), and Winterbotham, for the plaintiff.

Rolt, Q.C., and Freeman for the defendant.

The effect of the evidence in the cause, the arguments of counsel, and the principal cases relied on, are fully stated in the V.C.'s judgment.

April 26.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the plaintiff had established his right to the patent.—As to the question of novelty, there is not the slightest doubt, nor is there any ground for contention in that respect. The only real question is, with regard to the construction of the specification, with respect to which there might, perhaps, be some argument, whether it did not include too much, whether it did not describe some small things as new which are not so in reality. But, with regard to its being an invention for making these sticks, or rather an improved mode of bending wood for the handles of walking-sticks and other things, he thought it beyond all doubt that, up to the date of the plaintiff's letters patent, it was a great desideratum to have umbrella-sticks and canes so bent as not to indicate by any mark any charring of the wood. When it is said, as one of the witnesses had stated, that because wood is bent by coachmakers and others in a variety of ways by the application of heat to wood, you cannot have a patent for the application of heat to the making or bending of walking-sticks, that is the same sort of reasoning which was pressed ineffectually upon the court with reference to an invention for an improvement in navigation. [He referred to the screw-propeller.] It was said that the operation of a propelling power by presenting a screw surface to the action of the water was nothing new; that a screw-propeller was an instrument for advancing a ship in the water by presenting a screw surface to the water, and that it was like the action of a windmill with reference to the wind. That reasoning, however, did not succeed. If, having a particular purpose in view, you take the general principles of mechanics, and apply one or other of them to a manufacture to which it has never been before applied, that is a sufficient ground for taking out a patent, provided that the court sees that that which has been invented is new, desirable, and for the public benefit. A mere trifling matter, or thing of no value, will not do, inasmuch as the whole theory of the patent law is based upon the assumption that it is something of real value. You must show that you have invented something useful—a new and useful improvement in manufacture. Now, up to this time it is clear, from all the evidence, that nobody produced these sticks from sawn timber without any mark upon them. The course of proceeding with regard to ash twigs and other things of natural growth which would submit to twisting, was to subject them to a process which is well described in the answer of the defendants. It is this: "For some time previously to the plaintiff obtaining his said letters patent, we have been in the habit of using a vice for the purpose of holding the stick intended to be bent, and of bending a plant or shoot cut from a root, by drawing the same round a solid mandril." There seems to have been a plan when the plant was taken away from the root, of heating it in hot sand, so as to make it more susceptible of being bent, and then to secure it round a solid mandril without heating it; at all events, there was no charring heat which would produce that unseemly appearance which is found in some of those which have been exhibited before me. That being the case, the plaintiff says that his invention is an improved mode of bending wood, and has for its object to bend into a curve or hook shape the ends of sticks and canes suitable for walking-sticks and other articles here mentioned in which bent forms of wood are required. We shall presently see how he describes his process. Finding that the old process with regard to plants, ash plants, or shoots, was an awkward mode of working, he thought that they could be bent in a different way. The course was to draw the twig or force it round a post, and then to fasten it by a string so that the hook might be formed. And then it appears that he thought of another way of dealing with sawn timber in which case heat had been applied differently. No mandril, it would seem, had been applied to sawn timber. I take that from paragraph 12 of the defendants' answer, in which they say that "for the purpose of bending wood cut out of a plank we used a band of steel which was fitted at one end with a handle, and the other end secured to the vice; after pulling the stick round within the band of steel it was held in the required position by means of a piece of string or wire, and during the process of bending heat was applied externally to the stick, and to the band of steel for the purpose of hardening the fibres and making the same set in the required position." How? "By causing a jet of gas to be played upon the said steel band; and we say that this object of applying heat to sticks during the process of bending is to dry the fibres of the wood and cause them permanently to set, and not, as stated in the plaintiff's specification, to soften the fibres, as the same must, before this process of bending commences, be sufficiently softened in heated wet sand or otherwise by means of moist heat." That does not exactly give a true explanation of it, that it was heated by causing a jet of gas to be played upon the steel band; it was also on the other side of the band next to the wood with no mandril interposed, there was the steel band which gave it the curve, and you applied the heat both upon the steel band and the side next to the wood, keeping it in the required position by means of a piece of string or wire, and in that way you gave a curve to the stick. The plaintiff says, "My plan was to bind the thing round a mandril, and then to heat the mandril;" at least that is what he says in the argument at the bar. Instead of heating the steel band, although it may be that alone would not char the wood, or applying it to the steel bend on the one side and the wood on the other, I turned it or bent it round a mandril of iron instead of using a wooden post, and then I fixed it by a clamp and heated the mandril and so obtained the application of heat to the stick in a way which did not affect the wood by charring." That seems to have been one of the improvements which this invention was intended to effect. Now there appear to have been several experiments made with a view to the same object; and the very circumstance that experiments were made shows their desirableness. But I have far better evidence against the defendants, for it appears that in the month of February, 1865, they took out a licence from the plaintiff to use the machines in their trade. Now, I do not mean to say that binds them in any way, or that it operates by way of estoppel. They might have found it was not so useful or profitable as they thought it would be when they took out the licence; but they submitted to the inconvenience of making payments for the privilege, and they entered into covenants with reference to the use of the invention and the prices to be charged for articles bent by the apparatus. Now, that is a strong circumstance. It clearly shows that, unless to them it had not been a wholly new affair, they would never have submitted to make payment for the use of it, nor would they have subjected themselves to the restrictions and inconveniences imposed upon them by the covenants. [The V.C. then commented upon the evidence of prior user.] Then comes the question upon the patent itself. There were two objections made: first, that there was no novelty; and, secondly, that there was no infringement. Then, as regards the description of the invention, it was objected, first, that there is a description of a clamping apparatus, which they did say is perfectly old, and that there are other parts of the apparatus which were perfectly familiar to persons acquainted with such matters before the date of the plaintiff's patent, and that the apparatus was taken from others, Vidler, and other persons, [The V.C. here went into a comparison of the evidence upon these points, and continued:] Now, I do not forget the L.C.'s decision in the case of the sewing machine with regard to the distinction between a machine or apparatus entirely new, and one partly new and partly old. Where the whole thing is new he is not bound to describe and distinguish the different parts, but where, as in the case before the L.C., the invention consisted of a machine which was only an improvement upon an old machine, you must distinguish and describe all the parts which you claim as new. This is a new machine altogether for making walking-sticks and other articles. The plaintiff says that the principle of his machine is a new mode of applying heat to wood, and then he tells you how it is applied, namely, through a tube or mandril, which heat is transmitted to the stick by its being drawn into close contact therewith. I have got, therefore, an apparatus, a forming instrument, which is to be heated by the action of the fire, and then that heat is to be communicated to the wood. It appears to me, therefore, that this gentleman has described the process or apparatus sufficiently, and that it is novel. He says, "I claim with respect to my machine or apparatus a novel mode of applying heat in combination with a clamping apparatus. The latter may be as old as the hills, but my process cannot be carried into useful effect by your mode of doing it. I claim it as that which is proposed by applying heat through the medium of the mandril to the wood, and holding it by clamping apparatus." He says, as an obvious modification of the above described apparatus, a hollow chamber of suitable shape may be used as the "former," and heated by gas as described, and in place of the flexible band, a solid piece or block of metal of suitable form to be applied to the outside of the curved stick, and heated from the outside in any convenient manner. When the end or handle of the stick has remained sufficiently long in this bent position to receive a permanent set, it is released from the apparatus, and the operation may be repeated. These things are modifications of the apparatus. Having described his invention, and having explained the manner of carrying it into effect, he says, he claims the application of a flame derived from gas or other combustible fluid or liquid as described for softening the fibres of the wood. Perhaps, when you come to analyse it, it might better be expressed by saying simply "applying heat to soften the fibres of the wood," as he has stated in the previous part of his specification, where he says, my invention consists principally in a novel mode of applying heat to the wood for the purpose of softening its fibres, and then bending down the stick, and securing it in place by means of a clamp, and a flexible piece of metal. Now the mode of applying the heat is by means of the hollow mandril, and no doubt that is the best mode of getting it. What you have got to do is to heat the mould. He says, I heat my "former" or hollow mandril, and then he tells you his contrivance for doing so, which appears to him the best mode. It is open to the defendant to say, his is a better way: if so it is only an improvement upon it, of which he can avail himself hereafter. The principle of the plaintiff's invention is the application of heat through the medium of the hollow mandril, instead of applying it directly to the wood, and it appears to me that there is nothing erroneously stated in the plaintiff's patent or specification, and that the subject-matter is clear, and that in a mercantile sense it is a useful, valuable invention, as the defendants themselves have shown by taking out a licence from the plaintiff. That being the case, the plaintiff is entitled to be protected in the exercise of his right against any innovation of the defendants, however much it may be called an improvement. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to have an injunction granted and an account.

Decree accordingly.

DOWSELL v. REECE AND OTHERS.

Judgment-debt—Docketing—Puisne mortgage—Priorities—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110—2 & 3 Vict. c. 11.

JUDGMENT.—An old judgment of 1826 was on the 3rd May, 1854, duly registered under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. On the 6th June, 1854, the legal personal representatives of the party entitled to the debt in respect of which the judgment had been entered up revived the judgment. The judgment-debtor having come into possession of considerable real estate, mortgaged it on the 1st October, 1853, for an advance of 5,000l., and on the 6th June, 1854, charged all the property by three memoranda of that date with certain sums in favour of three relatives. On the 19th June, 1858, a suit was commenced by the parties entitled to the debt to redeem and foreclose, and for a sale:—Held, that the judgment-creditor, on bill filed by him against the first mortgagees and the puisne incumbrancers, was entitled to be paid the full amount of his judgment-debt in priority to the three incumbrancers.

This was a bill filed by Henry Doswell and Eliza, his wife, against William Reece and various other parties, claiming, under various securities granted by one John Ford, on his real estates and against his personal representative, to set aside certain mortgages as against the plaintiffs and Ford's other creditors, with an alternative prayer that, if the court should be of opinion that certain of the defendants, who were sub-mortgagees, were entitled to retain and be paid the amount secured to them, an account might be taken of the amounts due to them respectively, and that the premises remaining unsold might be sold in the usual way, and the proceeds applied in payment of the balance due to the plaintiffs on the security of a judgment recovered against Ford, and the costs, and of the balance due to the last-named defendants, if entitled thereto.

A decree was made in this suit, bearing date the 29th July, 1861, when so much of the bill was dismissed as sought to set aside the various mortgages and charges, and a sale of the property was directed.

The circumstances were these:

On the 22nd March, 1826, a judgment of the Court of King's Bench was signed under a warrant of attorney against John Ford for 3,600*l.* and 35*s.* costs, in an action of debt at the suit of John Louis Seward. This judgment was on the same day entered of record in the same court, and a memorial of the warrant of attorney and defeasance enrolled in Chancery.

The warrant of attorney was given as security for the payment of an annuity on a principal sum of 1,800*l.* on the 16th November, 1843.

Seward died on the 30th March, 1838, leaving a will, by which he appointed his wife Eliza executrix, who duly proved same on the 26th March, 1854.

She subsequently, on the 30th June, 1843, married the plaintiff, Henry Doswell.

On the 3rd May, 1854, the judgment not having been revived, was registered on behalf of the executors of Seward in the Common Pleas in the usual way.

On the 6th June, 1854, the plaintiffs revived the judgment against Ford, and on the 9th June it was re-registered, and again on the 30th April, 1859.

John Ford, the judgment-debtor, became entitled, in the year 1853, to considerable real estates, and recovered possession of them, they being of very considerable value.

On the 1st October, 1853, he mortgaged part of the property to Wm. Reece, to secure the sum of 5,000*l.* and interest. There was a transfer of this mortgage, and a further charge made on behalf of one Higgins, on the 7th October, 1854. By three memoranda of charge, dated respectively the said 6th June, 1854, Ford charged all his estates with certain sums in favour of E. B. Ford, E. Ford, and Sarah Ford.

Under the decree in the cause the properties had been sold.

By the chief clerk's certificate, dated the 6th February, 1865, it appeared that the existing incumbrances were, the sum of 1,030*l.* 19*s.*, due on the mortgage securities, dated the 1st and 7th October, 1853, and the sums of 1,695*l.*, 1,130*l.*, and 2,543*l.*, then due on the three memoranda, dated the 6th June, 1854, to Wm. Reece, C. M. Chamberlain, and Sarah Ford, and the sum of 3,881*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* due to the plaintiffs under the judgment of the 22nd March, 1826. As to the priorities, he found that 1,030*l.* 19*s.* was the first charge, and that the defendants W. Reece, C. M. Chamberlain, and Sarah Ford claimed to have priority over the judgment of the plaintiffs. He also certified that no evidence had been produced to shew that the defendants E. Ford, E. B. Ford, Wm. Reece, C. M. Chamberlain, and Sarah Ford, or either of them, had at the date of the memoranda of the 6th June, 1854, any notice of the judgment or the registration thereof, unless the entry in the register was to be deemed notice to them of such judgment.

The cause now came on for further consideration on the chief clerk's certificate, and the point raised was, whether the sums secured by the memoranda of the 6th June, 1854, was entitled to priority over the judgment-debt.

Willcock, Q.C., E. F. Smith, Q.C., and Druce, for the plaintiffs, contended that the registration of the old judgment under the 19th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, created a charge upon all the lands of the judgment-debtor, and was good against purchasers and mortgagees. The plaintiffs, having a charge on the 3rd May, 1854, it must necessarily take priority over the memoranda of the 6th June, 1854. They cited—

Chapman Barber for those defendants taking interest under the memoranda of June, 1854.—The judgment was not properly registered, such registration can only be made by a party to the judgment, and not by those who had become entitled to the debt by devolution of title. By the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, s. 5, also, these memoranda became definite charges on the land, and the parties to them became mortgagees. A sale having been made by order of the court did not at all affect the question. He cited—

July 4.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR took time to consider his judgment, and on this day, after stating the question raised before him, said:—The bill has been filed by the executor of a creditor on a very old judgment, to set aside certain securities given by the judgment-debtor on a large real estate which had accrued to him after the date of the judgment. At the hearing of the cause the bill was dismissed so far as those securities were sought to be set aside; but the bill concluded with a prayer in the alternative for an account of what was due to the plaintiffs and the holders of the other securities, and for a sale of the unsold portions of the estate. The case is therefore reduced to that of a judgment-creditor and a prior mortgage, the judgment-creditor asking for a sale. The first point made before me on the arguments was as to the registration of the judgment, and it was contended that, as at the time when it was registered the judgment-creditor was dead, therefore there had not been a due registration. Then it was contended that, if that were not so, yet the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11 expressly enacts that, though a judgment-debt be thus registered, it shall not, as against purchasers or mortgagees without notice, be held to be of any further force than it would have been independently of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; therefore it was argued and truly said, that as regards the subsequent creditors, they having been shown to have had no notice, it must stand on the footing of judgments as if the Act of 1 & 2 Vict. had not been passed, subject to certain conditions contained in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, and thereupon a double contest was raised: First, that as the judgment was never docketed, and the consequence of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 being out of the way, the plaintiffs stood in the position of a judgment-creditor under the old law, and was obliged to have his judgment docketed before it could affect land. That, however, does not appear to be tenable, for the reasons I shall presently state. It was then contended that, as in the case of Stileman v. Ashdown, the plaintiffs being judgment-creditors not having a charge on the land, by the effect of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, they could only be paid out of one moiety of the purchase-money, if they had originally filed this bill for a sale. As to the first question, it appears to me—indeed, I have no doubt upon the point—that the judgment was properly registered. The executor was entitled to prove and afterwards did prove the will, and caused the judgment to be registered, and what is required by the statute is simply registration, in order that notice may be given to all the world; and even if it had been an administrator instead of an executor, he would be entitled to adopt the agency of the person who had done this act for him, and such registration would stand good against all the world. The reason I mention that registration at all, notwithstanding the clause of the subsequent Act as to purchasers without notice, is this—the subsequent Act does provide for registration in this way: the 2nd section says, that as to all judgments already docketed and entered up under the provisions of the statute of William and Mary, none of them shall, after the 1st August, 1841, affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, except they are registered as prescribed by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Then sect. 5 of the subsequent Act says, that as against purchasers and mortgagees without notice of any such judgments as aforesaid, viz., those that are registered in the manner described by the Act, none of such judgments shall affect any lands otherwise, although duly registered, than a judgment of one of the Superior Courts aforesaid would have bound such purchaser or mortgagee before the Act of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, where it had been duly docketed according to the law then in force. That statute means that it substitutes the registration under the Act of the 1 & 2 Vict. for docketing; but then it says, that although registered, and although to be taken as docketed, yet nevertheless it shall have no effect as against purchasers or mortgagees without notice, beyond what a docketed judgment would have. The case of Stileman v. Ashdown was this: a single judgment-creditor came for himself alone simply to remove a legal obstacle to his having execution on his judgment. In that case the Court said, all it would do for the judgment-creditor was to remove out of his way the obstacles to enforcing his legal remedy. Lord Eldon, in the subsequent case of Burroughs v. Elton (11 Ves. 33), observes: "I have looked at the case of Stileman v. Ashdown, and the reporter represents Lord Hardwicke to have stated that where one judgment-creditor sues for satisfaction of his own debt against real assets, this court will give him no other execution than precisely what he would have had at law, viz., against a moiety. Then how do I know there is any other judgment or specialty creditor, in which case there is a different kind of satisfaction?" When you see that expanded afterwards, as Lord Cottenham puts it in Neate v. Duke of Marlborough, that whenever you come to administer assets, or have a sale of property to discharge incumbrances according to their priorities (I think there is no distinction), then, inasmuch as you could not sell without the concurrence of the judgment-creditor, and he not bound to stir a step until his debt is paid, you then satisfy the judgment-creditor for the whole amount of his debt out of the whole of the assets, because he stands in priority to those who are claiming the assets the produce of the sale, and there could be no sale without his concurrence. That also is the case of Tunstall v. Tapps (3 Sim. 286), and it seems to have been founded on this: that the judgment-creditor had a right to come to this court to redeem, and when he came to the court for that purpose, there being a prior mortgage, he redeemed that mortgage, and then you could not get back the estate without redeeming the whole of his judgment-debt as well as the mortgage which he had redeemed. In the last edition of Seton on Decrees I find a decree of the year 1745. In that case a bill was filed by a judgment-creditor and her trustee against the first mortgagee and the mortgagor with foreclosure over. The decree is in this form:—"The judgment-creditor redeems the first mortgage, and thereupon he is not to be redeemed by those coming afterwards without payment of what he has paid the first mortgagee and the whole of his judgment-debt." If the bill in the present case had been framed in the alternative for redemption and foreclosure, it would have been exactly that case. But, instead of that, all parties seem to have thought it desirable that at the hearing a sale should have been decreed. There was a prior mortgagee who was to be satisfied; then there was the judgment-creditor; then the holders of the other securities in their order of date. That being so, if foreclosure had been directed, the decree would have been exactly like that to which I have alluded. In principle, the sale can make no substantial difference. Lord Cottenham, in Tunstall v. Tapps, puts it upon its proper footing, that where you have to distribute assets, the proceeds of a sale of real estate, the judgment-creditor should first be paid in full. I must therefore hold that the plaintiffs' claim, and the amount found due to them, has priority over the sums secured by the memoranda of the 6th June, 1854.

Order accordingly.

In this case purchase-money of lands belonging to a female infant and taken by a railway company had been paid into court, and invested in Consols. The lady, now of age and married, joined with her husband in petitioning for payment of the fund out of court to the husband. A question, however, arose whether the above transaction had not constituted the infant a ward of court.

Dissenting chapel—Independents—Particular Baptists—Change of doctrine—Trust-deed—Construction.

CHARITY.—Under the deed of endowment, a certain chapel was "to be used and enjoyed as a place of public religious worship for the service of God by the society of Protestant Dissenters of the denomination of Independents, and professing the doctrines contained in the Catechism of the Assembly of Divines held at Westminster, and commonly called the 'Assembly's Catechism,' and also by such other persons as should thereafter be united to the said society, and attend the worship of God in the said meeting-house."

Several years after the date of the deed the surviving trustee and the congregation of the chapel converted the nature of their religious worship into that of the "Particular Baptists":—Held, that the use of the chapel must be restored to those professing the original Independent doctrines, the trustee removed, and new trustees appointed.

This was a suit instituted to determine the question whether, under the terms of a deed of trust, dated in 1824, which endowed the chapel of Colerne, near Box, in the county of Wilts, any persons other than the denomination of Nonconformists termed "Independents" were eligible to occupy or possess the chapel.

In 1851 the defendant, who was the sole surviving trustee of the deed of 1824, and the whole of the then existing congregation, totally altered the character of their religious worship, which they converted into that of the "Particular Baptists."

The information therefore prayed that Mr. Aust might be removed from the office of trustee of the chapel, and that new trustees might be appointed.

The material words of the deed of 1824, so far as related to the nature of the intended worship, were that the chapel was "to be used and enjoyed as a place of public religious worship for the service of God by the society of Protestant Dissenters of the denomination of Independents, and professing the doctrines contained in the Catechism of the Assembly of Divines held at Westminster, and commonly called the 'Assembly's Catechism,' and also by such other persons as shall hereafter be united to the said society, and attend the worship of God in the said meeting-house."

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I entertain hardly any doubt upon the principal question in this case. The general principle applicable to these cases is clearly laid down in The Attorney-General v. Gould, and in several other cases, and it is, that it is the duty of the court to ascertain in the first instance the nature of the religious worship intended at the time of the origin of the chapel, and as it is very often impossible to ascertain this with certainty, from the absence of any instrument of endowment, or from the words of such instrument being ambiguous, that the court must then resort to the usage of the congregation in order to discover what these doctrines were. But if, on the other hand, from there being an actual deed of endowment, or from the fact that such a deed had existed being proved, the court has discovered the nature of the original doctrines and worship, it will maintain the worship prescribed by the original endowment. It appears to me that, in the present instance, the language of the deed is clear from all reasonable doubt. There is no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion with respect to what is meant by "Independents" in the deed. They are defined to be those who hold the doctrines laid down in the Catechism of the Assembly. But, as we find to be the case with the Church of England, some members hold more strongly than others what are termed Calvinistic doctrines. In the Catechism of Assembly, Calvinistic doctrines are laid down very strongly, and from that fact there is not much difficulty in determining what class of persons are referred to. The deed expressly says, that they are to profess the doctrines laid down by the Assembly of Divines held at Westminster, and we have then the class clearly defined by reference to the doctrines which they are to profess. The deed, however, continues, "and also by such other persons as shall hereafter be united to the said society, and attend the worship of God in the said meetinghouse." Two classes may here be included: first, Independents who agree with the catechism; and, secondly, persons not of that class, nor Independents, but persons who may happen to sit in the chapel and join in the worship. It would, however, be extraordinary to attribute to the persons who framed this deed such a meaning as to include within the objects of the trust this latter class of persons. The word "united" does not mean sitting in the same chapel, or joining in acts of worship, but it is used in the sense of holding communion with each other. The deed refers to persons who have a community of doctrine, and to persons who, though they are not now members of the society, may afterwards become united to it. The next question for consideration is, whether, if the congregation have usurped the use of the chapel and introduced doctrines not in accordance with those contained in the Catechism of Assembly, the court will take steps to restore the chapel to its original use. In 1851 a majority of the congregation met together, and plainly agreed (there being no subterfuge or theological discussion introduced into the pleadings or argument) that they would then establish a new church, and they also agreed that they would, of their own authority, establish new doctrines. They denied the propriety of baptism by mere sprinkling, and insisted on total immersion. Under these circumstances it is clear that the court must restore the chapel to the Independents, viz., to those professing the original Independent doctrines, and there must, therefore, be a declaration according to the prayer of the bill. As to costs, it is hard upon Mr. Aust to make him bear personally the costs of the suit; but the congregation have, in fact, excluded the rightful owners, and the common rule must prevail.

Re WOODBURN'S TRUST.

13 L. T. 237.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845—Payment out of court—Costs by a company—Title.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Where it is doubtful under a testator's will whether a good title to the premises taken by a joint-stock company can be made out, and there is no wilful default or delay on the part of the owner of the premises, the Court being called upon to put a construction upon such a will, the company, on the application of the owner to obtain out of court the purchase-money agreed to be paid for the land, was ordered to pay the costs according to their Act.

This was a petition by a Mr. Woodburn, the owner of some land and premises, situate at Dalton, in the county of Lancaster, which had been agreed to be taken and purchased by the Furness Gas and Waterworks Company under their Act of 1854, in which was incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, and the amount of such purchase paid into court by them, to have a sum of 1591l. 5s. paid out to him, and that the company might pay the costs incurred in consequence of such purchase and the application.

John Fell, by his will, dated the 24th December, 1833 (inter alia), directed—

That a valuation should be made by the trustees or trustee for the time being acting in the execution of his said will in such manner as he or they should think fit, of all the real and personal estate and effects thereafter demised and bequeathed as soon as might be after his decease. And that if he should have any son who should attain his age of twenty-one years, or die under that age leaving issue surviving him the testator, and he the testator should on such event have any other son, or the issue of any other son, then living, all the real estates and so much as should consist of leasehold hereditaments of the personal estate, should be divided by the said trustees for the time being into as many divided allotments of equal value as nearly as possible according to a valuation to be made thereof at that time by the said trustees as the testator should have sons then living, or who should have previously died leaving issue then living, and that one of the said shares should be allotted to the said trustees for each of his (the testator's) sons then alive or who have previously died leaving issue then living, and that the only one or each of his said sons who then should have attained twenty-one years should have the devise, according to seniority, of the share to be allotted to him. And the testator devised all the freehold hereditaments of or to which he or any person in trust for him was seised or entitled, or of which in exercise of any power he was entitled to dispose (except mortgage and trust estates), to the use of the trustees for the term of 500 years, upon certain trusts therein expressed (which became unnecessary and incapable of taking effect), and after the determination of the said term, and in the meantime subject thereto and to the trusts thereof, to the uses therein mentioned and set forth, viz.: as to the whole thereof, if he should have one son who should attain twenty-one years, and if no other son should attain that age, or die under that age leaving issue who should attain that age (in case he should leave more than one such son), as to each divided share thereof—so allotted for every son who should attain twenty-one years, to the use of each such son in fee; and as to the whole thereof, if he (the testator) should have a son who should die under the age of twenty-one years leaving issue who should attain that age, and no other son who should attain that age, or die under that age leaving issue who should attain twenty-one years, or in case he should have more than one son who should attain twenty-one years, or die under that age, leaving issue who should attain that age, as to each undivided share thereof so allotted for every son who should die under twenty-one years leaving issue, to the use of the issue respectively.

The will then contained a direction to raise for each daughter attaining twenty-one or marrying, a portion equal in value to one-half of the average value of the son's share in the real and leasehold estates, and subject thereto the residuary personalty was given among the children equally, except the elder son, who was to have a double share if one-half of such average value should amount to 4,000*l.* or more; but should the residuary personalty not produce as much for each daughter, then a charge was made upon the real estate and secured by a term of 500 years, in order to make up the daughters' shares to 4,000*l.* or so much more as the one-half of each son's shares of the freeholds and leaseholds should amount to. It then contained a proviso that if the freehold, leasehold, and personal estate should not produce a portion for each of the testator's children amounting to 4,000*l.*, then the freehold, leasehold, and residuary personal estate was directed to be divided equally between all the children.

The Furness Gas and Water Company, on the abstract being forwarded to them, objected to the title, contending that having regard to the amount of the testator's residuary personal estate (with which they had been furnished), his real and leasehold estates, and personal estate, ought not to have been divided and allotted in the manner which the executors had adopted, and that under the powers contained in the will such several estates ought to have been sold and converted, and the proceeds divided equally amongst all the testator's children, male and female, who attained the age of twenty-one years, and that thus a good title was not made.

Wm. Pearson (Rolt, Q.C., with him), in support of the petition, contended that, upon a fair construction of the will, what had been done under it was justified by the powers contained therein. He referred to—Re Sterry's Estate, 3 W. Rep. 561. Stalliers of Sunderland, 1 Drew, 184. and Sects. 76, 77, 78, 79, and 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

F. Currey, for the company, contended that, a good title not having been shown, the company ought not, therefore, to pay the costs of the application, &c.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after quoting the words of the will, said that the language of it was extremely confused, and that it was very difficult to get at what the testator really meant as to the division of this property. An idea seemed to have impressed itself upon his mind that, wishing that all his children should take equal shares, but that the minimum of his daughters' shares should be 4,000*l.* each, and feeling that it might happen that all might not have equally, he had inserted the proviso which was to be found at the end of the will. But, although not clear what he did mean, he could not have meant that the whole should be sold and the proceeds divided equally, as the company had contended. He saw no reason to say that any wilful neglect to make out the title had been shown by the petitioner, and therefore the company must pay the costs according to the terms of their Act of Parliament.

Order accordingly.

BOUNDY AND OTHERS v. HEATON AND OTHERS.

Goods sold and delivered—Change in firm of purchasers—Continuing contract—Partnership—Statute of Frauds.

ASSIGNMENT. CONTRACT.—The defendants contracted in writing with the first-named plaintiff to supply him with all the brass ashes produced at their mill at a certain fixed price, the ashes being agreed to be equal to a certain sample. Some ashes were delivered under this contract, and then the said plaintiff took the co-plaintiffs into partnership, and ashes were delivered by the defendants to the new firm without any new or special contract. Neither the ashes supplied before the formation of the new partnership nor those supplied afterwards were equal to sample, and the plaintiffs commenced an action to recover damages in respect of the breach of agreement:—Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover in respect of the deliveries of ashes which took place prior to the formation of the new partnership, but that they could do so in respect of those which took place afterwards, on the principle that those deliveries took place in pursuance of a new contract made with the new firm on the same terms as the old contract with the one plaintiff, and that the requisitions of the Statute of Frauds with respect to this new contract being satisfied by the part delivery, the old written contract might be looked at to prove that the sale was of ashes equal to sample.

This case was tried before Shee, J., at Cardiff, at the Summer Assizes for Glamorganshire.

The declaration stated a contract between the plaintiffs and defendants for the supply of brass ashes by the defendants to the plaintiffs according to a sample shown to the plaintiffs, and alleged that the brass ashes delivered had not been according to sample.

The first and second pleas respectively traversed the making of the contract, and alleged that the goods were equal to sample; and the third plea alleged that the goods were not bought by the plaintiffs, or sold and delivered by the defendants under and by virtue of the alleged contract.

It was proved at the trial, that in November, 1864, a sample of brass ashes was sent by the defendants to the plaintiff William Boundy, who was then trading alone, and he agreed to buy, at a fixed price of 30*s.* per ton, all the brass ashes from the defendants' mill, provided they were equal to sample. The contract was contained in letters which passed between William Boundy and the defendants. Quantities of brass ashes were accordingly delivered from time to time during December, 1864. On the 1st January, 1865, William Boundy took into partnership Charles Boundy and John William Hughes, the other two plaintiffs, and he notified this fact to the defendants. Early in 1865, William Boundy paid for the brass ashes supplied up to the end of 1864, complaining at the time of the quality. Brass ashes were delivered to the new firm from time to time in 1865, up to the end of March, and the demand for payment being met by complaints of quality, the defendants commenced an action against the plaintiffs for the price, and the plaintiffs paid the amount. The present action was then brought to recover damages for the inferiority of the ashes delivered to sample, both in 1864 and 1865. It was contended by the defendants at the trial that the contract to sell according to sample was made with William Boundy, and not with the new firm, who were the plaintiffs in the present action, and that there was no continuing contract with the plaintiffs that the ashes should be according to sample; and that there was no written contract with the plaintiffs satisfying the Statute of Frauds.

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 44*l.* damages in respect of the goods supplied, both in 1864 and 1865; the defendants having leave to move to enter a verdict for them; the court having power to draw inferences of fact.

H. Giffard, Q.C. (G. B. Hughes with him) moved accordingly.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that there should be no rule provided the defendants will consent to give up that portion of the damages which is in respect of the delivery of goods below sample previous to the 1st January, 1865. There was a written contract entered into in 1864 under which the defendants were bound to deliver brass ashes equal in quality to a certain sample, and the plaintiff William Boundy was bound to pay for it at the rate of 30*s.* per ton. The first and all subsequent deliveries ought to have been assumed by the jury to have been made under this written contract. The defendants have the advantage of the change made in the plaintiffs' firm on the 1st January, 1865. At law a contract cannot be assigned, and the new firm was a new contracting party able to sue only on contracts made by themselves. I am of opinion, however, that the plaintiffs have the benefit of the written contract entered into by William Boundy, so far as regards all ashes delivered after the 1st January, 1865, on the principle of law, that if there is a course of business with a firm, and new partners come in, and the business is continued without anything said about a change in the terms of it, a jury ought to assume that the old terms were to go on, unless some statute intervenes. No statute intervenes here, because there has been not only a partial delivery, but a total delivery of the goods to the defendants. The plaintiffs have a right, therefore, to say that the contract as to the quality continued binding on the defendants. It is ascertained as a fact that the goods were not according to sample, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to retain their verdict for damages in respect of deliveries made after the formation of the new firm.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Between the old firm and the defendants there was a contract in writing contained in certain letters. So soon as goods were delivered in pursuance of the contract the operation of the Statute of Frauds was excluded, and the letters became distinct evidence that the goods were purchased according to sample. Then came a change in the firm. If the firm had had a corporate capacity, it would have been able to sue both in respect of the old and new transactions. But there is a rule of law preventing the assignment of choses in action, and precluding us from dealing with the matter as if the firms were identical. Therefore the new firm cannot recover damages in respect of the goods supplied before the 1st January, 1865. But for goods supplied after that date there is no difficulty with the case, as that of the new firm entitled to recover in respect of a new contract entered into with them. The transactions must be taken to have been of a similar character to the previous transactions, the letters which passed in November showing the terms of the contract, and the Statute of Frauds being excluded by the part delivery.

BYLES and KEATING, JJ., concurred.

Rule refused, provided the plaintiffs agreed to a reduction of the damages; otherwise rule absolute.

EDMONDS v. LEWER.

13 L. T. 248; 11 Jur. N.S. 911.

Practice—Will—Custody of—Rule of the Prerogative Court—Testatrix and attesting witnesses—Marks-people—Costs.

WILL.—Where a party opposing a will has given notice that he merely insists upon the will being proved in solemn form of law, and only intends to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of it, he may on the eve of the trial recall such notice, and substitute another expressive of his intention to produce, if necessary, witnesses on the trial of the cause. But, in such event, the hearing will be adjourned if the party propounding the will desire it.

The testatrix and attesting witnesses were all three marks-people, and the will after execution was handed by the testatrix to the plaintiff, who retained the custody of it. He was executor and principal legatee, and he propounded the will three years after her death.

The Court not being satisfied with the proof, refused probate, but declined to condemn the plaintiff in costs, notwithstanding grave circumstances of suspicion with which the case was surrounded.

This was a suit to establish the validity of a paper writing, dated 11th April, 1854, as the will of Louisa Edwards, widow.

Dr. Twiss, Q.C. (with him Clarkson), for the plaintiff, the executor and principal legatee.

Dr. Tristram, for the defendant, niece and next of kin of the testatrix.

The defendant gave notice, in the progress of the suit, that she merely insisted upon the will being proved in solemn form of law, and only intended to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of it. On the 31st October the cause standing in the list for trial on the 3rd November, the second day in term, but the first of the sitting of the court, she withdrew the same, and gave a second notice that she would, if necessary, produce witnesses on the trial of the cause. The Judge Ordinary ruled that she was not entitled to do so if it put the plaintiff to any detriment, and that he would, in consequence, if the plaintiff desired it, allow further time for the trial. The plaintiff elected to proceed.

The testatrix, Louisa Edwards, a widow, made the acquaintance of the plaintiff in the lifetime of her husband, and continued it after his death.

She occupied a room adjoining his in the house in which he lodged, and, as he alleged, she being then unwell requested him, in the month of January, 1854, to make a will for her. He did so. The will appointed him executor, and also gave him the bulk of the property, which was estimated at between 300*l.* and 400*l.* The testatrix, who was unable to write, made her signature by three marks. Five or six hours afterwards, a person of the name of Charles Tubbs, who described himself as a soldier in the second battalion of the Coldstream Guards, but who at the time was not in uniform, was called in at the instance of testatrix, who sent a messenger for him, and he attested the will also by mark. The testatrix kept the will. The plaintiff shortly afterwards joined H.M. ship Miranda as one of the carpenter's crew. The testatrix visited him at Sheerness while the ship was in dock, and having learned in the interval that the will had not been properly executed, took the opportunity, on the 11th April, 1854, to cure the defect by acknowledging her signature in the presence of two witnesses who subscribed their marks in attestation of it. She then delivered the will to the plaintiff, who shortly afterwards sailed for the Crimea, and he retained the custody of it (keeping it, as he alleged, in his pocket all the while) until his return to England in 1858, when he endeavoured to obtain probate of it. The attesting witnesses were then both dead, one having been shot in the White Sea in July, 1854, and the other having died of fever in July, 1855. The testatrix died in January, 1855. The intelligence reached the plaintiff through an advertisement in the newspapers, which was inserted for the purpose of ascertaining whether she had left a will, and he thereupon sent home a copy of it from Malta.

In support of the will the plaintiff, whose evidence was to the effect above stated, called three witnesses. One, who had been master-at-arms on board the Miranda, stated that he was present in the dockyard loft when the will was executed (according to the plaintiff's affidavit, the only persons present were the attesting witnesses and himself); that the plaintiff showed it to him while the ink was wet on the paper, and that he subsequently saw it with him at Malta. The second, a legatee in the will for the sum of 5*l.*, declared that he heard the testatrix say that Edmonds (the plaintiff) would have the management of her affairs after her death, and that none of her relations should have her property; and the third, the father of the last witness, recollected having written a letter for the testatrix to Sheerness, and having heard her say that she had been at Sheerness; but he specified no time. This was the only evidence offered to establish the identity of the testatrix with the woman who executed the will at Sheerness. The little girl, the messenger who was sent to fetch Charles Tubbs, and who was named for a small legacy in the will, is now dead, but the only evidence of the fact was the statement of the plaintiff. On the other hand it was proved, on the part of the defendant, that there was no such person as Charles Tubbs, in 1854, in the second battalion of the Coldstream Guards.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—There are some circumstances of suspicion in this case at which I shall glance, but I wish at the outset to point out that the court has not on this occasion to pronounce an opinion that this is a fraud. The court is not bound to come to the conclusion whether or no a fraud has been committed. The property of this deceased woman would, by law, devolve on her relations, and the onus is cast upon those who would interfere with that devolution of property by means of a will, of proving to the satisfaction of the court that that will really was executed. That is the question, and the only question, which is before me to-day. And without, therefore, deciding upon the question, and without proposing to come to any conclusion, aye or no, that a fraud has been committed in this case, I shall address myself to the more narrow issue, whether or not enough has been laid before the court to warrant it in saying that this paper was the duly executed will of Louisa Edwards. Now, it is a will written from first to last in the handwriting of the man who takes, subject to some small legacies, the whole of her property. It was carried about by him, according to his own account, for four years in his pocket. The woman died in 1855, and it is now propounded in 1865. It is true that it contains the marks of three witnesses; but all the witnesses, as well as the testatrix, are supposed to have been marks-people, and, as I said before, we have no writing upon it, except that of the person who is to take the benefit. That is a matter alone which ought to make the court extremely wary and cautious how it allows probate. There was a rule in the Prerogative Court which, like most of the rules that governed the proceedings of that court, was founded in excellent good sense, and that was, that the custody of a will was a most material matter for consideration; and when a will did not come from the proper custody, either of the deceased or his agent, the court was most unwilling to grant probate, even where there was the circumstance that the testator's handwriting might be proved by competent witnesses. I think they went too far to say that a will not coming from proper custody, or from satisfactory custody, should not be admitted to probate, even though the handwriting were proved, unless there appeared adminicular circumstances that would eke it out. What custody does this will come from? From the pocket of the man who is benefited chiefly by it. Therefore it becomes the court to be wary. What is the proof of execution? When this will was first propounded in 1858, an affidavit was made by the plaintiff intending to show that Charles Tubbs had been present at the time when the testatrix put her mark on the paper. That was a positive oath, not made in a hurry, but made three years after the woman's death, and made for the purpose of obtaining probate of this will, though I quite agree that, from other parts of the affidavit, it is quite plain that the execution alone was known not to be sufficient; but still the affidavit was made at a time when the circumstance must have been comparatively fresh in the recollection of the plaintiff. In the same affidavit he states that the only persons present at the execution of the will on the 11th April, 1854, besides the testatrix, were the attesting witnesses, Richard Knight, King Marshall, and himself; and yet, to-day, seven years after that was sworn, he produces a man who says that he was not only in the room at the time, but that the plaintiff actually came to him immediately after, and, while the ink was wet on the paper, showed him the execution, and that Edmonds had asked him to get leave from the captain to stay over time in the loft in order that they might attest the will. The court finds great difficulty in understanding how, if that account is true, the plaintiff, when he made the affidavit, could have thought that only those persons whom he specified were present. That is another circumstance of suspicion. Now as to the execution. With regard to the first so-called execution, it is not contended that the execution was a valid one; but notwithstanding all these matters of suspicion, if the court could be satisfied that Mrs. Edwards was at Sheerness at the time stated, and that she was the person who was present when this will was executed, then, notwithstanding these circumstances of suspicion, I do not know that I should feel at liberty to disregard the oath of the master-at-arms. For aught I know he is a perfectly respectable man, and I am daily bound to believe the testimony of such persons; but there the evidence all fails. If this is a forgery, nothing would have been easier than to bring any woman from the town of Sheerness into the loft, who might represent herself as Mrs. Edwards, and to get two of his messmates to attest her signature. He is bound to show and to satisfy the court that the woman who professes to execute the will was the testatrix. At present there is no such evidence, except the oath of the plaintiff who has been contradicted as to what took place on each of the two executions. That cannot be got over. It is enough to say that the evidence fails, and that the issue is not made out. I pass by the further evidence of the defendant, that there was no such person as Charles Tubbs in the second battalion of the Coldstream Guards at that time. One cannot understand why, if there was such a person, he should represent himself as in the second battalion of the Coldstream Guards if he was not so, and that he did so represent himself we have the oath of the plaintiff who wrote it down. It is not so much upon the circumstances of suspicion such as they are that the court refuses probate, as upon the failure of that proof which the court is bound to call for before it gives probate of a will.

Dr. Tristram.—And as to costs?

Sir J. P. WILDE.—I don't think I ought to make any order as to costs. If I were satisfied conclusively, one way or the other, upon the issue, it might be otherwise, but as it is I do not think I ought to make any order.

Probate refused.—No order as to costs.

Nov. 6, 1865.

Re BULLEY'S TRUST ESTATE.

13 L. T. 264; 11 Jur. N.S. 847.

Will—Construction—Vesting—Remoteness.

PERPETUITY.—The testator gave a fund to the trustees for his daughter for life, for her husband for life, and after the deaths of both he directed that the fund should be paid to all the children of his said daughter as soon as they should arrive or come to the age of twenty-two respectively, and not to go to his, her, or their heirs or assigns, but that the share of any child dying before twenty-two should go amongst the others of them who might arrive at that age; and if any child should die under twenty-two after the deaths of his (the testator's) daughter and her husband, he directed that only the interest should be paid or applied for his benefit until he should have arrived at the age of twenty-two. Only one child survived both the parents and lived to attain twenty-two:—Held (by Knight Bruce, L. J., upon principle and authority, and by Turner, L. J., upon the expressions of the will), that the gift was void for remoteness, and that the fund was distributable amongst the next of kin.

This was a petition of appeal, presented by George Bulley Hayward, against a decision of Stuart, V.C., upon the construction of the will of George Bulley, the testator in the matter.

By that instrument the testator gave the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell, dispose of, and convert the same into money, and to invest the same in their names, and to pay the interest, dividends, and annual income thereof to his daughter Mary, the wife of Leonard Hayward, for life, and after her death to the said Leonard Hayward for his life, and the will then contained the following passage:—

And from and after the decease of my said daughter, and her said husband, my will is, and I hereby direct, that the said moneys so vested in the names of my said trustees, or the survivor of them, or the executor or administrator of such survivor, shall be by him or them paid to all and every the surviving child or children lawfully begotten on the body of my said daughter, share and share alike, as soon as they shall arrive or come to the age of twenty-two years respectively, and not to go to his, her, or their heirs or assigns, or to any other person or persons on any pretence whatever; that is to say, the share of each child which may happen to die after the death of the said Mary Hayward and Leonard Hayward, and before it shall arrive at the age of twenty-two years, shall go amongst the other child or children who may arrive at the age of twenty-two years, share and share alike; and if any one or more of the said children so begotten as aforesaid should happen to die under the age of twenty-two years after the death of the said Mary Hayward and Leonard Hayward, then and in such case my will is, and I hereby direct, that only the interest or yearly produce of the share or shares of such child or children shall be paid to him, her, or them, or for his, her, or their use and benefit, until each shall arrive or come to the age of twenty-two years respectively.

Mary Hayward, the testator's daughter, died in April of the present year, having survived her husband. There were six children of the marriage, but of these one only, George Bulley Hayward, survived his mother and lived to attain the age of twenty-two years.

The original petition was presented by a lady named Anne Bagnell, who was one of the co-heiresses-at-law, and also one of the next of kin of the testator, and its object was to have it declared that the gift to the children of Mrs. Hayward was void for remoteness, and that the fund representing the testator's real and personal estate was undisposed of by the will, and that she was entitled to a share thereof.

The learned V.C. was of that opinion, and declared accordingly, and Mr. George Bulley Hayward now appealed against that decision.

Charles Hall and Dickins, for the applicant, referred to Bull v. Pritchard, 1 Russ. 213; Vawdry v. Geddes, 1 Russ. & My. 203; Bland v. Williams, 3 Myl. & K. 411; Taylor v. Frobisher, 5 De G. & Sm. 191; Davies v. Fisher, 5 Beav. 201; Taylor v. Bacon, 8 Sim. 100; Hammond v. Maule, 1 Coll. 281; Re Hart's Trusts, 3 De G. & J. 195; Sturgess v. Pearson, 4 Madd. 411; Re Baxter's Trusts, 10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 487; Hardcastle v. Hardcastle, 1 Hem. & M. 405; s.c. 7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 503; Milroy v. Milroy, 14 Sim. 48; Watson v. Hayes, 5 Myl. & Cr. 125; 1 Jarm. on Wills (3rd ed.) 813.

Malins, Q.C., Dickinson, and Rudge, for the respondent, contended that there was no gift to the children of Mrs. Hayward, except the gifts contingently on their attaining the age of twenty-two years, and this was obviously void for remoteness. They referred to—Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 363; Taylor v. Frobisher, 5 De G. & Sm. 191; Russel v. Buchanan, 7 Sim. 628; Festing v. Allen, 10 M. & W. 279; Batsford v. Kebbell, 3 Ves. 363; Milroy v. Milroy, 14 Sim. 48; Hart's Trusts, 3 De G. & J. 195; Davies v. Fisher (ubi supra), overruled in effect the case of Vawdry v. Geddes (ubi supra), but it was contrary to all the other authorities.

Bevir for the trustees of the will.

Charles Hall having been heard in reply,

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said, that in his opinion there would be no reasonable ground for argument in the present case, upon the nature of the bequest in favour of the children of the testator's daughter, but for the provision for the payment of the interest accruing after her death, so long as any of her children should continue under the age of twenty-two, of the share or shares of the child or children so circumstanced. If that provision were absent there could be no rational ground for the contention of the applicants, considering the principles of this court and the state of the authorities. Did that clause import any intention in favour of a vested interest of the capital or any part of it? In his opinion, it did not. The clause was, he thought, inserted merely for the sake of greater caution; but the only intention as to vesting that it expressed was that nothing should vest under twenty-two, and the will must for the present purpose be read and construed as if that provision were not contained in it at all. A great number of authorities had been cited upon each side; and although he did not complain of this, he thought that two of them were sufficient to decide this case, he meant the cases of Leake v. Robinson and Vawdry v. Geddes. Having regard to these, and he repeated to principle also, it must be decided that there was no vesting of the capital at all, and that the whole of the gifts contained in the will subsequent to the life-estates to Mrs. Hayward and her husband were void. for remoteness. The decision of the V.C. was perfectly correct, and it would be confirmed by their Lordships.

Lord Justice TURNER said that he was of the same opinion. He thought that the case might well be disposed of upon its own circumstances and the expressions which the will itself contained. After considering the phraseology of the will, his Lordship added that he did not say that the case of Batsford v. Kebbell was absolutely decisive of the present appeal, but it had certainly a very important bearing upon it. He, however, preferred to rest his decision upon the language of the particular will.

Malins, Q.C., said that his client had not only no desire to have the appeal dismissed with costs, but he was ready to allow the costs of all parties to come out of the estate.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 9, 1865.

FEAVER v. WILLIAMS.

13 L. T. 270; 11 Jur. N.S. 902.

Production of documents by solicitor—Solicitor and client—Documents of deceased client—Draft of a proposed bill settled by counsel.

DISCOVERY.—Where a bill was filed, charging a solicitor with fraud, and where a deceased client, of whom there was no legal personal representative before the court, was also included in the charge:—Held, on a motion for the production of documents, that all those bearing on the transaction, whether belonging to the solicitor or his client, must be produced.

On a motion for the production of documents:—Held, that a draft of a proposed bill in Chancery, settled by counsel, was a privileged communication.

This was a motion for the production of a large number of documents connected with the above suit.

The suit itself was instituted for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that the will of a Mrs. Catherine Loftus had not really been executed by her, and that it was fraudulent and void as against the parties entitled on her death to the property purported to be devised by it.

The bill alleged that the solicitor in whose possession the documents now were was a party to the fraud, and also that a deceased client, many of whose papers were in the hands of the solicitor, was concerned in committing it. Among the documents which the plaintiff desired the defendant to produce was a draft copy of a proposed bill in Chancery, settled by counsel.

Everitt, in support of the motion, contended that on a charge of fraud the professional character of a solicitor could not be set up as an argument for the non-production of the documents. There was no legal personal representative of the deceased client who could be brought before the court, and he therefore asked that the solicitor on behalf of his client might be ordered to produce the documents in question. He referred to Charlton v. Coombes (4 Giff. 372). He also referred to—

for the purpose of proving that communications between co-defendants were not privileged.

Eddis, for the defendant, submitted that he could not produce the documents without neglecting the interests of his client: it was a mere professional difficulty that had to be overcome; personally he had no objection whatever to their production.

Ferrars for other parties.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—As the bill charges the solicitor with fraud, and as, moreover, no personal representative of his deceased client has been brought before the court, there must be an order for the production of documents generally, whether those of the solicitor or of his deceased client, which may in any way be calculated to throw light on the transaction in question. But as I can see no distinction in principle between a draft copy of a proposed bill, settled by counsel, and a counsel's opinion, I shall not order that document to be produced.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 10, 1865.

CROWTHER v. EVANS.

13 L. T. 271; 11 Jur. N.S. 902.

Will—Construction—Surviving daughter.

WILL.—Testator by his will left a gift over to "surviving daughters":—Held, that "surviving" must be read as "other daughters," upon which construction the children of two deceased daughters enjoyed the benefit of the shares of all the other daughters who died subsequently without leaving issue.

The question in this case, which arise on the construction of a will, was as follows:

The testator directed that in the event of either of his daughters dying without leaving issue at her decease, then the share and interest of such daughter should survive and go to and be enjoyed by his "surviving daughters." The testator then went on to extend the above direction to accruing shares.

There were five daughters, two of whom died leaving issue, the other three died subsequently without leaving issue, and the question which now came before the court, on petition, was as to whether the shares of the three sisters should go to the issue of the two who had died previously to them.

Bacon, Q.C. and Graham Hastings for the petitioners, the grandchildren.

Freeling, on behalf of the representatives of those daughters who died without issue, contended that it was the intention of the testator that the share of each daughter should at her decease go to the surviving daughter absolutely.

Waller appeared for other parties.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—I consider that the word "surviving" must be read as "other." Upon that construction the whole of the property will go to the issue in moieties; that is, one moiety to each family of grandchildren.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 10, 1865.

ST. PAUL v. HEATH.

13 L. T. 271; 11 Jur. N.S. 903.

Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98), s. 2.—Accumulations.

ACCUMULATIONS.—Testator by his will give the income of a share to his granddaughter, and the corpus, at her decease, to her children on their respectively attaining twenty-one. By a codicil he directed, in an event which happened, that the gift to the granddaughter was to be revoked, the income to be accumulated, and the accumulations to be "considered as part of the original fund from which the same arose, and thenceforth to be added thereto":—Held, though more than twenty-one years had elapsed, that the case did not fall within the Thellusson Act, and that all the children of the granddaughter were entitled during her life to have the accumulations of income added to the corpus.

The question in this case had reference to the Thellusson Act.

The facts were as follows:

John Keen by his will, dated the 12th November 1842, after certain other directions as to his property, gave to his executors a sum of 25,000*l.* upon trust, inter alia, to pay the interest of one-third part or share thereof to his granddaughter Sarah Hebbert during her life; and directed that if she should die leaving lawful issue, her share should then go and belong to her children, share and share alike, to be vested on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years. The testator afterwards made a codicil in which, after reciting that his granddaughter was likely to marry one David Richard Jones, and that he disapproved of the proposed match, continued as follows:

"If my said granddaughter shall, either during my life, or after my decease, intermarry with the said D. R. Jones, no part of the dividends, interest, and income of the fortune I have provided for her by my said will, which shall after my decease and during such coverture accrue, shall be paid or become payable to her, but the same shall from time to time be laid out by the trustees in the purchase of Bank Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, and be accumulated during the whole continuance of such coverture, and all the investments and accumulations which shall be so made shall be deemed and considered as part of the original fund from which the same arose, and thenceforth be added thereto and go as part thereof."

On the 9th May, 1843, and in the lifetime of the testator, Sarah Hebbert married D. R. Jones, who subsequently changed his name from Jones to St. Paul.

The testator died on the 7th October, 1843; and on the 7th October, 1864, twenty-one years from the death of the testator had expired, and it then became a matter of some doubt to the parties interested whether the accumulations directed by the above codicil ought to be continued for the benefit of the children of Mrs. St. Paul, and if not, who was entitled to the income of the legacy since that date.

This bill was consequently filed by the children of Mrs. St. Paul, praying that the trusts of the will and codicil, so far as they related to the legacy and provisions made for the benefit of Mrs. St. Paul and her children, might be carried into execution under the direction of the court; that the rights and interests of all parties might be declared, and that the costs might be provided for out of the corpus, and be apportioned rateably among the respective shares.

Osborne, Q.C. and Kay, for the plaintiffs contended that the gift, by being portions to the legatees, came within the exception in the 2nd section of the Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98); the trusts, therefore, were valid for the benefit of the plaintiffs. They cited:—

Middleton v. Losh, 1 Sm. & G. 68; and Barrington v. Liddell, 2 De G. M. & G. 480.

Malins, Q.C. and G. N. Colt, for Mrs. St. Paul and her husband, admitted that the lady could not take the dividends, and also contended that they ought to be added to the original fund for the benefit of the children.

Surrage, for the residuary legatees, submitted that the trust for accumulation ceased at the end of twenty-one years after the death of the testator; that time having now expired, and the interest of the children being suspended until the death of their mother, a lapse had taken place, and the income fell into the residue.

The VICE CHANCELLOR said he considered it a valid trust, and that there must therefore be a declaration that the dividends which had accrued under the codicil were to be added to the original fund, and that the trusts were valid, notwithstanding the Thellusson Act, for the benefit of the children of Mrs. St. Paul.

WOOD, V.C., Nov. 10, 1865.

ASIATIC BANKING COMPANY v. ANDERSON.

13 L. T. 272.

Practice—Substituted service.

PRACTICE.—A solicitor, who had merely written to the plaintiffs' solicitors for a copy of the plaintiffs' bill (the defendant living out of the jurisdiction), is not such an agent as to allow substituted service to be ordered.

Cotton applied ex parte that service of a copy of the bill on a solicitor in London, who had been engaged for the defendant in other matters, and had written to the plaintiffs' solicitors for a copy of the bill filed in this cause, the defendant living in Scotland, might be deemed good service on the defendant, but

The VICE CHANCELLOR declined to make any order to that effect, remarking that the solicitor had not constituted himself such a general agent for the defendant, as was required by the practice of the court.

THE VICAR OF WAWBY.

13 L. T. 273.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845—Title to land required—Value of the land.

This was a petition by the Vicar of Wawby, in Yorkshire, to have an offer of 45l. for the sale and purchase of an acre of land, consisting of an old gravel-pit, which was nearly surrounded by the glebe land of a parish, confirmed, and that the title to it might be considered as good.

It appeared that, so long ago as 1805, an award had been made, by which it was ascertained that the pit or land in question, about one acre in extent, had been found to belong to the glebe of the parish of Wawby, and the value of it was stated to be 45*l.*, at which price the vicar was disposed to consent to its being taken, if the court should approve.

Streeten, for the railway company.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after inspecting a plan which indicated that the land proposed to be taken consisted of a pit, and was nearly surrounded by other land of the glebe of the parish, said that, under the circumstances, he thought the title as shown was sufficient, and that the value offered, 45*l.*, was a fair value, and made the order accordingly.

RUSSELL (Clerk to the Local Board of Health) v. TRICKETT.

13 L. T. 280.

Local Board—Contract by deed—Surety for contractor—Liability of.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.—By an indenture made between a local board (the plaintiffs) of the first part, certain contractors of the second part, and the defendant of the third part, the contractors covenanted to do certain work upon the basis of a certain specification; and the defendant covenanted to pay any losses that might be sustained from the non-performance of the work. The indenture recited that the specification had been signed by five members of the local board as was required by the local Act. In point of fact the specification had never been signed, although it had been acted upon. In an action against the sureties:—Held, that the mere fact of the specification not having been signed did not release the sureties from their liability.

This was a demurrer to pleas.

The declaration stated that, by an indenture between the Local Board of Health of Merthyr Tydfil of the first part, Thomas Evans and Joseph Evans of the second part, and defendant and G. Kielman of the third part, T. and J. Evans covenanted with the local board to do certain works according to the conditions and schedule of prices set forth in a certain specification. The defendant and G. Kielman covenanted that if Messrs. Evans should not fulfil their contract and keep the conditions of the said specification, they would pay to the board such sums as they should spend, not exceeding 2,500*l.* The local board covenanted with Messrs. Evans to pay them 10,773*l.* and to keep the conditions to be performed on their part. It then averred that the Messrs. Evans did not fulfil their contract, whereby the local board were obliged to expend sums of money exceeding 2,500*l.* It then assigned a breach of defendant's covenant that neither he nor G. Kielman had paid the said sum of 2,500*l.*

The defendant pleaded three pleas on equitable grounds.

The first said that it was stated in the indenture that the specification was signed by five members of the local board, and that on the faith thereof the defendant executed the indenture, whereas it was not so signed.

The second said that defendant executed the indenture on the faith of the representation made to him by the board that the specification had been signed.

The third said that the defendant executed the indenture on the faith of the representation that the specification should be signed.

These pleas were demurred to, but as this raised the same question, no further notice of it is required.

The points set down for argument on the part of the plaintiff were, that the pleas were bad, because no ground for equitable relief was disclosed in either of them; because the statements relied upon in the first plea, and the representations relied upon in the second and third pleas were not shown to be either fraudulent or material, nor that the defendant, as surety, had been in any way prejudiced, all the terms of the specification on the part of the local board having been complied with.

The points set down for argument on behalf of the defendant were, that the defendant's liability as surety for the Messrs. Evans was discharged by reason of their not having had the benefit and protection under the contracts for which the defendant had stipulated, and on the faith whereof he became surety; also by reason of the non-execution by the plaintiffs of the specification, and also by reason of the misrepresentation made that the specification had been signed.

Beresford (with him Manisty, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs, in support of the demurrer.—The question is, whether the fact that the specification had not been signed does away with the defendant's liability. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose it had been signed, how would the surety have been benefited? The object of signing the specification, I take to be to bind the board to the specification, to show that it was the basis of the contract.] As to the ground of misrepresentation, Smith's Prin. of Eq. 165, shows that for equity to interfere, the representation must be material, fraudulent, and that the party must be damnified.

Mellish, Q.C. (with him Macnamara).—One question is, whether signing the specification was not a condition precedent. By the local Act, the indenture must be in writing. Now the indenture recites that specification had been signed. That specification governs the contract. As long as not signed it might be altered. [COCKBURN, C.J.—No, no.] A recital in a deed may often be a condition. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The specification was fully agreed to. Work was actually done under it. How was defendant damnified?] All the damage that I can speak to was, that if obliged to prove specification he would be put to expenses to make plaintiffs sign it.

SMITH AND ANOTHER, appellants, v. KERSHAW, respondents.

(APPEAL FROM A COUNTY COURT IN Re KERSHAW v. OLDHAM).

Interpleader—Trust-deed under section 192 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Validity of as against execution-creditor—Possession under—Registration—Appeal from County Court.

BANKRUPTCY.—On the 10th August the furniture of Oldham in his dwelling-house was taken in execution by the County Court bailiff to satisfy a verdict recovered against Oldham by Kershaw in the County Court on that day, and was redeemed by payment of debt and costs, and an interpleader summons was taken out to try the rights of the parties, on the hearing of which the appellants produced a deed dated 27th July, being an assignment from Oldham to them of his property, purporting to be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and to have been registered on 12th August. On 28th July appellants, by their agent, took possession of Oldham's stock-in-trade at his place of business, distinct and apart from his dwelling-house, and on the same day went to Oldham's dwelling-house and told him that they had come to take possession, but would give him time to raise money to buy the furniture back, and then left. Subsequently, and up to the time of the seizure by the County Court bailiff on 10th August, Oldham occupied the dwelling-house and had undisturbed control and possession of the furniture without any possession or interference on the part of the appellants, who sold the stock-in-trade on 4th August.

(1) Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, Shee, and Lush, JJ.

On a case stated by the County Court judge for the opinion of the Executor, whether the money in the County Court was to be paid to the appellants under the deed, or to Kershaw the execution-creditor, it was—Held, that the appellants were entitled to judgment.

Interpleader case stated by the judge of the Lancashire County Court, at Bury, under section 118 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95; the attorneys on each side not being able to agree in stating it.

On the 10th August, 1864, a verdict was given in favour of the plaintiff Kershaw in the above-named County Court against the defendant Oldham for 23l. 16s. 9d., and execution issued forthwith. The high bailiff seized the furniture in Oldham's dwelling-house on the said 10th August, and it was redeemed on payment of debt and costs, and an interpleader summons was taken out to decide the rights of the parties. After various adjournments the interpleader came before me on the 19th October, 1864. The present appellants produced a deed dated the 27th July, 1864, being an assignment of the property of Oldham to them, purporting to have been made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and to have been registered on the 12th August, 1864. The execution of the deed was proved. Some objections to the introduction of the deed in evidence were taken by the attorney for the execution-creditor, which I overruled.

The appellants, by Edward Hill, their agent, took possession of the stock-in-trade of Oldham at his place of business, quite distinct and apart from his dwelling-house, on the 28th July. On the same day Hill went to Oldham's dwelling-house, and told him that he was come to take possession, but would give him time to raise the money to buy the furniture; that Hill then left, and that subsequently, and up to the time of the seizure by the high bailiff, Oldham occupied the house, and had the undisturbed control and possession of the said household furniture, without any possession or interference on the part of the appellants. Hill sold the stock-in-trade on the 4th August, 1864. On the 9th November I decided that sufficient possession of the household furniture was not given on the execution of the deed, and I was also of opinion, at that time, that the date of the registration of the deed, the 12th August, was an important fact in favour of the execution-creditor.

The question is, whether the money now in the County Court is to be paid out to the appellants, or to the execution-creditor?

Appellants' points.—The judgment of the court below is erroneous: 1. Because, assuming that possession of the household furniture mentioned in the case was not given on the execution of the deed dated 27th July, 1864, such circumstances would not avoid the deed, or prevent the property in the goods thereby assigned from passing to the appellants. 2. Because, inasmuch as it does not appear, and is not found as a fact by the court below, that the said deed was fraudulent, the said furniture passed to the claimants and appellants. 3. Because non-compliance with the 7th condition of section 192 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, did not prevent the deed from passing the property in the furniture to the claimants, but only disabled the debtor from using such deed as a defence to the claim of his creditors. 4. Because, for the reasons aforesaid, judgment in the court below ought to have been given in the appellants' favour.

Respondent's points.—1. That the deed of 27th July, 1864, was invalid and inoperative, because the provision of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, requiring possession of the property comprised in such deed to be given up immediately on the execution thereof was not complied with. 2. That the judgment-debtor's property was not protected from the execution issued by respondents, because at the time of such execution the said deed of 27th July, 1864, had not been filed and registered. 3. That the said deed was executed for the purpose of delaying and hindering creditors and was therefore fraudulent and void. 4. That there was evidence that the deed was fraudulent and that the learned judge of the County Court was justified in deciding against the claim of the appellants upon such evidence. 5. That it appears, from the facts stated by the learned judge of the County Court, that the said deed was invalid and that the property in the chattels and effects comprised in it did not pass to the appellants. 6. That the decision of the judge of the County Court was a decision upon facts, or upon a mixture of law and fact, and that therefore no appeal lies against such decision. 7. That no appeal lies against the decision of a judge of a County Court in an interpleader.

Gray, Q.C., for the appellants.—The appellants, who were the claimants in the interpleader, were entitled to the money. The point was this: a deed for benefit of creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, had been executed by the plaintiff, the execution-debtor, under which it was necessary, according to the requirements of that Act, that possession of the property comprised in such deed should be given to the assignees (the appellants), and the County Court judge decided that, because possession was not given, therefore the property in the goods did not pass. The question, therefore, was, whether the plaintiff (the execution-creditor) or the appellants (the claimants) were entitled to the property. The case was decided by Symons and another v. George and another, in error (13 L. T. Rep. N.S. 190; 3 H. & C. 68; 34 L. J. 187 Ex.), in which the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed the decision of this court. [BRAMWELL, B.—What question arises here? The notion generally entertained about the operation of the 7th clause of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is, I think, a mistake.] (He was stopped.)

Holker, for the respondent, would not contend, after Symons v. George, in error, that, although the statutory requirements were not complied with, therefore the deed was not good at common law; but he contended the judge was warranted in coming to the conclusion that the deed was not good. The deed here was in the form given in schedule D. to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, for the benefit of creditors, but it did not appear that it was executed by any one but the debtor. It might be said, it was not a deed to defeat creditors, as it was for their benefit, but a man with two or three creditors only might execute such a deed, and be left in possession, and so get fresh credit from others. [PIGOTT, B.—That is for a jury.] Just so, and the County Court judge having found as a fact that the deed was void within the statute of Eliz., this court could not review his decision on a matter of fact. But there was a point behind this, namely, that there was no appeal here. Appeal in County Court cases was given by section 14 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. To ascertain what cases came within that, it was necessary to refer to the original Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, by the 58th section of which the jurisdiction of the court was defined. By section 118 of the 9 & 10 Vict. interpleader was given, and no doubt the jurisdiction of the court was increased by the subsequent Act of 13 & 14 Vict. and by section 2 of the latter Act, that Act and 9 & 10 Vict. were to be read as if incorporated in one Act. In giving appeal the Legislature contemplated cases where the amount was settled, but in interpleader there was nothing to show the value of the goods; the claimant had not to state the value and the judge had not to decide

it. [PIGOTT, B. referred to Pollock's County Court Practice, where, in a marginal note referring to section 68 of 19 & 20 Vict., he says there is a power of appeal in cases of interpleader.] There was, however, ample evidence to support the judge's decision, and the reasons stated for his decision were immaterial. [BRAMWELL, B.—The goods cannot be taken by the execution-creditor unless the deed be a bad deed at common law. Now here there is no evidence to show that the deed is bad at common law.]

[PROBATE.]

Nov. 7, 1865.

In the goods of T. KELLY (deceased).

13 L. T. 303.

Will lost or mislaid—Neglect of executor and parties interested to obtain probate—Parol evidence of substance—Practice.

WILL.—The Court is always reluctant to grant probate of a document not before it, and it will not, as a rule, grant probate of such document on motion.

The testator duly executed a will, for which he had given instructions some time previously to his death, and after the funeral it was read in the presence of the parties interested. The executor neglected to prove, and no steps were taken to compel him to obtain probate. Some years afterwards, the testator having died in 1859, it was deemed advisable to obtain probate, but the will then could not be found.

Dr. Pritchard was now proceeding to move for probate on affidavits, when Sir J. P. WILDE (interrupting).—The testator died in 1859, and because the parties did not think it worth while to prove his will, they purposely abstained from coming to probate. I have frequently refused probate under such circumstances.

Dr. Pritchard.—The party whose conduct has occasioned it is the party who will not suffer by your Lordship's order. The executor who had charge of the will is the person who should have proved.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—Those who were interested in the will had the means of making him prove it. They did not choose to do that, and it remained uncared for.

Dr. Pritchard.—There was no necessity for the will being proved at that time.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—The court is always reluctant to grant probate without the document being before it; and it certainly will not do so on motion. You must propound the will.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 17, 1865.

COOPER v. WELLS.

13 L. T. 319; 11 Jur. N.S. 923.

Will—Construction—Married woman—Separate use.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—Gift to a married woman with a direction that, notwithstanding coverture, her receipt shall be a sufficient discharge:—Held, to be a gift for her separate use.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Isabella Rayner, and for ascertaining the rights of all parties interested in her residuary personal estate.

The testatrix, by her will, dated the 29th September, 1864, after bequeathing certain pecuniary and specific legacies, gave, devised, and bequeathed all her real estate and the residue of her personalty unto and equally between Elizabeth Furby and Sarah Rayner, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as tenants in common, subject to certain payments therein mentioned. And the testatrix directed that the receipt or receipts in writing of such of her legatees as should be married women should be good and sufficient discharges for so much money as in such receipt or receipts was expressed to be received by them, notwithstanding coverture.

The testatrix died in October, 1864.

The question now to be decided by the court was, whether Elizabeth Furby, a married woman, took her moiety of the residuary estate for her separate use, or whether it was affected by the trusts of her marriage-settlement.

Nalder, for the plaintiff, the executor, asked for the opinion of the court as to whether that part of the will which directed that the receipts of the legatees should be sufficient discharges, entitled Elizabeth Furby to take the property for her separate use. He referred to—

Award—Arbitration—Staying proceedings—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 11—Jurisdiction.

ARBITRATION, REFERENCE AND AWARD.—Upon a proper case made, the Court will interfere to prevent an arbitrator, to whom all matters in difference have been agreed to be referred, from making his award.

An arbitrator, as such, has no power to decide whether a particular contingency referred to by the contract between the parties has arisen or not.

Where a party has interfered with reference to some of the matters referred, by appealing to another tribunal—such as a colonial court—this court will not limit the other party to the reference to the investigation before the arbitrator, but allow him to assert his legal or equitable rights as he may think fit.

This was a motion on the part of the defendants, the Cape Town Railway and Dock Company, that all further proceedings in the suit should be stayed against all the defendants, the Cape Town Railway and Dock Company being willing and offering to submit to such terms or conditions for proceeding with the reference to the matters in difference between them and the plaintiff, as might be imposed upon them by the court.

The bill, which was of great length, consisting of 536 paragraphs, prayed (inter alia) to declare the rights of the parties as to five certain contracts for the construction of the Cape Town Railway and Docks, and for accounts to be taken under these contracts; to declare that the company was not entitled to determine such contracts, as they had attempted to do, by certain notices, and that such notices were null and void; a declaration that the company was liable to pay to the plaintiff the full value of such works done by the company since they had taken them out of the hands of the plaintiff; and various other special declarations and accounts upon the footing of the construction to be put upon the several contracts; that it might be declared that the duties, powers, &c., delegated to Mr. Hawkshaw as "standing referee" under these contracts had ceased and determined on a given day; and that the company might be restrained by injunction from further taking or prosecuting any proceedings to obtain the award of such standing referee.

There was also a cross-motion of the plaintiff for the injunction as prayed.

The defendants had not answered the plaintiff's bill.

The circumstances connected with the several matters in difference between the parties were fully set out in the bill, but it may be sufficient for the purpose of this report to say that all matters in difference were admittedly agreed to be referred to Mr. Hawkshaw, the celebrated civil engineer, the plaintiff however alleging that as to two questions in the cause no provision for such reference was made, viz.: first, the plaintiff's alleged right to take all contracts which the company might undertake either with their original capital of 600,000*l.* or with any additional capital; and secondly, the right of the plaintiff to have refunded to him certain large sums for calls paid by him on the transfer of 7,800 shares standing in the name of one Shield, a shareholder in the company.

These two questions the plaintiff contended the court had no power to transfer to the arbitrator, which did not constitute a case of account provided for by the Common Law Procedure Act, but a question of liability which this court alone had power to entertain.

The submission to refer contained in the contracts had been made a rule of court.

The agreement to refer is of course set out in the contracts, but the exact terms, which it will be seen are very full and ample, are referred to in the Vice Chancellor's judgment, as are also the general facts in question, and the arguments of counsel.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., Giffard, Q.C., and Bedwell, in support of the motion to stay proceedings. They cited—

Cairns, in reply.

Nov. 4.—The VICE CHANCELLOR said:—With regard to the motion to stay proceedings, I am of opinion that I can make no order. It seems to me further, with reference to the powers of Mr. Hawkshaw having ceased, that what is asked on the part of the defendants cannot possibly be done, inasmuch as it appears that the seizure of the works by the company has placed the matter in an entirely different position, and I think that nothing ought to be done before the arbitrator until after the hearing of the cause. The seizure of the works having taken place, the matter is out of Mr. Hawkshaw's hands. I think the proper course would be not to make an order on the first motion, but to stay proceedings before the arbitrator until after the hearing. What struck me in the course of the case was this, that as regards Mr. Hawkshaw, it would be better to dismiss him from the suit. It seems merely nominal bringing the arbitrator here. He does not appear, and the sooner he is dismissed the better. Now, I quite agree with what has been said as to this being a totally new course of proceeding to interfere with an arbitrator on the ground that he is about to assume a jurisdiction which he has not, and to prevent him from proceeding in the case. That is, in fact, the relief asked against Mr. Hawkshaw. We have nothing here in the nature of a writ of prohibition authorising the court to proceed against the arbitrator, and the only thing that can be done in all these cases, and in the jurisdiction at all with reference to stopping proceedings before an arbitrator, must be founded upon the contract of the parties who are seeking to set in force certain rights which they conceive they are entitled to exercise under a deed of submission to reference, but which the court may be of opinion they are prevented from exercising from the course of conduct which has been adopted. And then there arises an equity against them with regard to other proceedings at law which prevents them, however they may be entitled to assert their right to proceed under a particular jurisdiction beyond the control of this court. Now, as regards the present state of circumstances, the original deed provides, no doubt, for Mr. Hawkshaw being what is called the "standing referee," and it gives him power in the largest terms to settle all differences that may arise between the parties under the original contract. It is undoubtedly true that they are of a very full and complete character, they being expressed in these words: "All matters and questions which according to this contract are to be determined by arbitration, and all questions arising between the company on the one hand and the contractor on the other hand touching the construction, intent, effect, incidents, consequences, or fulfilment of this contract, or touching any breach or alleged breach or nonfulfilment of any of the terms and conditions of this contract, or touching any damages, costs, or expenses, by reason of or any other consequences of any such breach or nonfulfilment, or alleged breach or nonfulfilment, or otherwise, touching the premises, shall be referred to and determined by the 'standing referee.'" And there is also, which it is desirable to notice, in that same original contract a special clause, giving further time to the contractor in which to complete his works, in the event of being delayed by the act of the company, or by anything in the shape of invasion or other contingencies which are pointed out, and there it is especially declared that the referee shall be the person to decide whether or not there has been a default on the part of the company (as regards the contractor) in furnishing land, or any other default on their part, or whether there has been any other reason with respect to which he would be entitled to demand an extension of time. There is not contained in the contract that which one often finds (it is, however, in the supplemental contract), any power for the company, in the event of the contractor not proceeding in the manner they desire, to seize the works themselves and proceed to complete them at the expense of the contractor. Then, after that, there comes what is called the supplemental contract. I pass over the intermediate contract with reference to the particular deviation which is contemplated in the supplemental contract. The second clause says: "This contract shall be supplemental to the said recited contract; but, so far as any of the articles of this contract conflict with any of those of the said recited contract, or with any of the provisions agreed to by the documents set forth in the said schedule hereto, the articles in this present contract shall prevail." Now, the second contract has a recital which states that that arose from a certain correspondence which had taken place between the agents of the several parties to the original contract, and which was intended to be embodied in this contract. That correspondence is set forth in the schedule, with a proviso that, if there is any discrepancy between the correspondence and the agreement which was intended to carry it into effect, the words of the agreement shall prevail. Now, that being so, it is contended (and I am not at present going to express any opinion upon that, because that will be more correctly expressed at the hearing)—it is contended that all the powers of Mr. Hawkshaw with reference to the provisions of the original contract are imported into and embodied in the present contract, which contains a clause (the seventh) which introduces that which had not been introduced before, namely, a power for the company to seize the works and complete them at the expense of the contractor, in the contingencies that are here mentioned. The seventh clause is this: "If the contractor shall, from any cause not attributable to any improper act, or any neglect or default on the company's part, or to circumstances beyond his control, neglect or omit to complete the said railway and telegraph as far as Stettenbasch in the manner and time hereinbefore mentioned, or to complete the contract work on or before the 5th October, 1861, or to obey and conform to the written requirement, as aforesaid, of the company's engineer for the time being, either in England or the colony, the company shall be entitled, on giving fourteen days' notice, to take the railway, telegraph, and works," and to proceed with them and to compel the contractor to pay all the expenses which they may be put to. And then it finishes in these words: they are "to pay such amount in respect thereof as may be agreed on or may be reasonable, and all such payments as may be required to be made, and shall in fact be made by the company for or in relation to the further execution and completion of this contract, and the entire fulfilment of the engagements hereby undertaken by the contractor, and also the amount of any penalties payable by the company, or of any loss or damage sustained by them by reason of any delay or nonfulfilment of the contract (which last amount shall be ascertained and settled by the standing referee) shall be deducted by the company out of the money (if any) remaining in their hands unpaid, or in reserve on the contract sum." I ought, perhaps, to have noticed the fourth clause of the contract, which says that every requirement which the engineer of the colony shall make shall be in writing, respecting the manner of executing the amount of work to be done, or the materials to be supplied, or any works, operations, or things relating thereto, shall be at once complied with by the said contractor; he is at once to set to work to do it, and there is to be a reference, if desired, to Sir Charles Fox, or other the consulting engineer for the time being of the company in England, and the said Joseph Robinson, or in case of death or incapacity of the said Joseph Robinson or any other of the sureties for the time being," and only in default of their coming to a conclusion is that particular point to be determined by Mr. Hawkshaw, the arbitrator. Now the contest before me on the part of the plaintiff has been this: in the first instance, that the whole of the original contract and this contract too provides for the existence of the standing referee only until the time that the railway is completed and open for public traffic, because there is a clause which speaks of a certificate being given by an engineer as to its being completed as well as being open for public traffic. At present I am not inclined certainly to rely upon the agreement which has been adduced before me to shew that Mr. Hawkshaw's powers ceased as soon as the company seized the railway under the circumstances which I shall presently advert to, and completed it themselves and opened it for public traffic, because, as at present advised, it is not within the provisions of the assessorial powers of Mr. Hawkshaw that the railway should be opened, whether complete or incomplete for the safety of the public. It does not to my mind appear that the powers of Mr. Hawkshaw ceased until the entire completion of the contract. What I do proceed upon is this: in the first place, I have very grave doubts indeed whether they ever extend to this particular contingency which has happened; but if they do so extend, I am clearly of opinion that they have been waived, and, having been waived, it is impossible for the defendants now to assert that jurisdiction on the part of Mr. Hawkshaw in contradistinction of the ordinary tribunals of the country, before which the plaintiff has sought to be relieved, because upon this seventh clause it appears to me that, although Mr. Hawkshaw was appointed the referee under the contract as it at first existed, there was no power for the company brevis manu to determine the engagement, and enter upon and complete the work. It is by no means clear that, when the supplemental agreement is made, you shall import into the second that this special clause, which is very special in its character, is to give Mr. Hawkshaw the power of determining whether or not the contingency has happened upon which the company are solely to be entitled to enter. This is a new power, and a power of a very grave and serious character. I do not at all concur in the argument which has been addressed to me on the part of the defendants, that the contractor was here seeking favours from the company, and obtaining favours from the company; it appears that the company obtained very great advantages from him. Possibly it was a mutual arrangement on both sides, but certainly it was as favourable to the company as to the contractor. But now, with regard to this new and important power, it seems to me, to say the least of it, exceedingly questionable whether there is any jurisdiction in Mr. Hawkshaw with reference to the main question, as to whether or not the contingency has arisen upon which the company is entitled to take possession of the works. That doubt is strengthened certainly by this circumstance, that when you come to the latter part of the clause, as to what payments the company are to receive, the company are to be paid for certain things, namely, the money which they shall properly expend in completing the contract; they are to be paid for any penalties that they may incur with the Government of the Cape of Good Hope in consequence of the non-completion of the contract, and they are to be paid for loss or damage sustained by any delay, which last amount shall be ascertained and settled by the standing referee. I must say I think it most extraordinary, if the parties intended that the question of whether or not the money was properly expended was to be determined by the referee, that they should specify three distinct points in which the company are to be reimbursed, one being a question of doubt and of difficulty as much as any other, namely, what was the amount properly required by the company and properly expended by them when they had completed the works which the contractor ought to have completed. Then they were to ascertain the penalties, which perhaps might be easily ascertained by the mere fact of payment, and would not require the assistance of the referee. That is the second point. The third point is, that they are to be recouped with respect to the damages, and for that the action of the referee is to be called in aid. Certainly, if there ever was one case in which the mention of one thing distinct and clear excluded the others, it is in this case, when it is stated that the last of those three things is to be ascertained and settled by the referee. Mr. Giffard has told me of some points in the original contract in which the referee is specially mentioned in respect of particular matters, although he has also a general power given to him; but it appears to me that that is a very different thing to a clause which in the same breath mentions three separate things, and out of those one single thing only is selected in which the referee is to exercise his judgment, and not a word is said about the other two. Further than that, the question of determining the consequences of the breach of contract appears to me to be a different thing from ascertaining whether or not the company have a right to say that the referee is to determine that matter of fact which would take place in the colony; and obviously and naturally in itself it would not be desirable to be determined by Mr. Hawkshaw residing here at a great distance from it, namely, whether or not such a breach of his duty had taken place on the part of the contractor, and independently of any default on the part of the company as authorising them that they should proceed to take possession. What took place at the colony was this: in the colony the company attempt to seize the work by force, and the contractor resists, and says, "I will raise the question with you; if I have been guilty of any delay in completing the works, the delay is due to you; you have delayed giving me possession of the land, and you have caused delays in various other ways. I am not the person responsible, and therefore the seventh clause has no application." It came to be a matter of violence, it appears, between the two parties; but it was soon seen that course of things could not proceed. They therefore apply to the tribunal of Cape Town to give them possession, and the consequence is that they obtain an order from the court in Cape Town, and that is the order under which they take possession. It is stated in the bill (and there is no averment to the contrary before me) and sworn, that the court said (and it appears to me upon the face of the order to be consistent with it) that they were not prepared to determine the question as to who was in the right or who was in the wrong; but that somebody must be put in possession. Of what may be done at the hearing—when we are determining the rights as to whether or not the company were justified in the seizure—I say nothing. It is possible that some power and authority of the referee may yet remain with reference to the settlement of the disputed items; but it is quite clear that this great and main question in the cause must be decided through his medium, and until that is decided no useful reference could be proceeded with. I therefore decline to make any order on the motion to stay proceedings. I restrain the company from proceeding in the reference before Mr. Hawkshaw until the hearing or further order.

REG. v. THE PATENT EURIKA AND SANITARY MANURE COMPANY (LIMITED).

13 L. T. 365.

Indictment—Change of venue—For what cause alone permitted.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The court will not permit the venue in an indictment to be changed for any other cause than the inability to obtain a fair trial in the original jurisdiction.

Where, therefore, an indictment for a nuisance was found against the defendants at the last assizes for Cheshire, and an action for the same nuisance was brought against the defendants in the Court of Common Pleas, and an application was then made to such Court of Common Pleas for an injunction under section 82 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which was discharged upon the undertaking of the defendants to consent to the indictment being tried at the ensuing winter assizes for the city of Manchester, the Court of Queen's Bench refused to permit the trial to be had at such assizes.

This was an indictment found against the defendants at the last assizes for the county of Chester for a nuisance, and which, therefore, stands for trial at the next spring assizes for that county. An action had also been brought, and is now pending against the said defendants, for a nuisance arising out of the same facts, and in that action the plaintiff applied to the Court of Common Pleas, in which it was brought, under the 82nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, for an injunction against the defendants. Upon the argument of that rule it was suggested that the indictment might be tried, and so the question be settled at an earlier period than the ensuing spring assizes—namely, by the venue being altered to Manchester, for which place an assize will be held early in the coming month of December. To this the defendants assented, and the rule for an injunction was accordingly discharged upon the undertaking of the defendants not to offer any opposition to the trial of the indictment at Manchester. At the Crown Office, however, it was stated that upon an indictment no such change of venue had ever been known or permitted; the only ground of change being inability to obtain a fair trial.

McIntyre thereupon obtained a rule to enter a suggestion on record that the indictment can be more conveniently tried at Manchester than at Chester, and he now moved to make that rule absolute, and contended that, as the matter was a pressing one, involving the health of the neighbourhood, and as the manufactory, though in Cheshire, was, in fact, within seven miles of Manchester, the court should permit the change. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The master of the Crown Office informs the court that there is no instance of a change of venue in a criminal case except upon the ground of the probability of not obtaining a fair trial in the original jurisdiction.] In the case of Clark v. the Queen (29 L. J. 232, Q.B.) a change was permitted upon similar grounds as the present. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That was a quo warranto information, which in reality is to try a civil right.] The principle is the same. It may be suggested then that a fair trial cannot be had in Cheshire. [Quain said he was ready to assent to that if it could be done.] [COCKBURN, C.J.—We cannot sanction such a suggestion unless there is an affidavit of the fact.]

Quain appeared for the defendants, and stated that, in accordance with the undertaking he gave in the Common Pleas, he was ready to agree to any arrangement by which the indictment might be speedily tried.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This court cannot interfere upon the subject. There is no precedent whatever for changing the venue upon a suggestion of the convenience of the parties. If the court could be satisfied that by retaining the venue a fair trial could not be insured, it might be otherwise. We should, moreover, be exceedingly averse to allowing the indictment to be tried at the ensuing Manchester assizes, which are about to be held for the convenience of the inhabitants of that city alone, and the holding of which, as it is, seriously interferes with the progress of business in London.

Rule discharged.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Nov. 15, 1866.

CARROLL v. GRAHAM.

13 L. T. 391; 11 Jur. N.S. 1012.

Demurrer—Bill by reversioner for an account—Undue exercise of power—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 50.

POWERS.—A bill by the reversioner stated that a testator by his will gave property to his wife for life with power to give to his child or children such portion as she might think proper; but if his children should die before attaining twenty-one, he gave the property to his brother; that the widow expecting the instant death of one of the children, which shortly afterwards happened, affected to exercise by deed-poll a power of appointment in favour of this child, reserving to herself a life-interest; and that the widow claimed as next of kin of the child; the bill prayed that the deed-poll might be declared void, and also for accounts. Demurrer on the ground that it did not appear that the deed was a fraudulent or ineffectual exercise of the power, and also on the ground that no case had been stated to entitle the plaintiff to discovery or relief during the life of the tenant for life:—Demurrer overruled.

This suit was instituted to set aside a deed-poll made under the following circumstances:

The testator in the cause, W. Carroll, after directing by his will payment of his debts, and giving a sum of 1,000*l.* upon certain trusts, disposed of his residuary estate in the following manner:

“The residue of my property that I may have at this time or hereafter become possessed of, whether freehold, leasehold, or personal, I leave to my wife S. E. Carroll, for the term of her natural life, with full power to her to will or give at any time, to any child or children I may have, such portion thereof as she may think proper and wish. And in case that I shall not have any child or children, or if any that all such should die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, then and in such case I bequeath the reversion after my wife's death, and child or children's, if they should not attain the age of twenty-one years, to my brother B. H. Carroll for his own use and benefit, with as full power to let, sell or otherwise dispose of, as I have now, or may have at any time hereafter.”

The testator died in 1851, leaving the defendant, S. E. Graham, then S. E. Carroll, his widow, and three infant children, one son and two daughters, surviving him. One of these daughters died an infant and unmarried in 1853. The other daughter also died an infant and unmarried in 1863. The testator's widow married Mr. Graham in 1860.

The plaintiffs were the trustees and executors of the will of B. H. Carroll, the testator's brother and reversioner under his will, B. H. Carroll, having died in 1862.

The bill alleged that, prior to 1862, the infant son of the testator, W. Carroll, fell into a state of mental infirmity, and was placed by Mr. and Mrs. Graham in a private establishment for the care and custody of imbecile persons; that while there his bodily health declined, and he ultimately became so ill that Mrs. Graham, at the time abroad, was informed that her son's death was then imminent, and that if she wished to see him again alive, she must come over to England immediately; that she accordingly arrived at the establishment in question on the 26th July 1863, and that she then became a constant attendant on her son until his death on the 1st August, 1863. The bill further alleged that the son was so dangerously ill that, throughout the whole time Mrs. Graham was with him from the period of her arrival at the establishment, his early and instant death was expected by his medical attendants, and must also have been expected by Mrs. Graham; that notwithstanding these circumstances, Mrs. Graham, by a deed-poll dated the 28th July 1863, and expressed to be made in execution of the power given to her by the will of the testator, attempted or affected to give and appoint unto her son, his heirs, executors, or administrators (inter alia), all the real estate and all the personal estate of the testator, subject only to the reservation to herself of a life-interest in the same. The bill further alleged that Mr. Graham, in right of his wife Mrs. Graham, and their infant children, claimed, as sole next of kin of the testator's infant son, to be entitled to the personal estate attempted to be appointed by the deed-poll of the 28th July, 1863. The bill therefore prayed for a declaration that this deed was void and of none effect, and also for accounts.

The defendants Mr. and Mrs. Graham demurred to so much of the bill as is above stated, on the ground that it did not appear by the bill that the deed in question was a fraudulent, undue, or ineffectual exercise of the power therein mentioned, and also on the ground that the plaintiffs had not stated such a case as entitled them to any discovery from or relief against the defendants, at all events during the life of Mrs. Graham. The defendants answered to the rest of the bill.

Glasse, Q.C. and Bird in support of the demurrer.—The plaintiffs ask for a decree under sect. 50 of the Improvement of Jurisdiction of Equity Act (15 & 15 Vict. c. 86), but the tendency of the decisions has been to limit the operation of this section. The result of the decisions is that, as a general rule, the court will not interfere at the instance of remaindermen to determine rights which have not come into possession. The bill does not state anything to impeach the deed. They cited Lady Langdale v. Briggs (8 De G. M. & G. 391; 26 L. J. 27, Ch.; 2 Jur. N.S. 982). Ferrand v. Wilson (4 Hare, 344). Fyfe v. Arbuthnot (1 De G. & J. 406). Morgan's Chancery Acts, 3rd edit. 207.

Baily, Q.C. and French, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—I really do not feel any doubt about this case. The demurrer is only to part of the bill, viz., to so much as seeks relief in respect of the deed-poll of appointment of the 28th July, 1863, and also to so much as seeks a general account of the assets, in fact, the general common account. To all the rest, viz., to the claim in respect of the 1,000*l.* legacy and the claim in respect of the real estate, the defendants answer. The grounds upon which the defendants demur to these two portions are stated as three, but may be considered as two: one, that there is no ground at all for disturbing the deed of appointment, or for challenging its validity; and supposing that ground fails, then that there is at all events no ground for the plaintiff to ask assistance of the court during the life of Mrs. Graham. As, therefore, I am of opinion that the demurrer must be overruled, and as the effect of this will be that the cause must come to a hearing, of course I abstain from going into the merits of the case. I merely advert to the fact that by the will of the testator, so far as relates to the general personal estate (I only touch upon that at this moment, desiring to abstain from going into what is not necessary for the present purpose, for fear I should prejudice any question), the residue of his property, which includes the residue of his personal estate as well as real estate, is given to his wife for her life, then there is a power to her "to give or will at any time, to any child or children I may have, such portion thereof as she may think proper and wish." Then comes the clause that if the testator should have no child, or if any, that all such should die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, then he gives the property to his brother B. H. Carroll, the testator of the present plaintiff. Now merely looking at that, the demurrer says, the plaintiff has no right to have any investigation or any account taken of the personal estate, because of the existence of this deed. But this deed is an appointment under a power, and it does not appear that in the will, quoad the residuary estate, there is any power to the testator's wife to appoint it so as to override the gift over in the event of all the children dying under twenty-one; and then when we come to look at the facts under which the appointment is made (and I will only touch on them very lightly), we find they are these: the son a lunatic, for a considerable time confined as a lunatic, dangerous to himself and others, in a state of confinement, being then in that desperate state of illness that the medical men expected his dissolution from day to day, and sent over to Mrs. Graham, his mother, who was then at Homburg, requesting her to come over immediately if she wished to see her child alive; and she, coming on the 26th, finds him in that state that she concurs in the expectation of the medical men, who expected his immediate decease; she arrives on the 26th; two days afterwards, on the 28th, she exercises the power of appointment; that is to say, she executes this deed of appointment, and then the boy dies on the 1st

August. Now I will not do more than ask how it is possible for me to hold (merely confining myself to the account of the general personal estate) that the plaintiff will not be entitled to some relief at the hearing. Therefore, on that ground alone, without going more into the details, which I could only do in a manner which might prejudice the question, I am of opinion that the demurrer cannot be sustained. Then comes the question, can it be sustained on the ground that whatever right of relief the plaintiff has, he cannot have any as long as Mrs. Graham lives, on the ground that his interest is reversionary, and that he has no right to come here until his interest falls into possession? Now, looking at it in this way, if there were no such deed-poll made by this lady, what would be the effect? That Mr. Carroll, or his representative now that he is dead, being reversioner expectant upon the death of Mrs. Graham, would be entitled to come here and ask for the common accounts of the personal estate. It is insisted by the defendant that it is the deed-poll that takes away that right; so the contention comes really to this: "You have no right to come here to ask for what otherwise would be your right, because of this deed-poll existing; and you have no right to come here to get this deed out of the way, because Mrs. Graham is still living, and therefore your interest is reversionary." Of course I need not say that I entirely accede to the doctrine of those cases cited as to the doctrine of declaration, supposing a will is made by which an interest is given to A. for life, and a question arises whether it is not given to B. in fee, that B. cannot come to have a declaration that after A.'s death he is entitled to the property, because the declaration will not give him any immediate right; he would not be able to exercise any immediate right by reason of the declaration if he got it. But here, if the plaintiff is right that the deed-poll ought not to stand, his reversionary interest gives him a present right to come into this court to ask for an account of the personal estate. Therefore it appears to me that those cases really have no application to the present. The plaintiffs prima facie have a right to an account, though their interest is reversionary; the remainderman or reversioner of personal estate has a right to come here and ask for an account of personal estate, although the tenant for life is living—that right they have, unless they are deprived of it by the deed; and they say the deed is bad. But, say the other side, "You must not attack the deed till the death of Mrs. Graham." It is impossible to allow this demurrer, and it must be overruled.

Will—Gift in equal shares to children—Codicil—Revocation of share by—Intestacy as to share—Heritable Scotch estate—Conveyance to trusts of will of.

WILL.—Testator by his will left all his property to trustees in trust to be divided into as many equal shares as he should have children living at his death. By his codicil he revoked every bequest and provision made by his will in favour of his daughter E.:—Held, that there was an intestacy as to the share of E., and she, in common with three other children who survived the testator, was entitled to a fourth part of the share thus undisposed of.

At the time of his death the above testator was possessed of heritable estate in Scotland, which did not pass under his will, as framed, but went to his son as heir-at-law. The son executed a deed conveying this estate to the trusts of his father's will, and died having previously made his will:—Held, that one-fourth of the Scotch property was to be administered under the will of the son, and three-fourths under the will of the original testator.

This was an administration suit.

The facts were as follows:—

Edward Connell by his will, dated the 23rd April, 1846, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust for sale, and then (inter alia) upon trust to divide the same into as many equal parts or shares as should be equal in number to the number of his children living at the time of his decease, or born in due time afterwards. He then gave and bequeathed one of such parts or shares unto each of his sons who should attain twenty-five years of age, and directed his trustees to retain each of the shares of his daughters who might be living at the time of his decease, in order that the same might be invested for their separate use. And after making certain provisions for the maintenance and advancement of the beneficiaries under his will, the testator proceeded to provide that in case any of his children, being sons, should die under the age of twenty-five without leaving issue, or, being daughters, should die under the age of twenty-one unmarried, then he gave the share of the one so dying, and the interest dividends, and accumulations thereof, to the survivors or survivor of his children, and the executors and administrators of such of them as might be dead leaving lawful issue living.

By a codicil dated the 28th November, 1846, the testator “annulled, revoked, and absolutely made void all and every bequest and provision in his said will contained in favour of his daughter Ellen or her issue, either in her own right, or by benefit of survivorship, or in any other manner whatsoever.”

The testator died on the 9th January, 1851, leaving four children, viz., Edward, Ellen (now Mrs. Halstead), Fanny Harriett (now Mrs. Orr), and Margaret Montgomerie (now Mrs. Shelmerdine), all of whom had attained the age entitling them respectively to the property under the will. At the time of his death the testator, besides being possessed of considerable personal property in this country, was also entitled to the moiety of a heritable estate called Park Holme, in Scotland.

Shortly after the death of the testator, his son, Edward Connell the younger, having been advised that the Scotch estate did not pass by the will, but descended to him as heir according to the Scotch law, was desirous of carrying out the wishes expressed in his father's will, and accordingly executed a deed, dated 1st October, 1852, whereby he conveyed the Scotch estate to the trustees of his father's will, and upon the trusts thereof.

In 1857 Edward Connell the younger died. By his will he gave all his interest in the personal estate, future as well as present, together with all his interest in the real estate (including Park Holme, in Scotland) of his late father, to trustees, in trust to divide the same into equal parts or shares, one of which shares he bequeathed to one Jane Evans, and the other to his sister Ellen (Mrs. Halstead). By his codicil, however, he made a fresh disposition of his property by giving Mrs. Halstead three-fourths instead of a moiety of his property.

It appeared that, according to the Scotch law, the above will and codicil were not executed so as to pass the heritable property.

These proceedings were taken for the administration of the estate of Edward Connell the elder, and the questions which arose were first, whether there was an intestacy as to the share which the testator by his codicil had taken away from his daughter Ellen; and, secondly, as to how the property about to be administered was effected by the will of Edward Connell the younger and the deed of October, 1852.

Malins, Q.C. and Bedwell, for the plaintiffs, argued that the gift was to a class. The testator directed that his property should be divided equally among his children living at his decease, and it was thus clearly his intention to apportion it into as many shares as there were children then living; hence, if only one child had survived, that one would have taken the whole benefit. The present case was exactly similar, only stronger, to that of Shaw v. McMahon (4 Drew. & W. 438). The gift being thus to a class could not lapse: (Cresswell v. Cheslyn, 2 Eden, 123.) In that case, on one of a class dying in the testator's lifetime, the share went among his survivors; there could be no intestacy:—

Humphrey v. Taylor (4 Amb. 138); and Humble v. Shore (7 Hare, 247). For it was clearly the intention of the testator, in revoking his gift to Mrs. Halstead, that her portion should go to her brothers and sisters. The property was now, therefore, divisible into thirds. As to the Scotch property, it had been conveyed by the deed of Oct. 1852 to the trusts of the testator's will, and now formed part of his personal estate.

Bacon, Q.C., and E. K. Karlake, for parties in the same interest as the plaintiff, submitted that the effect of the will and codicil, when read together, was to make the original gift to Mrs. Halstead enure to the benefit of the other children of the testator. The court, if possible, always struggled against an intestacy. They cited Harris v. Davis (1 Col. 416); Boulcott v. Boulcott (2 Drew. 25).

W. M. James, Q.C., and Prendergast, for Mrs. Halstead, contended that the deed of 1852 must be regarded as if the testator himself had executed it at the time he made his will. The trustees, by the law of Scotland, stood seised of the estate to the uses of the will, and that was the same thing, in fact, as if it had been incorporated into the will. On the sale, therefore, of the Scotch estate, the effect of the deed had been to vest in the trustees of the testator's will a right to the proceeds of the sale so far as was necessary for the purposes of the will, and no further; there being, however, a surplus beyond the requisitions of the will, their client, by virtue of the will and the deed of 1852, was entitled to it. They cited Ackroyd v. Smithson (1 Bro. C. C. 503).

Green, Q.C., and Pearson, Craig, Q.C., and Round, and Little and Bury appeared for the several other parties interested.

THE VICE CHANCELLOR.—Upon the question raised as to the revocation by the codicil in question, a most important principle has been decided by Lord St. Leonards in the case of Shaw v. McMahon (4 Drew. & W. 431), pointing to the difference between a gift to persons of aliquot parts and a gift to persons as a class. It has been argued that in the present case this is not a gift of certain shares of property to individuals named, but to a class. It appears to me to be as distinct and clear as anything can be that, upon the construction of this will, the gift is not to a class, but to each of the testator's children, who take one-fourth of the real and personal estate, given in separate shares, each child taking a share of the property which is dealt with by the will. This is the effect of the will. By his codicil the testator takes away from one of his children the share he had given by his will, but does not give it to any other person, and that share, by what I conceive to be the effect of the revocation, remains undisposed of. That being so, it appears to me impossible to sustain the case maintained by the plaintiffs, with regard to the construction of the will and codicil. My opinion clearly is, that the share taken from Mrs. Halstead is undisposed of by the codicil, and therefore remains to be administered as a share, as to which there is an intestacy. No doubt, as a general rule, the court struggles against an intestacy; but when, as in the present case, it finds that a share given by a will has been revoked by a codicil, it can come to no other conclusion than that there is an intestacy as to that share. The only difficulty which I feel in this case is as to the introductory words of the codicil; not whether they constitute the children a class or not, but whether they prevent Mrs. Halstead from taking any part of that property which has to be administered, in consequence of the intestacy. The testator in his codicil says, that he revokes the provision contained in his will in favour of his daughter (Mrs. Halstead). He might have said that Mrs. Halstead was to take no part of his estate, and if he had made use of these words, then there would have arisen a similar question to that which occurred in the case of Lett v. Randall (3 S. & G.). In that case I had occasion to refer to the case of Breton v. Vachel (5 Bro. P. C. 51) where a testator by a codicil revoked a gift made by his will, and in lieu thereof gave the legatee "a shilling and no more." If the testator had given the shilling and said nothing else, the legatee would not have been prevented from sharing with the next of kin that portion of the property as to which there was an intestacy; but having used the words "no more," the House of Lords decided that the addition of these words operated so as to deprive the legatee of his share. In the present case, however, the words used do not raise this question; they do not import that the legatee is not to take any part of the estate. If the testator had intended that Mrs. Halstead was to take no portion of his estate, it would have been easy for him definitely to have said so; but he does not do so, he simply excludes her from taking any benefit under his will. The arguments advanced by the plaintiff's counsel are altogether untenable, and my opinion is that there is an intestacy, and that Mrs. Halstead is not excluded from her distributive share under it. There must be the usual administrative decree.

As to the question of the Scotch property, some difficulty having arisen as to the adjustment of the terms in which the decree effecting it should be drawn up, his Honour directed that the point should be again mentioned.

Nov. 13.—Accordingly on this day the question was renewed, when

His Honour said that he was doubtful as to whether the whole of the Scotch property, or only three-fourths of it, ought to be administered under the will of Edward Connell, the father, and requested the counsel interested in supporting the contention that the whole should be administered under the will to argue the question, when

Greene, Q.C., argued that, as the deed of Oct. 1852, had transferred the Scotch property to the trustees of the will of Edward Connell, the father, and as there had been a conversion of the whole of it into personalty, the devisees under the will of Edward Connell the younger could not set up any possible claim to it.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—A most difficult and important question arises as to the effect of the Scotch deed of October, 1852; but, taking all the circumstances into consideration, I think the proper declaration will be that, according to the true construction of the will and codicil of Edward Connell the elder, one-fourth of the residuary real and personal estate, including one-fourth of the Scotch estate called Park Holme, was undisposed of by his will and codicil. Declare that, having regard to the effect of the deed of the 1st October, 1852, executed by Edward Connell the younger, and according to the true construction of the will and codicil of Edward Connell the elder, and according also to the true construction of Edward Connell the younger, one-fourth of the Scotch estate called Park Holme was undisposed of by the will of Edward Connell the elder, and passed by the will of Edward Connell the younger, as part of his personal estate. With liberty to import this declaration into the suit of Halstead v. Halstead (instituted for the administration of the estate of E. Connell the younger). Tax and pay the costs of all parties up to the present time out of the estate as between solicitor and client. Reserve further consideration, with liberty to apply.

JARVIS v. SHAND AND OTHERS.

13 L. T. 403.

Practice—Pro confesso—Consolidated Orders, Order xxii.

Practice as to taking bills pro confesso—Defendant out of the jurisdiction.

H. Prendergast moved for an order to take the bill pro confesso as against two defendants, husband and wife, who were living in Jamaica.

The bill was by a bondholder against trustees of a settlement, to take an account of principal and interest (at 6 per cent.) on the securities assigned to the plaintiffs, and for a receiver to receive the real and personal estate and dividends on certain sums of stock standing in the names of the trustees comprised in the settlement, and apply them in discharge of the securities.

He founded his application on an affidavit that the bill and the interrogatories thereon, and the order of the court directing the service of such printed bill and interrogatories, had been duly served upon the defendants in the island of Antigua, where they then resided, and a certificate that no answer had been since filed. The second rule of Order xxii. provides that, where there is no answer, the defendant shall be deemed to have absconded to avoid process.

The VICE CHANCELLOR made the order as required, subject to the usual order to be made to the same effect at the hearing.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE COUNCIL OF THE BOROUGH OF BIRMINGHAM.

13 L. T. 404.

Borough improvement rate—Rateable value of railway goods—Station.

RATES AND RATING.—By a borough improvement Act authorising a rate to be levied, it was enacted, "That the occupiers of any land used only as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament, should be rated at one-fourth part only of the net annual value.

Certain sidings and turn-tables, occupying about ten acres of land, were used for loading trucks and carriages with goods, and also as a standing place for laden and unladen carriages, and were found in the special case to be necessary for conducting the traffic of the railway:—Held, rateable at one-fourth only of their net annual value.

This was an appeal by the Midland Railway Company against a borough improvement rate, to the Birmingham Borough Sessions, and a case was stated by consent under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45.

The applicants are the Midland Railway Company, who are the owners and occupiers of a railway constructed under the powers of several Acts of Parliament for public conveyance, part of which railway, and of the lands, buildings, and works occupied therewith, is situate and lies within the borough of Birmingham.

The respondents are the council of the borough of Birmingham, who, by the Birmingham Improvement Act, 1851, s. 127, are authorised and empowered to levy upon the occupiers or owners of all buildings and lands within the borough, as in the said Act provided, a borough improvement rate, subject to a proviso that such rate should not exceed in any one year the sum of 2s. in the pound on the annual value of such buildings and lands, and to a further proviso in sect. 129 of the said Act contained:—

“That the occupiers of any land covered with water, or used only as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, should be rated in respect of the same to the rates authorised to be levied by the said Act at one-fourth part only of the net annual value.”

On the 18th February, 1862, the respondents for the purposes of the said Act made a borough improvement rate of 2s. in the pound, and thereby assessed the applicants as owners and occupiers of certain property, in the said rate described as “passengers and goods stations, offices, warehouses, stables, workshops, locomotive engine-house, cattle stalls, sheds, platforms, weighing machines, turn-tables, machines, wharves, houses, lands, and premises, in various wards within the borough,” on the annual value thereof.

The total rateable value of the property so described and assessed in the said rate is 2,905l. 10s., and it is agreed for the purposes of this case that the sum of 1,588l. 10s. part thereof shall be taken as the rateable value of the property so assessed, which consists of the lands and buildings occupied by the applicants with their said railway, and the sum of 1,317l. residue thereof at the rateable value (supposing the contention of the respondents to prevail) of the property so assessed, which consists of the lands occupied by the sidings and turn-tables necessary for the use and working of the said railway, and used therewith, which last-mentioned property the applicants contend is rateable on one-fourth of the net annual value thereof.

The land so occupied by the sidings and turn-tables of the station covers ten acres or thereabouts.

The main lines of railway and sidings, and the buildings shown upon the plans, constitute the Lawley Street and Camphill stations where goods are laden into trucks and carriages when about to be conveyed on the appellants' railway, and are unladen from them after such conveyance.

The sidings are also used for the standing of loaded and unloaded trucks and carriages belonging to the appellants, when at rest; two of such sidings, marked A. and B. on the plan of the Lawley Street station, are used for standing and unloading of such trucks and carriages as belong to coal owners or coal traders using the line of railway.

There are usually a considerable number of trucks and carriages at rest on the sidings when not wanted to travel. The appellants have required traders who use their own trucks, and leave them on the sidings and turn-tables without unloading for forty-eight hours after notice of arrival, to pay, and such traders have in some cases paid, 1s. a-day per waggon for every day's delay, but the appellants have no power to enforce this charge by their Acts of Parliament, and they make no profit by it.

The sidings, switches, and turn-tables are used for the purpose of passing trucks or carriages from one part of the station to another, and they are also used in connection with the main lines of railway. They terminate at the end next Lawley Street on the plan, and do not run into any railway at that end, but are all connected with the main lines, and with each other by switches and turn-tables. The sidings run into the buildings marked pink on the plan, which consist of goods sheds and an engine-house, except those sidings which are shown with dead ends.

The sidings and turn-tables are all necessary for conducting the traffic of the railway, and have been necessarily enlarged as the traffic increased.

The land so occupied by the sidings and turn-tables of the goods station is coloured yellow on the plan annexed to this case.

The appellants contend that the said sidings and turn-tables are rateable upon one-fourth part only of the net annual value thereof.

The question for the decision of the Court is:

Whether, under section 129 of the Birmingham Improvement Act, 1851, the appellants are rateable in respect of the lands occupied by the said sidings and turn-tables on the annual value thereof, or at one-fourth part only of the net annual value thereof.

J. Brown, Q.C. (Field, Q.C. and J. O. Griffiths with him), for the respondents. —The land in question is the Lawley Street goods station, which, it is submitted is liable to be rated at the full annual value. The 129th section comes by way of proviso on the 127th section. This station is similar to an inn-yard where the stage-coaches and waggons stand, and that could not be considered as part of the "road" on which the stage-coaches travel; so neither can this station be considered as part of the railway proper, as it was termed in The South Wales Railway Company v. The Swansea Local Board of Health (4 E. & B. 189). This station is also analogous to a wharf alongside a canal which would not be within the reduced rating, although the canal is:

Newport Dock Company v. Newport Board of Health, 2 B. & S. 708; Reg. v. Eastern Counties Railway, 4 B. & S.

Wills (J. C. Carter with him), for the appellants, was not called upon to argue.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the appellants, who, upon the 129th section of the Improvement Act, are entitled to be rated in respect of these sidings and turn-tables at one-fourth part only of their net annual value, and at no higher rate. The term "railway" in the Act is not confined to the two lines of rails necessary for carrying goods and passengers from one place to another. By the Swansea case it was determined, on the construction of a similar section in the Public Health Act, that the word "railway" means not only the actual lines of railway, but also the turn-tables and sidings necessary for conducting the traffic of the railway. If the sidings are not necessary for conducting the traffic, but are made mainly for warehousing accommodation, they are rateable at their full annual value. There is no other limitation than what is necessary for the conduct of the business of the railway. We are relieved by the case from any difficulty, because these turn-tables and sidings are found to be necessary for the traffic of the railway. I can well understand why a distinction should be made between watching and lighting and improvement rates and the poor-rate; and that as to the poor-rate the rating should be upon the full productive value, whereas in regard to improvement and sanitary rates, which are for works necessary for the health and comfort of the inhabitants, a limitation should be upon the rating in the case of railway companies. With reference to such objects as those there seems to be no difference between the sidings and turn-tables and the main line. I agree with the Swansea case, confirmed as it is by the subsequent case. If there is any excess of land occupied for the sidings and turn-tables, that is a matter for the sessions, not for this court. Our judgment will be for the appellants.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the sidings and turn-tables come within the meaning of the proviso as "land used only as a railway." Does the proviso mean land occupied by the rails only on which goods and passengers are carried from place to place? or does it include land used for the purpose of turning carriages from one line to another, by sidings and turn-tables? I think that it includes both descriptions of land. The Swansea case is an authority for the decision of this case. Mr. Brown pressed on us the consideration that there might be lines of railway in connection with the running lines for passengers, used only for the purpose of warehousing the carriages. If such a case came before us, probably it might be right not to include such in the reduced rating. That is not the case before us, because it is found in the case that these sidings and turn-tables were necessary for the working of the railway proper.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment for the appellants.

GASTON v. GASTON.

13 L. T. 412.

Petition—Answer—Pleading.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—An answer to a petition for dissolution of marriage must not necessarily be in conformity with a common law plea, either by way of traverse, or confession and avoidance. It is intended to be a substantial statement of the respondent's case, but should be within a reasonable degree of brevity.

Therefore, the Court directed an answer to be reformed, which detailed with needless particularity the history of the married life, and pleaded matters which might be given in evidence under a simple traverse.

This was a wife's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of cruelty, desertion, and adultery. In support of the charge of cruelty it alleged that a marriage-settlement had been extorted from her by the respondent; that having secured to himself by such settlement an income of 200*l.* and upwards, and other substantial interests in her property, he thenceforth continually treated her with neglect and indifference; that he refused to consummate the marriage, &c. The answer went with equal particularity into the history of the married life, the respondent giving his version of the settlement, the terms on which it was agreed, previous to the marriage, that they should live, the places they should reside in, &c., &c.

Dr. Spinks, on behalf of the petitioner, now moved that the answer might be reformed, and urged that most of the matter which it pleaded might be given in evidence under a traverse.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., contra, argued that the character of the answer was determined by the petition. It might be for the benefit of all parties that the pleadings should altogether be reformed, but the court ought not to direct the answer simply to be reformed, seeing that it went to the very matter pleaded, however irregular, in the petition.

Dr. Spinks having consented, on the suggestion of the Court, to strike out of the petition the paragraphs from which part of the irregularities in the answer flowed, WILDE, J.O.—Upon the whole the respondent had better reform his answer. I do not believe that an answer must necessarily be in conformity with a common law plea, either a traverse or denial, or a confession and avoidance. It is intended to be substantially a statement of the respondent's case, but within reasonable degree of conciseness and brevity.

THOMAS v. THOMAS.

13 L. T. 412.

Dissolution on husband's petition—Post-nuptial settlement by third party—22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5—Wife's paraphernalia—Costs.

Semble, that under the provisions of section 5 of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, the court has power to deal with post-nuptial settlements made on the parties to the marriage by third persons.

In allotting a certain portion of the wife's income derived under settlement for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage, the Court refused to make it a condition in the decree that the husband should deliver up to the wife the jewels belonging to her of which he had retained possession.

This was an application to the court under section 5 of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, to make an order with reference to the application of a portion of the respondent's life income derived under settlements for the benefit of the children of the marriage. The cause was tried on the 23rd March, 1865, and resulted in a verdict for the petitioner, with 1,500*l.* damages against the co-respondent; and on the 13th July, 1865, the decree nisi was made absolute. There were two settlements, one ante-nuptial, the other post-nuptial, made on the respondent two years after the marriage by her aunt. Under the first an income of 24*l.* a-year was secured to her for life for her sole and separate use, and on her death to the husband; and under the second or post-nuptial settlement made on her by her aunt, she has secured to her for life an income of 115*l.*—in all 356*l.* There were three children of the marriage aged respectively nine, seven and six years. The petitioner had no means of his own, and his health was such that he was incapable of doing anything to obtain means for their support. The damages awarded by the jury had not been paid, and the respondent had remarried, but not with the co-respondent.

H. Lopes, for the petitioner, now applied to the court under these circumstances, that a certain portion of his wife's income might be allotted for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage. It might be contended that the court had no power to deal with the post-nuptial settlement, it having been made by a third party; but he submitted that no such distinction was ever intended by section 5 of the Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61). If, however, there were any difficulty in the matter, he would suggest, all the facts being before the court, that the allowance should be made out of the income derivable under the ante-nuptial settlement, but that it should be in proportion to the total income of the respondent. [WILDE, J.O.—Was any money settled by the husband?] No money was settled by the husband. The children were entirely unprovided for, and he suggested that 200*l.* should be allotted for their maintenance.

Dr. Swabey for the respondent.—It seems to me that a variation of the settlement is asked for as against the husband as well as the wife. Under the first settlement, if he survive her, he will take a life-interest in the income. [WILDE, J.O.—The order is asked pending the wife's life.] I do not oppose the motion as a whole. It is quite proper that some provision should be made out of this money for the children; but the court will remember that it is asked to deal with money belonging entirely to the wife, whereas what it is usually asked to do is to vary the settlement as against the wife in respect of money settled by the husband. I would also remark, that the husband is entitled to 1,500*l.* damages. [WILDE, J. O.—Have the damages been paid?]

Lopes.—No; we have obtained an attachment against the co-respondent.

Dr. Swabey.—What I would suggest is, that the respondent should retain out of this income 200*l.* a-year, and that the balance of 155*l.* should be directed to be paid for the use of the three children of the marriage. The husband received 1000*l.* of her money to pay debts, and he is now in possession of certain jewels of hers which she is anxious to have. They are her paraphernalia, and their delivery up to her ought to be made part of the order. [WILDE, J.O.—I forget the circumstances of the case. Was it proved that she went away with the co-respondent?]

Lopes.—Yes; leaving the three children with the husband, and there was no counter-charge of any kind.

Dixon, for the trustees of the post-nuptial settlement, was prepared to accede to any order which the court might make.

WILDE, J.O.—The court is called upon to make an order under section 5 of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, which enacts that, “The court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or portion of the property settled, either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents, as to the court shall seem fit.” It has been suggested that that does not apply to post-nuptial settlements of this kind. I see no reason to doubt that it does apply; I have a strong opinion that it does. It is, however, in this instance unnecessary to decide the point, and I shall pass it by. The income under the first settlement is 241*l.*, and the court has before it the admission that she receives under another settlement 115*l.* a-year. I think, under these circumstances, that the sum which the wife represents herself as ready to give for the maintenance of the children is a reasonable sum, and I shall order that sum in its integrity to be paid for their benefit. The order will be in that form—that out of the moneys received by the trustees under the first settlement, they pay over to trustees to be hereafter named the yearly sum of 155*l.*, to be applied to the maintenance and education of the children.

Lopes.—And with regard to the costs?

Dr. Swabey.—The costs must be against the co-respondent:

Gill v. Gill and Hogg, 3 Sw. & Tr. 359; 10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 137.

WILDE, J.O.—I cannot give the costs out of anybody else's pocket, because I do not think that they are in fault, nor can I charge them on the estate. I order the co-respondent to pay the costs.

Dr. Swabey.—And as respects the jewels?

WILDE, J.O.—With regard to the jewels, I am not inclined to make such order or condition in favour of a wife who has run away from her husband and children.

The Right Hon. Dr. LUSHINGTON, July 11, 1865.

THE JOHN HARLEY v. THE WILLIAM TELL.

13 L. T. 413.

Ships' moorings—Burden of proof.

SHIPPING.—Where two ships come into collision, and the main allegations to be sustained or disproved are, that the collision occurred through one of the ships being improperly moored, or from her having an insufficient or an improper look-out; the burden of proof (or, rather, of disproving such allegations) lies upon the ship so accused.

O'Malley, Q.C., and Dr. Wambey appeared for the John Harley.

Deane, Q.C., and Tristram for the William Tell.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the brig John Harley, 275 tons, from Cork in ballast for Newport, against the ship William Tell, 1,174 tons, to obtain compensation for damage sustained by reason of the ships coming into collision about 2 a.m. on the 16th January last, in the Upper Dock, Newport, Monmouthshire. The brig stated the wind as N.W., and the weather as very cloudy, with a strong gale of wind. The ship represented the former as N.N.W., and the latter as a violent gale with terrific squalls. The case for the John Harley was, that she was lying in the floating docks, moored securely from her bows to a buoy at the northern part of the dock in question; and that her master, expecting a gale of wind on the night of the 13th, remained on board her; that the William Tell which was lying a short distance ahead of her, with her stern nearly opposite to her (the brig's) bows, and moored closely to the quay-walk of the northern end of the dock by one small chain only run out from her port bow, broke away from her mooring, and drifted stern on against the starboard bow of the John Harley, forcing her from her moorings, and carrying away bulwarks, rails, and stanchions, and doing other serious damage; that the William Tell continued to drift in a southern direction, forcing the John Harley before her, until the port bow of the John Harley came into violent contact with another vessel, whereby the John Harley sustained still further damage. It was further pleaded, that the collision and damage consequent thereon were solely attributable to those on board and in charge of the William Tell, by reason of their not having properly and securely moored the said vessel; and that no blame whatever was imputable in respect thereof to the master or any of the crew of the John Harley. The answer on the part of the William Tell alleged, that she was properly moored in the floating docks at Newport, under the directions of the berth master of the docks; that on the night of the 13th of the month in question, and from thenceforward up to the time of her parting from her moorings on the morning of the 14th of the same month, the William Tell was lying alongside the ship Rochester (which was on her port side), and was moored in the manner following: forward she had a one-inch mooring chain on shore attached to the mooring ring of the dock, on the port bow, nine parts of a three and three-quarter inch line attached to the fore-castle of the Rochester, the end of an eight and a half-inch hawser attached to the top-gallant fore-castle of the Rochester. Amidships she had five parts of a three and three-quarter inch line attached to about the amidships of the Rochester, and two parts of the same line attached to the Rochester's quarter pipe as a spring, and aft she had the end of a seven-inch hawser attached to the buoy, and on the starboard quarter she had two parts of a four and a half inch hawser also attached to the buoy; and that there was a vessel called the Jeanne Myers fastened to the William Tell on her starboard side. That for some time before, and at 2.20 a.m. on the 14th, it was blowing a violent gale, accompanied by terrific squalls, the wind being N.N.W., and that at about 2.20 a.m. the William Tell, by reason of the violence of the gale, parted from the Rochester and began drifting down the dock with the Jeanne Myers fastened on her starboard side; that an attempt was immediately made to get the William Tell's hawser on board the Rochester, but, as none of the crew of the Rochester were on deck to heave a hauling-line to the William Tell, such attempt failed; that at this time the gale continued blowing with great violence, accompanied by terrific squalls, and that the William Tell in one of the squalls, parted from the mooring ring; that one of the William Tell's anchors was thereupon as soon as possible let go, but that immediately afterwards the stern of the William Tell came into collision amidships with the barque Gauss, which was also in the docks and had broken from her moorings, and was then lying with her broadside facing the north end of the dock; that while the William Tell was drifting down the dock the brig John Harley drifted, quartering across the William Tell's stern, and that when the William Tell was brought to by the aforesaid collision with the Gauss, the Jeanne Myers came in collision with the brig John Harley, riding her down on her starboard bow, the port bow of the John Harley being then in contact with the Gauss. It was then denied that the collision was solely, or in any way, attributable to those on board the William Tell. It had been settled ever since the days of Lord Macclesfield, when he was impeached for misconduct, that those facts which could be proved almost exclusively by one party in the case, whether plaintiff or defendant, such person was bound to prove; and upon the question arising in this case, whether the vessel was properly moored or not, the burden of proof lay upon those who represent the interests of that vessel, and not upon those who alleged she was improperly moored; precisely in the same way as if the question had been as to whether there had been a good look-out or not upon a vessel on a dark night. One party in such a case would allege that there was not a good look-out, and certainly the burden of proof would be upon the vessel who alleged that there was a good look-out, and not upon those who could not give such evidence as the persons could who were on board the vessel. There was no question but that in such a case as the present the burden of proof was upon those who alleged the vessel was properly moored, and that they were bound to shew that she was so moored. There was some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the piece of chain which was found fastened to the ring by the deputy dock-master was the chain which properly belonged to the William Tell; but there was no doubt that the chain by which she was moored was a one-inch mooring chain, because it was in their own affidavit expressly so stated. The question to be decided was, taking their own statement of the manner in which they were moored with a one-inch mooring chain attached to the wall, and with the other chains which were mentioned with regard to their moorings to the Rocheester, whether, upon the whole, she was properly and sufficiently moored on that night; and whether, as this storm was raging at a considerable period before the collision took place, there was not a warning to increase the moorings in case it should appear to be necessary? Supposing the William Tell was improperly moored, or assuming the case either way, the next question to consider was what occurred and what took place during the night? There was no doubt, from all the evidence in the case, that it was a most tempestuous night, the wind varying, but being principally from the N.W. and blowing in violent and sudden squalls. It was said for the William Tell, first, that she never came in contact with the John Harley at all, and that the Gauss and the Regent, which were alongside, or nearly alongside, the John Harley, broke from their moorings before the William Tell came up and ran into the John Harley, or close to her. It did not appear from the evidence that either the George Buxton, or the Alabama, or the Gauss, or the Regent, broke away from their moorings before the John Harley was struck, and before the William Tell came into immediate contact with her. Was the William Tell the vessel that was the cause of the damage to the John Harley? The court was of opinion that she was, and there must be a decree accordingly.

The Court was assisted by Captain Owen and Captain Nesbitt, of the Trinity House.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R., Nov. 7, 8, 10, 14, 1865.

BURKE v. ROGERSON.

19 L. T. 415: varied, [1866] E. R. A.; 14 L. T. 780; 12 Jur. N.S. 635 (L. JJ.).

Vessels—Suretyship—Release of sureties—Delivery of vessel.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY. SHIPPING.—R. (trading under the name of R. and Co.) contracted with the A. D. S. Company for the sale and delivery to them of two vessels to be sent by him to the Danube; and he undertook to advance a sum not exceeding 1000l. to furnish them for the voyage. The purchase-money was paid in part, and the remainder was to be secured by a mortgage of the vessels. The plaintiffs were two of the directors of the A. D. S. Company. In order to further the objects of that company, they, on its behalf, and at the request of R., accepted, indorsed, and handed to him certain bills of exchange. R., on his part, gave them a guarantee that they should not be respectively called upon to pay more than a portion of the amount for which they had so become sureties; and not that until a time that was named in the guarantee. No transfer of the vessels from R. to the A. D. S. Company was ever completed, and no mortgage of them was executed to R. R. treated himself as the agent of his own firm of R. and Co. and of the A. D. S. Company in the matter; but instead of sending the vessels from Newcastle-on-Tyne, where they were registered, to the Danube direct, as agreed upon, dealt with them as if he had been the complete owner of them, speculated with them, mortgaged one of them, indorsed over some the bills of exchange, sent one of the vessels to a port which was far away from the Danube, after having freighted it with contraband of war for the use of the Circassians, and did all those acts without the knowledge of the plaintiffs. Upon a suit instituted by the plaintiffs to be relieved from the liabilities incurred by them on behalf of the A. D. S. Company, in respect of the two vessels it was:—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to be discharged from their suretyship. Held, also, that the delivery of a vessel by a vendor to a purchaser means, that the purchaser is to have the control of the vessel, and not necessarily that he is to be put into the manual possession of it. To complete the delivery he must be able to direct where the vessel shall go, what it shall do, what performances it shall be required to undertake; in fact, to have exactly the same power over it as exists with respect to any other chattel which is sold and delivered to a purchaser.

The pleadings in this suit were of a most voluminous character; the bill alone covering 44 pages, and extending to 139 paragraphs; and the answer of the defendant Rogerson occupying 62 pages, and containing 186 paragraphs.

For the purpose, however, of this report, it will be necessary to state only the following facts:

The plaintiffs, Edmund Burke and John Kearns, were two of the directors of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation and Colliery Company (Limited). The defendants, John Rogerson and William Scott, were ship-owners, carrying on business in the city of London and also at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, under the style of John Rogerson and Co. The defendant John William Couchman was also a director of the Anglo-Danubian Company, and that company were themselves defendants to the suit.

In 1862, Rogerson made a tender to the company for the supply to them of ships for the furtherance of their undertakings. After much negotiation between the parties, it was, on the 2nd June, 1863, agreed between Rogerson and the company that the latter should purchase, and that Rogerson, trading as John Rogerson and Co., should sell two steamers, called the Louise Craushay and the Chesapeake, free from incumbrances, upon the following conditions, viz.:

"The company will be justified in purchasing two boats and accepting a loan of 5,500*l.* on the following terms: namely, to purchase (subject to inspection) the boat called the Louise Crawshay for 5,500*l.*, and the Chesapeake for 2,000*l.*, making together 7,500*l.*, to be paid for as follows:—2,000*l.* to be paid by Mr. Rogerson on his taking 200*l.* shares in the company, which are to be deemed as fully paid-up shares, and by the company's acceptances for 1,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* and 750*l.*—in all 2,750*l.*—payable at four months after date; and also the company's acceptances for 2,000*l.* and 334*l.* and 416*l.*, making in all 2,750*l.*, at six months after date; but the payment of all such acceptances to be deemed satisfied, if the board shall so desire, by half the amount of such acceptances being paid in cash when due, and the other half by further acceptances of the company, payable at four and six months, as the case may be, according to the tenor of the original acceptances; the due payment of those acceptances to be collaterally secured by a mortgage of the two boats above mentioned, with power of sale not to be exercisable until after default, and after fourteen days' written notice to the company; and also to be secured by a mortgage of the calls already made and unpaid, and hereafter to be made on the shareholders whose names are stated in a list to be furnished to Mr. Rogerson or his solicitors; with liberty, however, for the directors to apply a sum not exceeding 1,500*l.* out of such arrears or calls towards the debts and liabilities of the company. Mr. Rogerson also to provide funds as and when required, to the extent of 1,000*l.*, for the purpose of dispatching and working the two boats above mentioned; and also for working two other boats, called the Papin and the Bellot, and for working certain coal-fields at a place called Dobra, under arrangements to be made to the mutual satisfaction of Mr. Rogerson and the directors. The directors defer the consideration of the purchase of the boat called the Harry Claeser. That the purchase of the two boats called the Chesapeake and the Louise Crawshay be carried out, and the payment for the same effected in the manner and upon the terms above mentioned, but subject to legal approval.

"That simultaneously with the above arrangements being carried out to the satisfaction of the legal advisers of the company and of Mr. Rogerson, the latter should be empowered, subject to the limit of expense after mentioned, to get ready, and insure, and dispatch to the Danube, for and on behalf of the company, the two boats called the Louise Crawshay and the Chesapeake, and also to provide and send out by these boats proper materials for working the colliery, and that he also be empowered to send out for the company, and maintain seven men for working the collieries; he also for the company to pay their wages.

"That the company may reimburse Mr. Rogerson for any necessary expenses that he may incur to the satisfaction of the directors for the above purpose to the extent of 1,000*l.*, Mr. Rogerson on his part undertaking to provide the necessary funds to that extent, as and when required, it being understood that such reimbursements may be made, if the directors shall so desire, by acceptances of the company, to be given from time to time according to the outlay actually made, and approved, and to be paid respectively at four months after date."

A Mr. Lankaski was appointed manager of the boats and collieries mentioned in the agreement. Rogerson then accepted 200 shares in the company, for which he paid them 2,000*l.*, and the company paid him a like sum on account of the two ships, the Louise Crawshay and the Chesapeake. Neither Rogerson nor his firm advanced the 5,500*l.* The transfers of the steamers were not completed.

On the 5th June, 1863, Rogerson tendered to the company for acceptance seven bills of exchange, drawn by him, in his own name, on the company, of different amounts, but making together the sum of 5,500*l.* Those bills he urgently requested the directors of the company to indorse; and the plaintiffs, in reliance upon his assertion that without such acceptance and indorsement the ships could not be sent to the Danube, and confiding in his promise to perform the agreement on his part, accepted, indorsed and handed over the bills to him.

• The defendant Rogerson then also wrote to the plaintiffs as follows:

“ June 5, 1863.

“ Gentlemen,—In consideration of your agreeing to guarantee the payment of the acceptances of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company, drawn for the purpose of paying for the boats, to the extent of two-thirds of the 5,500*l.*, that is 3,667*l.*, I engage that you shall not be called upon to pay under that guarantee, except upon the following dates, viz.:

12 months from the dates of the bills, 1,833*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.*

you agreeing to indorse new bills to take up those first drawn until you will come to the dates named, that is, twelve and eighteen months respectively, at which date you become owners of two-thirds of the property mortgaged to John Rogerson and Co.

“ It is further understood that you will accept bills to raise the funds to work the boats and colliery—you being liable in the event of the company not paying to the extent of two-thirds of the amount which is not to exceed 1,000*l.*

—Yours truly,

JOHN ROGERSON.”

No mortgage of the ships or either of them was ever executed by or on behalf of the company. It was alleged that the two vessels had never been sent by Rogerson to the Danube; that he had made use of them for his own purposes; that, in fact, he had mortgaged them unknown to the plaintiffs, and had also indorsed some of the bills of exchange to Messrs. Lambton and Co., who had commenced proceedings at law thereon.

The bill in the suit contained the following charge:

“ That the defendant Rogerson, without the authority or privity of the company and the plaintiffs, or either of them, after the date of the said contract of the 2nd June, 1863, caused the Chesapeake or Louise Crawshay, or one of them, to be laden with rifles, muskets, munitions of war, and other freight, for conveyance to some port or ports in the Black Sea or elsewhere; that such freight was taken on board at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or Falmouth, or some other port in this country, and conveyed by the said steamers or one of them to some port or ports in the Black Sea or elsewhere, other than the Danube. Since the arrival of the Chesapeake and the Louise Crawshay at the port of Constantinople, the said steamers have in like manner, without the authority or privity of the company and the plaintiffs, or either of them, been used and employed by the said John Rogerson in the conveyance of passengers and goods to and from the port of Constantinople and Trebizond, or elsewhere in the Black Sea other than the Danube, and, instead of dispatching the said steamers to the Danube, as the said John Rogerson had undertaken to do, the said John Rogerson has, in fact, used and employed the said steamers for his own purposes. The plaintiffs charge that a considerable quantity of the arms and munitions of war and other freight was sent by the said John Rogerson as aforesaid as an adventure or speculation on his own account, and that the residue of the said freight was taken by the said John Rogerson for divers other persons. The plaintiffs charge that the whole of such freight was contraband of war, and was shipped by the said John Rogerson with the full knowledge that the same was contraband, and that it was intended for, and that it was in fact supplied to, the Circassians, who were then at war with the Emperor of Russia; and that the said John Rogerson wilfully placed the Chesapeake in peril of being seized and confiscated to the use of his Imperial Majesty. The said John Rogerson concealed from the plaintiffs and the company that the Chesapeake was laden with such or any freight. The said John Rogerson pretends that he was entitled to take such freight under a stipulation in a tender made by him on the 28th May, 1862; but the plaintiffs charge the contrary, and that such stipulation formed no part of the said contract."

The bill then prayed a declaration that the plaintiffs were respectively altogether discharged from liability on the said bills of exchange so indorsed by them as aforesaid; and that the defendants, John Rogerson and William Scott, were severally bound, and ought to indemnify the plaintiffs against the said actions at law brought by Messrs. Lambton and Co. against the plaintiffs; and that the said defendants might be decreed to do so, or that they might be decreed specifically to perform the said agreements of the 2nd and 5th June, 1863, the plaintiffs being ready and willing, and thereby offering specifically to perform such agreements on their part; for an account of what was due to the plaintiffs from the defendants under the said agreements; for the proper application and payment of the amount found due; and for an injunction to restrain the negotiation of the said bills of exchange, and the further prosecution of the said actions.

The further details of the case will sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls (infra).

Southgate, Q.C., and Locock Webb appeared for the plaintiffs, and contended that, under all the circumstances of the case, from the non-delivery of the ships to the company, from their not having been duly sent to the Danube as they might and ought to have been, and from the peculiar dealings with them by the defendant Rogerson, unknown to the plaintiffs, they were discharged from their liability under the agreements of the 2nd and 5th June, 1863, and entitled to the relief they sought by their bill.

Selwyn, Q.C., and A. Marten, for the defendant Rogerson, contended that he had acted as the agent of the plaintiffs and the A. D. S. Company in the transaction. The company was not unaware of his proceedings, and the knowledge of the company must therefore bind the plaintiffs. Further, they insisted that when once the ships were dispatched as they were by him from Newcastle, they were duly delivered to the plaintiffs and their company, subject to his shewing that he had expended the 1,000*l.* agreed upon. No time was fixed within which the vessels were to be delivered. The real question in the case was, what was the construction of the agreement? They insisted that Rogerson had not forfeited his right under it by transmitting the cargo of arms, &c., or by his other acts. What he did he did at his peril, but that did not affect his position as regarded the plaintiffs. Their remedy was at law, for a breach (if any) of the agreements.

Ffooks appeared for the defendants, the Anglo-Danubian Company and Couchman.

Southgate, Q.C., was not called on to reply.

Nov. 14.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have read the evidence in this case, and I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree. The first question to be considered is, what is the contract between the parties? There was a great deal of preliminary discussion with respect to the Anglo-Danubian Company purchasing the steamers from Mr. Rogerson; but I am of opinion that that did not form the contract. I think the contract is to be found in the resolutions of the 2nd June, 1863, which were entered in the books of the company when Mr. Rogerson was present. It is necessary for me to refer to those resolutions in order to explain what I have to say on the subject. [The Master of the Rolls then read the whole of the contract as above set forth, and continued:] Now, the first thing to be observed upon that contract is, the nature of the proposed mortgage, and that is a material question in the case. The mortgage was to be a mortgage on the ships of the company; but the mortgage was not to be enforced, and no sale was to take place until after default. By that was meant default in the payment of the acceptances, and therefore the mortgage could not have been exercised strictly until the four months had expired, when the first acceptance became due, and then there would have to be paid one half at least, and fresh acceptances given for the remaining half, if the Anglo-Danubian Company so thought fit. Besides, it was not to be exercisable until after default, and after fourteen days' written notice to the company. Those were the conditions upon which alone the mortgage was to be enforced. There was also to be a mortgage of the unpaid calls of the shareholders, of which a list was to be furnished, subject to the company being entitled, in the first instance, to take out 1,500*l.* for the payment of any sums of money which they might consider it desirable should be applied towards the affairs of the company. There was a subsequent resolution that a Mr. Lankaski, who appears as a partner in the firm of Rogerson and Co., in Servia (at least so I infer from the fact of their calling him "our Mr. Lankaski"), was to be manager of the business at Dobra, near Belgrade, at the weekly salary of 3*l.*, in addition to his reasonable and necessary expenses. Mr. Lankaski was to act in accordance with written instructions, to be furnished to him by the secretary of the company. Now, that was the original contract. The only variation that was made in it was this, that the 1,000*l.* to be laid out was not to be "to the satisfaction of the directors," but at the mere absolute control of Mr. Rogerson—that he was to employ it as he thought fit. That was ultimately, and in fact, the contract which was entered into. Now, in the first place, it is quite clear, in my opinion, that that was a contract with the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company; and that it was not a contract with any individuals whatever. It is true that Mr. Burke and Mr. Kearns were, so to say, substantially that company, and could make it do as they pleased. But the contract was made with the company, and not with those gentlemen individually. It is observable also with respect to the 1,000*l.* which was to be laid out, that it was not like a trust which Mr. Rogerson was obliged to perform; it was optional on his part, and he was not to lay it out unless he thought fit. The next thing to consider is, the transaction which has given rise to this suit; in fact, by which the plaintiffs, Mr. Burke and Mr. Kearns—became liable for the due performance of the contract by the company; that is to say, that to the extent of two-thirds, the acceptances of the company should be duly honoured. That took place upon the 11th June, 1863. It took place nine days after the resolutions were come to, and on the same day (which is very material) a letter of instructions was given to Mr. Rogerson, directing him to send the steamers to the Danube at once. It is important to observe that Mr. Rogerson told the plaintiffs that he could not send out the ships unless they would give their guarantee that the bills should be paid, at all events to the extent of the two-thirds. I think that was reasonable enough on the part of the defendant. He thought that the company had no very large amount of funds. It was a limited company, and it was perfectly intelligible that he did not like to send the ships out without some reasonable certainty that the bills of the company would be duly honoured; and accordingly the guarantee which he required, and they consented to give, was as follows: [The Master of the Rolls read the guarantee as above stated, and continued thus:] That sum of 1,000*l.* was the money to be expended in sending the ships out. I am not sure that this is a very remarkable circumstance, although it was a great deal relied upon in the course of the arguments, viz., that no note was made at the time on the register of the ships, of the ownership of them. I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs expected it to be made; I am also quite satisfied that a bill of sale, executed by a Mr. Wraith, was produced to the office at the time, and that they believed it to be effectual to enable them to get a transfer duly made. In point of fact, however, Mr. Wraith at that time had no ownership in the ships at all. It is quite true that Mr. Rogerson was the real owner, though they were not registered in his name. They were registered in the name of the Tyne Ferry Company, and though Mr. Rogerson probably was the principal manager of the Tyne Ferry Company, and could have got the ships transferred whenever he pleased, he did not think fit to do so. I do not ground my judgment upon this, that the plaintiffs were induced, either by misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Rogerson, or any expectation on their own part, that the transfer of the ships would take place immediately, to indorse the bills of exchange. It is, however, important to observe, that what then took place was this: upon the plain construction of the contract, the vessels were, in my opinion, to be delivered immediately to the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company; and the mortgage was to be enforced, only provided the bills were not paid. Accordingly the first and really important question is this, whether the ships were in fact delivered to the company at all? I omit for the present all consideration of the question, whether the ships were to be delivered in the Danube or in the Tyne. I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that they were never delivered to the company anywhere; that no delivery of any sort took place at any place whatever; but that they remained constantly in the possession of Mr. Rogerson, the vendor. The way in which it was put by Mr. Rogerson, or by his counsel in their arguments, was this: He contended that he represents two characters. He says, it is true that he was the vendor, but he was also the agent of the company, and after the contract was entered into no transfer took place on the registry; for that his position was only that of an agent of the company, and he was thereupon entitled to consider the ships duly delivered to him as such agent. It was urged very strongly before me, that if A. B., a stranger, had been the agent of the company, and Mr. Rogerson had transferred the ships to him, that would have been a delivery of them to the company, because it was a delivery to the agent of the company. It was also strongly urged, and with great truth, that those two characters might be filled by the same person. But the question whether there was such a delivery, is the question to be determined by the evidence in the case. In the first place, it is to be considered what is meant by delivering a vessel to the purchaser? It means that he must have the control over the vessel, and not necessarily that he is to be put into the manual possession of it. To complete the delivery, he must be able to direct where the vessel shall go, what it shall do, what performances it shall be required to undertake; in fact, to have exactly the same control over it as exists with respect to any other chattel which is sold and delivered to a purchaser. If, for instance, I buy a carriage, the delivery of that takes place when it is sent to my stables, or to the care of any other person whom I may authorise to take it, and who may use it as he pleases. But the important thing to consider in this case is this. Undoubtedly these vessels might have been so delivered to Mr. Rogerson, and if Mr. Rogerson had treated himself as the mere agent of the company from that time, and had in fact treated the company solely as the owners, then I think it might have been justly said that there was a delivery to the company at that time. I am of opinion, however, upon the evidence, that Mr. Rogerson had the sole and unquestionable control of the vessels. He did exactly what he pleased with them, and not as the agent of the company, from the time when the resolutions were entered into down to the time when the vessels were ultimately sold at Constantinople. But what is the duty of an agent? The duty of an agent is to take the instructions of his principal, and the instructions of the principal in this case were to send the ships to the Danube. Consider first the case of the Chesapeake, and see what took place as to that vessel. The voyage to the Danube would have been one of less expense and of less duration than vessels usually incur in performing it. The vessels were sent to Trebizond. The distance from the Bosphorus to Trebizond is nearly double that from the Bosphorus to the mouth of the Danube. I do not know whether it is proved in the case or not, but that is a geographical fact which the court is bound to know, and one as to which anybody may satisfy himself by inspecting an ordinary map of the Black Sea. The fact is, Trebizond is at least 400 miles (and therefore 800 there and back) out of the way of the direct passage to the Bosphorus from the mouth of the Danube. How is his conduct in this respect explained, and how does Mr. Rogerson justify it? He alleges that he told the plaintiffs that he intended to send out certain goods in their vessel upon freight at 4l. per ton for his own profit, as a speculation, and that this was assented to by them. I will assume for the present that that was so, and then consider the result of it. It is proper to observe that, with respect to sending out any goods, the plaintiffs ought to have had the express assent of the owners of the vessels for such an use of them, and to have had explained to them exactly what it was that was intended to be done. Assuming, however, that that was so, according to the evidence part of the goods was actually shipped on board the Chesapeake before the contract was entered into. The papers in the suit are very voluminous, but I think from my perusal of them that this is plain: that the only communication or conversation which refers to the taking of the goods mentioned is with respect to the discharge of those goods in their way to the Danube, and that they were not to go out of their way. That it would have been justifiable, under the contract, to have discharged goods at Vigo, Gibraltar, or Malta, or possibly at Athens, where the vessels might touch, or at Constantinople; but it would not have been right to have gone to Trebizond to deliver any goods there. That, in short, it would not have been justifiable to have gone out of the regular course to deliver the goods at another place; and, as I have observed, Trebizond is 400 miles out of the way, and to make that deviation would have required the express assent and sanction of the company. But that sanction is nowhere alleged to have been given; which is the more striking because it is wholly inconsistent with that which is the great object of the Anglo-Danubian Company; that object was, that the vessels should arrive at the Danube at the very earliest time at which they could get there. It was a very serious injury to them that there was any delay in the arrival of the vessels. Besides that, there is another consideration in this case, which is a matter of very considerable importance—the character of the goods which were sent out was of a very dangerous description; amongst them was a ton of gunpowder, and all the rest were munitions of war. They were intended for the purpose of being supplied to the Circassians in their struggle against the Russian empire. That, in my opinion, is clearly established. They were, in fact, contraband of war. The whole of the goods that were sent out were—it does not matter whether they were six or eight tons, or what the amount of the tonnage was; but it is quite clear that they were a cargo of great value to the Circassians, and that there was considerable difficulty in getting them in Circassia. This, too, is quite clear, that the vessel incurred very serious risks; because, if any Russian vessel of war had found it, it would have been taken, without a doubt, and condemned. I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that not only was this known to all the persons, but that it was known at Constantinople. When they got to Trebizond they could not get any fuel, and it was only by some of the boats of the country (which they call caïques) coming out, that the ship was unloaded into one of them. Thereupon, being discharged of her cargo, she goes back to Trebizond by means of the interposition of the English consul. It was only upon the master of the ship giving his positive undertaking that the fuel would merely be used to take him back to Constantinople, that he was able to move from Trebizond at all. It is true he did not strictly perform his contract with the English consul, because, no sooner was he supplied with coal, which he purchased, than he went out to sea, taking the caïque in tow, and, after towing her for nine or ten hours, he left her in the middle of the night, as near the coast of Circassia as he could, where, it is to be inferred, the goods arrived. The vessel itself arrived safely; that is to say, though it incurred risk, it met with no accident. But I am of opinion that this part of the transaction alone is sufficient to discharge the sureties, and that it is not necessary to go a step beyond this for the purpose of releasing them. They wanted the vessel to be sent out immediately to the Danube. The Chesapeake arrived at Constantinople on the 23rd August, 1863.

She spent a month, all but four days, in her excursion to Trebizond, and she returned on the 18th September to Constantinople; and in much less time she might easily have gone to the mouth of the Danube. As to this transaction, independently of the risk incurred by the vessel being likely to be seized, the mere delay in going out of her route and employing herself for a totally different purpose is, in my opinion, sufficient to discharge the sureties from their contract. But the case does not rest there. This is to be seen throughout: that Mr. Rogerson disregarded the directions and instructions of the company, whose agent he professed himself to have been, and says that he now is. He says now that he would have taken the Chesapeake to the Danube if the plaintiffs or the Anglo-Danubian Company had provided him with the necessary funds for that purpose. But there is this manifest observation which occurs upon that, that a much smaller sum would have taken this vessel to the Danube than was spent in taking her to Trebizond, and much less than was spent in taking her there and back again. As I understand from his account, what he seeks to be entitled to have paid to him is that which he contends the company must pay, namely, all the extra expense that was occasioned by the voyage from Constantinople to Trebizond and back again, solely occasioned on account of his own speculation, which was not communicated to them. He alleges it was merely because this was not paid and further funds supplied, that the Chesapeake did not go to the Danube at all. The evidence shows me clearly not only that Mr. Rogerson did not act as the agent of the company, but that he did not consider himself such agent, and that he never intended it to be thought that he was the agent of the company, or to relinquish his own control over the vessels until the bills which he received had been duly proved. No doubt he treated the company as the purchasers of the vessels, and he treated himself as the mortgagee of them; but he determined not to quit possession of the vessels until he was fully paid, although the delivery of the vessels to the company so as to put them under the control of the company was, in my opinion, an essential part of the contract, and was so considered on both sides. I have already stated that I am not at all clear that the transfer in the registry was necessary for the purpose of completing the contract. It was stated with some truth that this could have been done at any time, and that the contract was sufficient; but assuming this to be so, exactly the same thing might be said of the mortgagee of the vessels, viz., that Rogerson was just as much a mortgagee of the vessels under the contract as the company were owners of the vessels under it. His mortgage, however, was to be this, that he was not to exercise the power of sale until after default in payment of the bills. How then does he act? He acts as the owner of the vessels, and whether as mortgagee in possession, or as any other owner, is not material, if he never acted as agent of the Anglo-Danubian Company, or as if they had anything to do with the vessels except to give him money for the purpose of working them. The truth of this is shown from various letters which have been proved in the suit, and which were written to Mr. Lankaski. I will refer to one or two of them. First, there is a letter written from Newcastle, and subscribed, "Yours faithfully, John Rogerson and Company, signed F. Cann" (who is, I assume, a confidential person entitled to use the name of Rogerson and Co.). The letter is dated the 27th June, 1863, therefore it was twenty-five days after the contract was entered into; and very little more than a fortnight (sixteen days) after the arrangement with the plaintiffs as to their giving the guarantee. It is written to Lankaski, or Messrs. Heald, Mathurn and Co., Constantinople (they being the correspondents there of Rogerson and Co.). This is the letter: "We are in receipt of your letters of the 4th, 10th, and 16th June. That to Mr. Holmes we did not send to him, as it was not encouraging." I omit reading the whole of the considerations mentioned in the letter, because it would be interminable for me to go through the detail of all the circumstances of the case. I do not think Mr. Rogerson's withholding the letter of Mr. Holmes respecting the prospects of the company in Servia can have anything at all to do with the question I am now considering. I think he ought to have communicated it to them; but, whether he did so or not, I do not think that can affect the question, which is, whether, in point of fact, there was any delivery of the vessels at all. Then the letter goes on thus: "And indeed you could satisfactorily judge of the undertaking from a mere stay of forty-two hours on the spot. The Chesapeake left Falmouth in order. Mr. Crawshay says the Circassians are wanting such a boat. If so, you can sell at 1,500*l.*; but you must get the cash. Mr. Rogerson has gone to London, and will write you from there as to any other business." Here is, by an authorised agent (after the delivery according to his own statement of the vessel to himself as agent), an express direction by him to sell the vessel. Now, it is to be observed that he was the vendor; the vessel was standing in his own name at the time of the registry on the customs. He, according to his own statement, was mortgagee of the vessel. His mortgage only entitled him to sell after default in payment of the acceptances, and the acceptances were not due for three months, and yet he directs the vessels to be sold, and authorises them to be sold, providing they can get 1,500*l.* for them. It is to be observed that the price that was paid to him for the vessel was 2,000*l.* I was told that he said he should have asked 2,500*l.*; but I confess I do not look upon the 2,500*l.* paid in paid-up shares of the company as very much. I consider the 5,500*l.* as the price of the ships; so that, in fact, it might well be said that if the 2,000*l.* was the price of one ship, 3,500*l.* was the price of the other; or it might have been divided in any way that might have been thought fit. It is also to be observed that the word is "Circs," which I read as meaning Circassians. I think no one can doubt, considering what took place with the ships, that that is the real meaning of the term. But I think all that is wholly inconsistent with any delivery of the ships to the Anglo-Danubian Company, or to the plaintiffs; for here is an express authority to sell the ships without any reference to the plaintiffs at all. Again, you have a similar thing on the 6th August, 1863, when a letter was written from London to Mr. Lankaski, addressed to the care of Messrs. Heald, Mathurn and Co., at Constantinople, signed "Pro John Rogerson and Co.: W. R. Shakell," who was also authorised to write for them. The letter states this: "The present is to advise you of the Chesapeake having touched at Malta on the 28th ult.; and we trust, if she has not already arrived at Constantinople, she will very shortly do so, and you will get her safely discharged, and her cargo sent to its destination. You will then make arrangements to get the steamer to the Danube; but if you find the water too low to get to Belgrade, you will then make the best arrangements you can for working the vessel profitably lower down the river. The vessel must not be sold under 1,500*l.*, and in the event of your obtaining a purchaser you must be careful either to obtain cash or good bills on London. The Louise Crawshay, left Newcastle last week, and was at Southampton on the 3rd inst. You are also at liberty to sell this boat for 4,000*l.*, same payment as for the Chesapeake; and should you sell either or both, you must not mention the sale to the Danubian people, but telegraph to us immediately, and we shall then replace them, by sending the Harry Clasper and Wansbeck." Now, that letter is distinct. Mr. Rogerson had not only not delivered them, but he considers himself entitled to substitute two other vessels for them. It is not pretended that the company ever agreed to buy two other vessels. Those were the only two they had bought; but he considered himself, at all events, entitled to do as he did, and on the 8th October he writes to a similar effect. In my opinion the probability was, that Mr. Rogerson thought his security was very bad, and he was proposing to sell the ships before the bills had become due, or any default had been made, in order to pay himself; that he claimed to be, and acted as, mortgagee in possession and not as owner of the ships; and that it was not in that character that he intended to do what he did. But after reading the evidence it is impossible to say that he ever gave the plaintiffs or the company the slightest control over these vessels, at any place whatever, either in the Tyne or at Constantinople, or on their way to it. But assuming the defendant Rogerson to be in the right (I will take his own case as he states it), I will then see what the result would be. Here is a contract entered into with the defendant Rogerson and Co. and the Anglo-Danubian Company. The Anglo-Danubian Company wanted boats for the Danube; they buy two boats, and they desire the vendor, who professes his willingness to act as their agent, to take the two boats to the Danube for them. The vendor still professes to act as their agent, and saying he takes possession of them as their agent, withholds from his principal all control over the vessels, and keeps them entirely to himself at Constantinople. What he would have, if I simply dismiss the bill, and give him what he claims he is entitled to, is this: He has received 1,000*l.* in one action; he would receive 3,000*l.* from the plaintiffs, which is due upon three bills, and which has been paid into court with interest, and he would receive the 1,500*l.* for the sale of the ship at Constantinople, being a sum of upwards of 6,000*l.* The whole of that would not meet the amount which he claims to be due to him, because what he claims to be due to him is not merely the amount of the acceptances, but also the money he has laid out on the vessels, which he says amounts to 3,000*l.* He would receive upwards of 6,000*l.*, and the Anglo-Danubian Company would literally get nothing at all. The only thing would be this, that they would not have even the appearance of the vessels in the Danube for their benefit; they would merely have this, that in consideration of their being the equitable owners of the vessels, without having any control or any power over them, they would have an opportunity, of which they might avail themselves, of declaring to their shareholders that they had bought these two vessels and that they were the owners of the vessels. But, in the meantime, Mr. Rogerson would have received the sum of 6,000*l.* and upwards from either the Anglo-Danubian Company or the plaintiffs, as their guarantors, in order to enable the plaintiffs simply to do and the defendant to carry on a speculative voyage, for the delivery of munitions of war upon the coast of Circassia. It is thought that I can, upon that, hold this case to be one in which the plaintiffs are bound by their suretyship to allow that to be done; although it is plain, in my opinion, that upon the contract the vessels were to be delivered to the company, and they were to have the benefit of the contract being duly performed. I am of opinion, with respect to that, that they are distinctly discharged from the suretyship for the company. Accordingly, I make a declaration to that effect, and order the amount to be repaid to them, with costs.

TALBOT v. MARSHFIELD.

13 L. T. 424; 11 Jur. N.S. 901.

Practice—Production of documents—Sealing up letter-book—Place of inspection—Costs.

DISCOVERY.—Upon an order made in the usual form for production of documents by the defendant, amongst other documents set forth in the defendant's affidavit was "a copy of a letter contained in a certain letter-book." The defendant subsequently, upon an affidavit stating that the letter-book was in constant use, and contained many other letters relating to other business, applied in chambers that the letter-book should be open for inspection at his office in the country, where the book was kept, and that he should be entitled to seal up all the book excepting the letter specified in the affidavit:

Order made, that the book be open for inspection at the office of the defendant's London agent, and that the defendant be allowed to seal up any part of the book which, upon his oath, was not relative to the matters in question in the suit. Costs of the summons adjourned into court on the question to be costs in the cause.

An order had been made in this case for the production of documents by the defendants (see 12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 761; 2 Da. & Sm. 549). Amongst the documents so ordered to be produced, was one described in the defendant's affidavit as a "copy of a letter contained in a certain letter-book." The case now came on upon an adjourned summons on the question whether the defendant was at liberty to seal up the rest of the letter-book showing only the copy letter ordered to be produced; the book being an ordinary solicitor's letter-book. There was also another question as to whether the book might not remain at the solicitor's office at Wareham, in Dorset, instead of being deposited, as was the usual practice, at the Record and Writ Clerks' office.

The defendant's application in chambers was upon an affidavit of his solicitor's clerk, stating that the letter-book was in constant use, and contained many other letters relating to other matters, and the defendant asked that this book should be retained at Wareham for inspection there, and that he should be entitled to seal up the rest of the book, showing only the letter specified in the affidavit.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, contended that the book should be deposited at the Record and Writ Clerks' office, and that he ought to be at liberty to inspect the whole of it, or, at all events, that the defendant should make an affidavit to the effect that the letter in question was the only one in the book relating to the matter in the suit.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR reserved judgment, in order that he might inquire into the practice at chambers, as affecting the question of the costs of the application.

Nov. 6.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I abstained from expressing an opinion, not as being in any doubt as to the sort of order which ought to be made, but for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any settled practice in chambers as affecting the question of costs. The order here made in chambers, upon the summons for the production of documents, is quite in the common form. It is the form given in 2 Seton on Decrees, 1040, requiring the defendant within seven days to file his affidavit of documents, and within seven days after filing to deposit such documents, excepting those he shall decline to produce, at the office of Records and Writs; and the applicant is to be at liberty to inspect and take copies of such documents. Upon this the defendant makes his affidavit setting forth the documents in his possession, and dividing them into two schedules, the first of which contained the list of documents to be produced, among which was that which is described as a "copy of a letter contained in a certain letter-book." The defendant then applies by summons to have this book neither deposited in the Record and Writs Clerks' office, nor at the office of the defendant's London agent, but kept at Wareham, and that all except this one letter should be sealed up. Now, it is quite clear what ought to be done; though the letters in this book only come down to 1858, yet it is evidently in frequent, if not in daily, use, with a view to the general business of the defendant; and, if so, the practice is plain that, instead of being deposited in the office of Records and Writs, or kept at Wareham, which would occasion great inconvenience to those who were entitled to consult it, it should be open to inspection at some third place, and no place would be more proper than the office of the defendant's London agent. So also the practice as to sealing up is quite clear that a defendant should be allowed to seal up a part of any document which is, upon his oath, not relative to the matters in question in the suit. With respect, however, to costs, the general principle is, that when an application is made necessary by default or miscarriage of a party, that party shall pay the costs. Now, there are several forms of order made on an application for production of documents, and if a defendant is able to show on that occasion that the deposit would be inconvenient as to some of the documents, or that parts of some of them ought to be protected, the court will frame its order so as to give the protection. And where the documents are numerous, and the defendant is for the first time called on by the summons to examine into their character, it is quite possible that he may not be sufficiently acquainted with them to state at once what course he requires to follow in respect of them. The case is different where a defendant has appended a schedule of documents to his answer: there he has had time to consider their contents, and is able and bound to state at once, in chambers, as to what he requires protection. Here the order was made in the simplest form. The defendant was then, for the first time, called on to examine these documents, and, in accordance with the usual practice in chambers, is entitled to have this application for protection considered as a part of the original summons. The costs of it will, therefore, be treated as the costs of that application, and be costs in the cause.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 8, 1865.

ELWES v. BARNARD.

13 L. T. 426; 11 Jur. N.S. 1035.

Practice—Trustees—Bill for an account against—Deceased trustee—Liability of, though not charged.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—On a bill for an account against trustees, and where one of the trustees was dead, and no allegation made against him and no relief prayed against his estate by the plaintiffs; but the defendants in their answer alleged that he had taken an active part with them in the execution of the trusts:—Held, that his representatives were properly before the court, and must, on a reference to chambers, be included in the inquiry.

This suit was instituted for the administration, under the direction of the court, of the trusts of a certain deed of settlement, and also for the appointment of new trustees to the above deed in the place of George Carry Elwes, deceased, and the defendants Barnard and Rackham.

The settlement in question was dated the 25th April, 1842, and the plaintiffs were the cestuis que trust, and the defendants the trustees of the property thereby settled. The bill prayed for an account against the defendants Barnard and Rackham, but the estate of the deceased trustee G. C. Elwes was not included in the prayer of the bill.

At the commencement of the proceedings his Honour decided that before entering into any discussion as to the conduct of the trustees it would be better at once to refer the matter to chambers for an inquiry, whereupon

W. M. James, Q.C. and Cracknell, on behalf of the representatives of G. C. Elwes, submitted that they were unnecessarily before the court, and asked that they might be dismissed and their costs allowed them. The plaintiffs admitted in their bill that Elwes had taken but little part in the management of the trust, and in fact there was nothing to prove that he had acted at all; as nothing had been alleged against him and no relief claimed against his estate, they had consequently put in no answer.

Kay (Malins, Q.C. with him), for the defendants Barnard and Rackham, contended that the evidence would fully substantiate the fact of Elwes having acted. He was clearly a trustee under the deed, and ought to be represented. It would be a useless and unheard-of thing to enter into the accounts without all the trustees being before the court.

Bacon, Q.C. and Bristowe for the plaintiffs; and Greene, Q.C. and Tucker for other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider that it is evident that the plaintiffs (probably on account of some relationship existing between them and Elwes) do not wish to make his estate accountable under the present proceedings; but by the trust-deed he is constituted a trustee, and though the plaintiffs may desire to limit the decree to two trustees only, yet, as the defendants the other trustees, have sworn that he took an active part with them in the execution of the trust, it would be impossible (on principle) to refuse to make all the trustees responsible for the due performance of the trust in question. This decree ought not to be considered as a hardship upon the representatives of Elwes, for under it they will be enabled (if necessary) to make every defence that the occasion requires. If Elwes has received no money, the certificate will show that such was the case, and the certificate cannot be acted upon until all parties have had an opportunity of being heard. It has been said that all the accounts between Elwes and the other trustees have been long ago settled; but again, if this be the fact, the inquiry will substantiate it. Under these circumstances I consider that it is impossible that complete justice can be done either to the cestuis que trust, the other trustees, or the estate of Elwes himself, without including him within the inquiry about to be instituted. The order must therefore be drawn up to that effect.

[BAIL COURT.]

Nov. 25, 1885.

HARVEY v. FEATHERSTONAUGH.

13 L. T. 442.

Inclosure—Award—Appeal.

COMMON.—If one person interested in an inclosure award gives notice of appeal from valuer to commissioner, general in its terms, the court must hear and determine on objections made by any other person interested, even though the original objector withdraw his objection, and no notice of dissatisfaction has been given by any other person.

It is not a condition precedent in such a case that the after-coming objector should have given notice of objection to the valuer's award.

Manisty, Q.C. and Kemplay, for the defendant, showed cause against a rule obtained by Temple, Q.C., to review a decision of an assistant commissioner under the Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118.

Manisty, Q.C. for defendant.—Procedure under the Act is as follows: The valuer selected in the manner prescribed by sect. 33 and 37 lodges a schedule of claims by parties entitled to allotments under the Act, so that all others may come in and make their objections. Defendant made his claim, and no one objected to it. Still, when the valuation is made, the person claiming is bound to establish his right. Defendant satisfied the valuer as to part of his claim, which was allowed; but the remainder was disallowed. By the 47th section all claims must be in writing; by the 48th, the valuer must deliver a schedule of all such claims for examination. Then (by section 55) another schedule of claims allowed by the valuer is deposited for inspection, and any person dissatisfied with the valuer's determination has thirty days during which he may deliver to the commissioners notice of objection. The commissioners may then appoint a meeting to hear and determine the claim by themselves, or by any assistant commissioner specially appointed for that purpose. By section 48, the party dissatisfied must give notice of his desire to have the claim heard and reported on by the commissioners; therefore section 48 is the groundwork of section 55. The order of the valuer is final unless notice is given, and so is the order of the assistant commissioner.

BLACKBURN, J.—You say sections 48 and 55 are to be read together.

Kemplay.—The meaning of the 55th section is, that after the valuer shall have heard all matters and objections, he shall cause the schedule of claim and objections and his determinations thereon to be deposited and to remain for thirty days at least in some public place for examination, and within those thirty days the commissioners shall have notice of all claims which shall be so desired to be reheard.

Manisty, Q.C.—What defendant did was this. Being dissatisfied with a part of the award, he gave notice within the thirty days. An assistant commissioner was appointed, but when he came Featherstonaugh withdrew his objection and said he would not have it reheard. The matter was thought to be at an end, when Harvey, who had never objected before, starts up. The commissioner refuses to hear him, thinking he has no locus standi, and after hearing some other cases, makes his final award simply confirming what the valuer had done. The commissioner says there is no ground for letting Harvey in. The parties then go before Crompton, J., who says, "There should be no order, but I refer the case to the court, so that the defendant may be in the same position he is now, and may not be prejudiced by the delay." [Section 56 of the Act read.] The plaintiff is not within the Act. There was no determination on this claim. The only objection (that of Featherstonaugh) was withdrawn, and if Harvey had meant to object he should have done it within thirty days after the valuer's award.

Kemplay on the same side.—Unless the party lays a foundation for his appearance by giving notice, he cannot appeal. This Harvey failed to do, and there would be no end to the matter if he could now come in, after having failed to raise the issue in the manner prescribed.

Temple, Q.C. for plaintiff.—The whole turns on sections 55 and 56 of the Act. No antecedent step is necessary; it is sufficient if notice of dissatisfaction is given to the assistant commissioner. Harvey says, in his affidavit, that Featherstonaugh and other persons being dissatisfied with the valuer's estimate and determination, they appealed to the assistant commissioner respecting the whole matter. The 56th section does not expressly require that the objection should have been made before that person's sitting. And by section 55 it is not imperatively necessary, as a condition precedent, for the commissioner hearing the objections, that there should have been thirty days' notice. [BLACKBURN, J.—Either notice or private information.] As a matter of right there must be thirty days' notice before he hears or determines. But he may act without such notice on the information of any persons present at the meeting. [BLACKBURN, J.—No. Look at the words which follow: "Then the commissioner shall forthwith give notice of such meeting." He never gave notice of such a meeting in this case.] There was an objection, though not from us. Notice given on the valuer's award is not an absolute condition precedent. Section 56 provides that any person dissatisfied with the determination of the commissioner or assistant commissioner, shall, within thirty days of such determination, give notice, &c. There is no proviso that he shall previously have given notice to the valuer. It stands wholly independent of section 55. When Featherstonough withdraws his notice, Harvey says, "I am interested, and I wish the matter gone into."

BLACKBURN, J. asked for the notice of defendant's intention to appeal. It was in general terms, and expresses dissatisfaction with the whole matter.

Manisty, Q.C. contended that, though in general terms, as it was given by a party who had made a claim, it must mean because you have not given me enough; therefore I object to your decision, because you have not given what you disallowed. Had Featherstonough gone on, the matter would have been tried between him and the assistant commissioner, not between him and Harvey.

BLACKBURN, J.—The real point is, whether the assistant commissioner had any jurisdiction over the part of the valuer's award in favour of the objecting party.

Temple, Q.C.—I do not conceive that Featherstonough would not be dissatisfied with what was given him. He might say, "You have given me an inclosure in respect of field A, which belongs to my neighbour, and is a small one; but you have not given me anything in respect of field B, which belongs to me, and is a large one." Therefore, it is not by any means clear that Featherstonough might not have been dissatisfied with the decision come to in his favour. If the commissioner had heard our objection and decided that we had no ground for complaint, there might have been some reason for saying that we had no right. But he hears nothing from us, and publishes his decision, and our notice with it, within the thirty days which we have to complain. We come certainly within the letter, and I think within the spirit, of the 56th section.

BLACKBURN, J. took the notice of the meeting and the award, and the next day, having considered their effect, said:—On looking over the form of the notice, I think that, after the valuer had made his award, Featherstonough gave a notice absolute in its terms, saying that he was dissatisfied with the whole. Very likely he meant that he was dissatisfied only with what was against him. The commissioner having given notice of a meeting at which he would consider the whole claim, Featherstonough's withdrawal could not take away the commissioner's jurisdiction over the whole of the claim. Within the thirty days Harvey had a right to say, "I did not think it necessary to give notice of my complaint, because I knew that the whole matter would come before the commissioner." The rule for a rehearing must, therefore, be made absolute; but the costs of the application must be costs in the issue.

Rule absolute accordingly.

[BAIL COURT.]

Ex parte JOHN AUSTIN.

13 L. T. 443.

Mandamus—Order of sessions—Costs.

MANDAMUS.—The Court will not, in the first instance, grant a rule for a mandamus calling on a public body to make a rate for payment of costs due to a successful appellant against a rate which has been quashed at quarter sessions. The proper course is to bring the sessions order for payment of costs into the Q.B., where its validity may be determined. If it is found to be good, and is nevertheless disobeyed, the motion for mandamus may then be made.

Barrow moved for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to the commissioners of the town of Milton-next-Sittingbourne, calling on them to make a rate for the purpose of paying the applicant certain costs. The affidavits showed an appeal to the quarter sessions of the county of Kent against a rate made by these commissioners. The appeal was successful and the court ordered the costs to be paid. The costs were not taxed during the sessions, but there was an express agreement that they might be taxed out of sessions. They were ultimately taxed at 46*l.* odd, and an order for their payment was served on the commissioners. The clerk to the commissioners said that they had no funds, and begged that no proceedings might be taken. A letter was afterwards written saying that the commissioners could not pay the costs, even if they had the willingness to do so. Now, as the commissioners were a public body, the court would hardly hold them personally liable, and ever since Rex v. Essex (4 T. R. 591, 594, 595), it had been held that bodies having the superintendence of the public purse must have the power of appearing as defendants in support of their own rate, and as such defendants they were liable to costs. The authority to levy rates was given to these commissioners by 1 Vict. c. ii. s. 84; Baines's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), s. 5, gives power to the sessions to order costs in all cases of appeal; Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 27, prescribes the mode of enforcing the payment of such costs. But the power of enforcing the order is in Baines's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), s. 18, where it is enacted that where any order shall be made by any court of quarter sessions, on the application of any person entitled to enforce the same, and on proof of neglect or refusal to obey such order, the Court of Queen's Bench, or any judge thereof, may direct such order to be removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, whereupon such order shall be of the same force and effect, and may be enforced in the same manner, as a rule made by the said court.

BLACKBURN, J.—Then our course is plain. You must make an express demand upon the commissioners for payment of your costs in obedience to the order of the sessions. If they refuse you must bring the order into the Queen's Bench, when the question of its validity may be determined. Should they then disobey, your present motion may be made, but at present you are too soon.

Rule refused.

REG. v. METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

14 L. T. 444.

Lands Clauses Act—ss. 23, 68, 85, and 110.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—The owner of property required for railway purposes does not lose his right to have the value assessed by a jury under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 23, because he has made no claim, and because the company has proceeded under section 85. They must have actually paid or tendered the money, or the owner may claim to go on under section 23 or 68. And if the assignee of a bankrupt mortgagor will not concur, that is ground for proceeding under section 110.

Beasley had obtained a rule calling on the company to show cause against a mandamus commanding them to require the sheriff of Middlesex to issue his precept to assess the compensation payable to the trustees of the Independent Building Benefit Society, No. 6, for their interest in certain premises required for the purposes of the railway.

Keane, Q.C. showed cause against the rule.—He became owner of these premises by the aid of the society. The lease had sixty years to run. He afterwards mortgaged to the society for the whole term, less two days, and in the instrument of mortgage he covenanted to assign to them. He afterwards became insolvent. The company had previously given him notice to treat. The trustees then gave notice of their interest, and the interests of the mortgagee and the company became known. By the aid of the Court of Chancery the company obtained an assignment under which they entered. The trustees say they have a claim on the property of 40*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*; but they do not say that is all they claim as compensation. We have a survey and then enter into bond according to the statute. We have given notice to treat, and the parties interested might then, had they chosen, have gone for compensation. Under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 68, the owner of lands taken or injuriously affected by any railway works may insist on arbitration if his claim exceeds 50*l.*; or he may have the amount settled by a jury. By section 85, promoters may enter before award made, on paying money into the Bank of England and giving bond. We have given them notice, and they simply say that the amount ascertained by the surveyor is inordinately low (20*l.*).

BLACKBURN, J.—But, if the company acted under section 85, they would not be within section 68. You say the trustees should tell you what they want before they get compensation. The mandamus must not be granted simply because the party will neither take the money nor ask for the money. The claim is not necessarily for the amount of the mortgage-money, for the premises may not be worth so much.

Beasley relied on section 23. If the owner does nothing at all, that becomes matter of disputed compensation “to be settled by the verdict of a jury as thereafter provided.” The mortgagor has let the company know what he wants, and it appears from the affidavits that his demand has been followed up, both before and after the company had taken the land. Sections 110 and 111 provide what is to be done when the mortgage exceeds the value of the lands, or when the money is refused. The company say, “You are not entitled as mortgagees to come under these sections unless the mortgagor comes with you.” Now M., the mortgagor, sent in his particulars in 1860, and there has been correspondence on that basis, down to May 15, 1865. The mortgagor having become bankrupt before 1861, his rights passed to his provisional assignee, who has no successor under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.

And the official assignee refuses to take any steps towards claiming the equity of redemption.

Keane, Q.C. urged that the applicants ought not to have a mandamus, when they had a remedy by simply writing a letter. We have taken possession, and say we have not made compensation under section 68, because the surveyor fixed the value under 50*l.* If that estimate is right, you get compensation under section 23; if it is wrong, you go before a jury, and get it under section 68, but do not go to the court and get it at the expense of the company. We say, if we are ever so wrong in our estimate, since you may get at the amount you want by simply writing a letter, why should you go to the court and cast the whole of the expense of the inquiry upon us? [BLACKBURN, J.—If you had been ready to pay the money, your case against the mandamus would have been made out. But if they go under section 68, and you have gone under the previous demand for compensation, you are all wrong.] He urged that all the terms to entitle the company to proceed under section 68 have been complied with. In Adams v. London and Blackwall Railway Company (2 M. & G. 118), Cottenham, C. held that section 85 applied to every case where, by right or by wrong, the company had got into possession of the property. The plaintiff's course is oppressive towards the company, as they will lose all costs, and the plaintiff's costs as well, unless they happen to offer an amount which overtops the value of the property. [BLACKBURN, J. did not see that the mortgagee was bound to tell the company the amount of equity of redemption.] He relied on section 110.

BLACKBURN, J.—Neither party seems to have done anything. The company has made no offer, the trustees have made no demand. If the provisional assignee in bankruptcy does nothing, you come under section 110. Let the rule be enlarged till next term, the plaintiff to write to the official assignee (who succeeds to the rights of the provisional assignee). If he will do nothing, you will have failed to agree. The company then to make an offer before warrant issued under section 110. All parties bona fide to endeavour to agree, but, if any unforeseen difficulty should arise, application to be renewed. Rule to be enlarged in the meantime.

Rule enlarged accordingly.

Wood, V.C., June 7, 8, 1865.

PENNY v. PENNY.

13 L. T. 496.

Legacy—Ademption—Capital in co-partnership business—Original and reduced capital in testator's lifetime.

WILL.—A testator, by his will, bequeathed to his two sons, who had been in partnership with him as traders, a sum of 3,000*l.* equally to be divided between them, such legacy to be paid out of a portion of his capital in the co-partnership business, which had been subsequently reduced, but which at the time of his death remained to his credit in the firm.

On the dissolution of the partnership, a short time before the date of the testator's will, and the commencement of a new partnership with an added member to it (the father not being one), it was arranged that the sum of 12,000*l.* which represented the father's capital, should remain in the new firm during his life, the sons paying him the interest on that sum during such period, and to give bond as security for the repayment after his death of the principal, with interest to his executors, administrators, or assigns, by certain instalments of 2,000*l.* annually:—Held, that the legacy of 3,000*l.* to the sons had not been adeemed by the circumstances which had, subsequently to the dissolution of the partnership, taken place.

This was a bill filed by the executor to the will of a Mr. Charles Penny, formerly a wholesale stationer in the city of London, against certain legatees, for the general administration of the estate of the testator.

At the hearing, the usual accounts and inquiries had been directed, and the cause now came on for further consideration on the chief clerk's certificate, and the principal question was, as to the character to be given to a legacy of 3,000*l.* under the circumstances aftermentioned.

The testator by his will, dated 5th August, 1859, inter alia, bequeathed the legacy as follows:

And whereas in and by the deed of co-partnership between me and my sons Charles Elias Penny and John Simon Penny it is provided and declared that in case I shall happen to die before the expiration of the term of four years thereby agreed to be the term of our co-partnership, and in the lifetime of my said partners or of the survivor of them, then the share of 26,423*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, my therein-mentioned capital in the co-partnership business, shall be secured to my executors or administrators by the joint bond of my said partners or, as the case may be, by the bond of the survivor of them; to be paid by such annual instalments and with interest as in the said deed mentioned. And whereas the said partnership is still continued between me and my said sons notwithstanding the lapse of the said term of four years; now I do hereby give and bequeath to my said partners Charles Elias Penny and John Simon Penny, the sum of 3,000*l.* equally between them, part of my aforesaid capital of 26,423*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.* in the said co-partnership business; and do direct my executors to accept the balance of my said capital, after deducting the last-mentioned legacies, by such bond as aforesaid, for the said balance, only payable by the like annual instalments of the like annual amount with interest as is provided by the said co-partnership deed for the payment to my executors of my aforesaid capital in the said co-partnership. And I direct my executors to invest the said balance and interest, together with all the other moneys provided by the said co-partnership deed, to be paid to my executors or administrators as and when the same balance and moneys shall be received by them, in some or one of the parliamentary stocks or public funds of Great Britain, in the names of my executors and trustees herein named, or other the trustee or trustees for the time being, under this my will, as part of the residue of my estate and effects. And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects, &c. [in various proportions].

The testator died on the 31st May, 1862. The facts and circumstances existing at the time of his decease were found by the chief clerk's certificate, and were in substance as follows: The testator was not engaged in any partnership, but had been previously with his two sons, as before mentioned, and the terms of the partnership were, that by articles of agreement of the 1st July, 1848, they agreed to carry on the business of wholesale stationers at the place and firm therein mentioned for four years from the date of the agreement. The capital was to consist of 28,191*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.*, and to belong to the partners in the following shares—the testator's 26,423*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*; Charles Elias Penny's share, 348*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*; and John Simon Penny's share, 1,419*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* Interest at 5 per cent. to be charged on the respective amounts of capital, but on testator's capital only to the extent of 20,000*l.* The leases of the business premises were to continue to be the sole property of the testator; the partnership to pay the rent and taxes in respect thereof. The net profits, after setting apart 2 per cent. for bad debts, were to be apportioned in four-ninths to the testator, three-ninths to Chas. E. Penny, and two-ninths to J. S. Penny; and in case of the death of testator before his partners, or the survivor of them, his capital was to remain in the business for the better enabling the same to be carried on, but on condition that his two sons, or the survivor of them, should, after the decease of the testator, execute a bond to his representatives for securing repayment of such capital by thirteen equal yearly payments of 2,000*l.*, except the last, which was to be for 2,423*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, with interest thereon from the death of testator.

The termination of the partnership was thus stated. Up to the middle of the year 1859 no account of stock had been taken, nor any balance-sheet made out, or balance struck. In the year 1859 failing health and the infirmities of old age rendered the testator unfit for business, and negotiations were then entered upon with a view to his retirement from the business. These lasted a considerable time. The members of the testator's family were privy to them. He subsequently agreed to retire if a Mr. A. H. Penny (a defendant) was admitted as a partner in his stead. Whilst these negotiations were in progress, an account of the stock was taken and a balance-sheet made out, and balance struck. It was then found that the testator's share of capital, instead of being 26,421*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, was only 17,000*l.*, having been reduced by bad debts and depreciation in the value of the stock-in-trade, and by the withdrawal by the testator in the previous May of 3,000*l.* in cash; and it was then arranged between them that of this sum of 17,000*l.* the sum of 5,000*l.* should be paid to the testator upon the completion of the new partnership, and that the sum of 12,000*l.*, being the residue, should remain in the business during his life, security being given to him for payment of interest on this latter sum, and for payment after his decease to his executors, administrators, or assigns, by annual instalments of 2,000*l.* These arrangements were carried out and completed in July, 1859, before the date of testator's will, and the necessary deeds and bond were subsequently executed by all parties, and the dissolution of the old firm duly announced by advertisement. The reduced capital of the testator, minus 1,000*l.*, which had been paid to him on account, remained on the footing of these arrangements, until the time of testator's death.

One of the questions now raised was, whether the two sons were to be allowed to retain to their own use out of the 12,000*l.* capital the legacy of 3,000*l.*, or whether, under the circumstances, that legacy had not been ademed?

Willcock, Q.C. and Hardy, for the plaintiff, the executor, submitted the points to the court.

Rolt, Q.C., and Stiffe Everitt, for the two sons, the legatees.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C., and F. Harrison, for infants, members of the testator's family who had had liberty to attend before the chief clerk, in taking the accounts and inquiries directed by the decree.

The VICE CHANCELLOR said:—I think upon the whole construction of this will, the conclusion to be come to is pretty clear. The case has been argued very fully and very well. If the capital of the partnership itself had disappeared, there would have been an ademption. What the testator says, referring to the deed of co-partnership between him and his sons, is this: "It is provided and declared that in case I shall happen to die before the expiration of the term of four years therein agreed to be the term of our co-partnership, and in the lifetime of my said partners or of the survivor of them, then the sum of 26,423*l.*, my therein-mentioned capital in the co-partnership business, shall be secured to my executors or administrators by the joint bond of my said partners, as the case may be by the bond of the survivor of them;" which is a true recital. The partnership articles having conceived, apparently, that the business would be a prosperous one, that the sum of 26,000*l.* and odd would remain payable, the articles would only require that to be payable which would be payable, but he recites the articles of partnership correctly, and then says: "And whereas the said partnership is still continued between me and my said sons, notwithstanding the lapse of the said term of four years"—I will refer to that presently, as to how the things really stood—"now I do hereby give and bequeath to my said partners, Charles Elias Penny and John Simon Penny, the sum of 3,000*l.* equally between them, part of my aforesaid capital of 26,423*l.* in the said co-partnership business." He had a capital of 26,423*l.* in the business at the date of the articles, which was covenanted to be repaid and secured by bond in the manner mentioned; this by accidents in business had become reduced, partly by payments to himself, and he had drawn out about 5,000*l.* It had been 17,000*l.* However, some of the money had been drawn out; still what remained was capital in the business. Supposing the business to have been continued, it would be his capital. It is no less his capital in the business till it is disposed of, or dealt with in some way, though it may be secured differently to what it may have been in the original partnership articles. If the partnership had actually determined, still it was his capital in the business, and not yet paid off, although it was intended to be secured in one way, yet really secured in another. Supposing there were a bond of two, some question might have arisen if the nature of the security had changed. What he does is this: there is a sum due as his capital in the business; he contemplates the case of death, and he contemplates the event of the business being at an end; it could not then be his continuing capital, and what he contemplates is, the money owing to me at my death in respect of my original capital in the business; that is the thing out of which he makes the disposition. He says, "Here is the money owing to me." There was 12,000*l.* owing to him at the time of his death, then he gives the 3,000*l.*; and it did occur to me as possible to be suggested that there might be a doctrine similar to that in the case of Page v. Leapingwell (18 Ves. 463), that he had estimated the sum, and would have an aliquot ratio. That is not the true view, because the circumstances of his speaking of it as capital in the business must be taken to be indicative that he is aware of the possibility before his decease of the amount fluctuating, and the primary object is to give a sum of 3,000*l.* to the sons—he points out the fund—had the fund fallen short they would suffer. They have lost 5,000*l.*, but there is the identical fund out of which he has given, reduced to 12,000*l.*, instead of its being 26,000*l.*; but the legacy is payable out of that as long as there is a fund to pay it. There is no ademption. It is given in that way, and the circumstance that that fund has got an additional security to what was provided in the will (the security of the additional brother) does not alter the fund itself as being that which is called capital in his business.

The following were the minutes of the order relating to this legacy:

Declare that the legacy of three thousand pounds by the testator's will bequeathed to the defendants Charles Elias Penny and John Simon Penny equally between them, was properly payable to them from and out of the sum of twelve thousand pounds due from the three defendants on bond, being the amount of the said testator's capital in his former partnership with the defendants, Charles Elias Penny and John Simon Penny, and remaining unpaid at the time of his death, and that the same sum of three thousand pounds, less legacy duty, was properly retained by the said defendants out of the first instalments of the said sum of twelve thousand pounds.

Wood, V.C., Dec. 8. 1865.

WILLIAMS v. OSBORNE.

13 L. T. 498.

Injunction—Use of name of another trader.

TRADE AND TRADE NAME.—Before the court will interfere to prevent one trader from making fraudulent use of the name of another, it requires to be satisfied not only that the course taken by the defendant is calculated to deceive the public, but that representation has been made to him by the plaintiff that it will have that effect.

This was a suit to restrain the defendants from selling any goods manufactured by them as goods manufactured by the late Robert Hendrie, perfumer, or by the plaintiffs, who had bought his business, or from selling goods made up in cases, or having labels affixed resembling the cases and labels of Hendrie or the plaintiffs, or from representing themselves to the public as the true and legitimate representatives of the business carried on by the late Robert Hendrie.

The late Robert Hendrie carried on an extensive trade as a wholesale perfumer, at Nos. 12 and 13, Tichborne Street, and Regent's Quadrant.

In order to enable the public to distinguish his goods, Hendrie used certain labels or stamps upon which his name was printed or stamped, and many of the articles manufactured and sold by him were made up in cases or boxes of a peculiar shape and colour, and were labelled with labels of different colours.

Robert Hendrie died on the 27th April, 1862, and in November, 1862, the plaintiff Terrick Jones Williams purchased from the executors of Hendrie the goodwill of the business, and all the recipes then in the possession of the executors belonging or relating to the business, and all the stock-in-trade of the business.

The executors, by an agreement in writing, agreed to demise the premises Nos. 12 and 13, Tichborne Street, to the plaintiff Williams, for a term of forty-two years from the 1st December, 1862, and with an option to buy the reversion in fee-simple within three years.

A valuation of the stock-in-trade, tenants' and trade fixtures was made, and included numerous trade bills, cards, and placards, having the name of Robert Hendrie printed or engraved thereon, cases and boxes, the engraved plates from which the labels and cards were printed, and two framed plates of glass fixed in positions to be seen from the roadway, upon which the name of "Hendrie" was written, and the gilt wooden letters, forming the name of "Hendrie," which were affixed over the shop front of Hendrie's place of business.

The plaintiff Williams, with the plaintiff Usherwood, since the month of December, 1862, carried on the business as partners under the name of Robert Hendrie.

The defendants, W. T. Osborne, H. Bauer, and E. Cheeseman, had been all employed by Robert Hendrie in his business in different capacities.

The defendants, after the death of Hendrie, bid for the business, but failed to obtain it, and when the plaintiffs took the premises, the defendants left Tichborne Street, and shortly after commenced business as manufacturing wholesale and retail perfumers, at No. 19, Golden Square, in partnership, under the style of "Osborne, Bauer, and Cheeseman."

The bill, as amended, alleged that the defendants had sold and made up in boxes and cases similar in size, shape, colour, and general appearance to those used by Hendrie in his lifetime, and the plaintiffs after his death for the like, goods with labels similar in appearance to those used by

Robert Hendrie, and that on such labels so used by the defendants the name of Robert Hendrie was printed in large and conspicuous letters, and was immediately followed by the defendants' address, No. 19, Golden Square, as if it were the address of the said Robert Hendrie, and although Golden Square, as the bill alleged, was never described by other persons as Golden Square, Regent's Quadrant, and could not with any propriety be so described; yet, because the shop and premises of the late Robert Hendrie were always known and described as situate in Tichborne Street, Regent's Quadrant, the defendants in their labels always added the words "Regent's Quadrant" in conspicuous letters to their address, No. 19, Golden Square, and so caused the public and the trade to suppose that the goods so sold and manufactured by the said defendants were goods manufactured and sold by the said Robert Hendrie, or by the plaintiffs in their business.

The bill also alleged that the defendants caused to be painted in large letters over the window of the shop at No. 19, Golden Square, the words "Osborne, Bauer, and Cheeseman," and "R. Hendrie," with the words "from the late" in very small letters between the name Cheeseman and the name R. Hendrie. It appeared, however, in the evidence that at the side of their shop the defendants had a similar inscription, but that the words "from the late" were as large as the rest of the other words.

It appeared that in some of their placards the defendants had described themselves as follows: "Osborne, Bauer, and Cheeseman, managers and manufacturers to the late Robert Hendrie, 19, Golden Square, Regent's Quadrant, London;" and the plaintiffs alleged that, in consequence of such use by the defendants of the name of Robert Hendrie in connection with the said address, several persons had been led to believe that the business carried on by the defendants was the business of the late Robert Hendrie, and that a Mr. Thompson, of Reading, was so deceived, and that on the 10th October, 1864, he wrote and sent a letter intended for the plaintiffs, which he addressed as follows: "Mr. Hendrie, perfumer, 19, Golden Square, Regent's Quadrant, London." The letter was delivered at the shop of the defendants and was taken in and opened by the defendants, who, finding from the contents of the letter that it was not for them but for the plaintiffs, returned the letter to the postman, stating that no Mr. Hendrie resided at No. 19, Golden Square, and it was subsequently delivered to the plaintiffs at their place of business. The letter was as follows:

90, Broad Street, Reading,
October 10, 1864.

Sir,—Does Mr. Lovewell travel for you? If so, I ordered some tooth brushes and petroline soap to be sent to me from your house. It is about five weeks back, and as I want them you will oblige by sending them immediately by Pickford.

Yours respectfully,

Mr. Hendrie.

A. THOMPSON.

Mr. Lovewell was a traveller for the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs also alleged that Hendrie made a particular kind of pomade, called "moëlline," which he sold in glass bottles inside a pasteboard pull-off case, and the defendants had sold an inferior article under the same name, and in bottles and cases very nearly resembling those used by Hendrie and the plaintiffs, and also with labels almost exactly similar in appearance to those of Hendrie's, with the words "from the late Robt. Hendrie's."

Another of the articles sold by the said Robert Hendrie in his lifetime, and by the plaintiffs since his death, was a soap called "petroleum soap," which was prepared according to the specification referred to in a patent, which had now expired, obtained by one W. L. Caldecot, who sold and assigned his patent to Hendrie, whose rights and interest therein were purchased by the plaintiffs of his executors. This was sold in a wrapper of a particular colour.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants also sold soap very similar to the plaintiffs, and that to induce the public to believe that it was the same as the plaintiffs', they called it petroleum, or dispensary soap, and sold it in wrappers similar to those of the plaintiffs.

It appeared from the evidence that the name "petroleum" was used as an appellative for soap by other perfumers, and petroleum soap had been manufactured by one John Tyler before the date of Caldecot's patent.

Robert Hendrie, in his lifetime, also sold a soap called "petroline cosmetic soap," which was prepared by Caldecot's process. The bill charged that the defendants sold soap similar in appearance to the plaintiffs' petroline cosmetic soap, that they stamped it on one side with the words "Cosmetic petroline soap, Osborne and Co., from R. Hendrie's." On the other with the words "Osborne and Co., from R. Hendrie's, Golden Square;" the name R. Hendrie being conspicuously placed by itself in the centre, so as to attract attention to that name, but at the same time in immediate connection with the defendants' address, 19, Golden Square, and that they sold it in wrappers similar to those of the plaintiffs.

The bill alleged that the words "Petroline cosmetic soap" were never used by any person except the said Robert Hendrie, deceased, and by the plaintiffs, to designate any particular soap, until they were used by the defendants as aforesaid, and they were formerly the said Robert Hendrie's, and are now the plaintiffs' trade-mark.

The bill also alleged that the defendants had sold and offered for sale other articles similar to those sold by the plaintiffs in the said business, and that they made up, labelled, and described them in a manner clearly resembling the way in which those sold by the plaintiffs were made up, labelled, and described, and in imitation thereof; and that they used the name of the said Robert Hendrie in such a manner as to represent such goods to the public as of the manufacture of the plaintiffs; and that the defendants used their address, 19, Golden Square, in connection with the name of the said Robert Hendrie, in such a manner as to make it appear to be the address or place of business of the said Robert Hendrie; and that in consequence thereof various goods of the defendants' manufacture had been sold as Hendrie's goods.

On the 1st September, 1864, the plaintiffs' solicitor wrote to the defendants complaining of their selling goods in cases with the name of Hendrie, and made in imitation of the plaintiffs'. A correspondence then ensued between the solicitors of the parties. On the 5th November, 1864, the solicitor for the defendants wrote to the solicitors of the plaintiffs asking on whose behalf he had applied to the defendants, and how they claimed to use the name of Hendrie exclusively? The letter then went on:

"One or two facts I may be forgiven bringing before your notice. Mr. Osborne was with the late Mr. Hendrie about twenty-eight years, Mr. Cheeseman about eight years and a half, and Mr. Bauer about twenty-three years; during these several periods one acted as manager of the soap department, and afterwards in addition as general manager; the second had the management of the counting-house and books; and the third for many years manufactured all the perfumes and acted as buyer and salesman in the retail department. The services of the three were continued by the executors of the late Mr. Hendrie. Under these circumstances I submit my clients are only stating the truth when they say 'manufacturers and managers to the late R. Hendrie.' . . . Perhaps in your reply, giving me the names of your clients and informing me upon what they ground their application, you will be kind enough to point out in what particulars the label proposed by me is objectionable."

No answer was sent to this letter, and on the 23rd November, 1864, the plaintiffs filed their bill to restrain the defendants from selling any goods manufactured by them as goods of the manufacture of Robert Hendrie, or of the plaintiffs, or of selling any pomade or other articles made up in cases resembling the plaintiffs', or having affixed thereto labels containing the name of Hendrie or Robert Hendrie, so contrived or expressed as, by colourable imitation or otherwise, to represent the goods sold by the defendants to be the same as goods sold by the plaintiff, particularly with reference to the articles sold by the plaintiff as "moëlline petroleum soap," &c.; and from placing over their shop-windows any inscription so contrived or expressed as to represent that the business carried on by the defendants was the business of Robert Hendrie, deceased, or that the goods sold by the defendants were the same as those sold by Robert Hendrie or the plaintiffs.

The motion for an injunction came on before his Honour, Wood, V.C., on the 15th December, 1864, when the defendants gave an undertaking not "to sell, after the 1st day of January next, any goods having affixed thereto any labels now in use by them, or other labels having the words 'Regent's Quadrant' thereon added to 'Golden Square,' or having the name 'R. Hendrie' or 'Hendrie' thereon, without the words 'the late' prefixed thereto; or any labels having the words 'from the late R. Hendrie,' or the name 'R. Hendrie,' immediately preceding or in connection with the defendants' address;" and also undertaking, "until the hearing of this cause, to keep an account of the sales of all goods which shall be sold and labelled with their labels now in use, distinguishing the goods sold under each particular label;" and the hearing of the motion was ordered to stand over until the hearing of the cause, with liberty for the plaintiffs to amend their bill. The plaintiffs filed their amended bill on the 30th December, 1864.

On the 5th May, 1865, the solicitors for the plaintiffs wrote to offer to stay proceedings if the defendants would submit to an injunction in the terms of the undertaking, and to pay costs.

On the 6th May the solicitor for the defendants wrote declining to accept this proposal.

The cause now came on on motion for decree.

It appeared from an affidavit of a chemist at Bath, of the name of King, that in March, 1864, he ordered from a London patent medicine house a number of cakes of R. Hendrie's petroleum patent soap, prepared for the use of the dispensary. Some of the defendants' soap was sent to him and he declared that he was so mistaken by the labels that he thought it the genuine manufactured soap of the late Robert Hendrie, and that the defendants were his successors.

Several affidavits of letter carriers were filed on behalf of the plaintiffs, in which they all stated that they had never known letters to be addressed Golden Square, Regent's Quadrant.

The defendants in their answer submitted that the plaintiffs were not entitled to use the name of Robert Hendrie, his son never having authorised, but objected to their doing so. That no alteration had been made by them (the defendants) in their way of carrying on business since February, 1863, and that whatever was objectionable to the plaintiffs at the time of filing the bill was equally so then; and that until they received a letter from the plaintiffs' solicitor on the 1st September, 1864, the plaintiffs had never intimated to the defendants that they were doing anything which the plaintiffs considered objectionable.

Giffard, Q.C., and Speed (with them Sir H. Cairns, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs, submitted that they were entitled to the interference of the court to protect the rights of the plaintiffs, who were properly entitled to use the name of Hendrie. The defendants had palmed off their goods as those of the plaintiffs, and by their placards and advertisements had induced the public to believe that they were successors to Hendrie. They cited—

Leather Cloth Company v. The American Leather Cloth Company, 1 H. &

M. 271; 9 L. T. Rep. N.S. 558. Edlesden v. Vick, 11 Hare, 37, 78. Glennie v. Smith, 2 Dr. & Sm. 476. Harrison v. Taylor, 12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 540.

Rolt, Q.C., and W. C. Fooks, for the defendants, were not called on.

The VICE CHANCELLOR said that cases like the present were never free from difficulty. It would be impossible to lay down any general rule as to when persons in business were entitled to use the name of others in the same business. The court had always purposely avoided doing so, that they might not thereby open a door to fraud. But the general principle was, that the court would always interfere where there had been a fraudulent use of the name. But the court must not only be satisfied that the course which had been taken by the defendants had been calculated to deceive the public, but that it had been represented to them by the plaintiffs as having that effect; and that, if after such representation the defendants persisted in continuing the use of the name in the same manner, then, on the plaintiffs bringing the case before the court, the court would be justified in saying that that which was not fraudulent at first became so by the defendants persisting in the same course, and that therefore the plaintiffs would be entitled to the relief they asked. In the present case he was quite satisfied that there had been no intention in these persons at first to deceive the public. He thought that all they meant to represent was, that they had been employed as manufacturers by Hendrie in his business, and this was quite true; there was no doubt that Osborne had manufactured for and superintended the business of the plaintiff, and so might be called manufacturer and manager, and though the other two defendants were not strictly manufacturers and managers in the same sense, yet one had managed the accounts for Hendrie and the other was employed in selling retail goods in the shop for a considerable time. So these persons had all taken a very important part in Hendrie's business. The court had always conceded to persons who had taken an important part in any business the full benefit of this, and the right of informing the whole world that they came from such business. So in this case he thought the defendants were quite justified in stating in their placards, &c. that they came from Hendrie's. As to the instances of intentional fraud on the part of the defendants, it had been urged that the defendants had employed the same maker of boxes, &c.; that they had sold moëlline, petroleum soap, and other articles to which Hendrie had given particular names, in packages of the same colour and appearance as those used by him and the plaintiffs, and had put on the labels "Managers and manufacturers to the late Robert Hendrie;" that all these things put together were sufficient evidence of a fraudulent intent on their part. The plaintiffs had said, "If there was no fraudulent intent in it, what was the object of it all?" and he thought they were fairly justified in asking the question. As to putting Hendrie's name on the labels, &c., he thought they were entitled to do so. That being so, the only remaining question would be, whether they had used Hendrie's name so as to occupy a greater space than their own on the bills, labels, &c. At their house of business, it was clear, from the evidence, that at the side of their shop the name Hendrie was not in larger letters than their own, though it would seem that in the inscription over the door the words "from the late" were in very small letters. But then this was seen by the plaintiffs in April, 1863, and he could not have a better opinion than that of the plaintiffs on the subject. They did not think there was anything fraudulent in the way the defendants had put up Hendrie's name, and they did not make any representation to him about it. As to the names of the different articles, "moëlline," "petroleum soap," &c., which it had been said were adopted specially by Hendrie, it turned out that they were also used by other perfumers. As to the kind of boxes in which they had been sold by the defendants, it had been shown that those used by the defendants were like the plaintiffs', but it had also been shown that the boxes used by other perfumers resembled the plaintiffs', if anything, more nearly than those of the defendants. It could not be reasonably supposed that the defendants ought to sell the articles under less fanciful names, or in less fanciful packages than those used by other perfumers. He thought that these different acts by the defendants in using names and packages for these articles similar to those of the plaintiffs could not safely be relied upon as indicia of fraud. For assuming, for the reasons he had given, that the defendants were entitled to use the name of Hendrie, it only came to this, that they had sold articles under the same names and in similar packages to those used by other perfumers. The plaintiffs had alleged a case of direct fraud, but he thought it had not been proved. Then there was another question as to the address, "Golden Square, Regent's Quadrant," used by the defendants. At first he thought this was a very suspicious circumstance against the defendants; but he did not then know that Golden Square was only 150 yards from Regent's Quadrant. But all the sting had been taken out of this by the fact, that in the Post Office Directory "72, Regent's Quadrant," had for years been inserted as an addition to Golden Square, for the purpose of indicating the route to it. Still, if Tichborne Street, Regent's Quadrant, had been the only address used by Hendrie, it might have been different. But it had been shown that Hendrie had sometimes placed Tichborne Street, Golden Square, on his labels, and sometimes Tichborne Street, London. With regard to that part of the case as to the advertisements of the defendants in which the name of Robert Hendrie was immediately followed by the address, No. 19, Golden Square, Regent's Quadrant, the question for him to consider was, was there anything calculated to mislead the public, which if properly pointed out to the defendants would entitle the court to interfere? The advertisement seemed to have misled Thompson to this extent, that he thought Hendrie lived at the address of the defendants. But it only came to this, that the plaintiffs had been put to the inconvenience of having their letters sent to the wrong place. With regard to the case in which a chemist had been led by the labels to suppose that the defendants were successors to Hendrie, he thought that was a kind of mistake which it would be out of his power to prevent. For the reasons he had given, he thought the defendants were entitled to use Hendrie's name, and also to state that they were manufacturers and managers to him; and if a person saw them so described on their labels and chose to think that they were successors to him, it would be impossible for him to prevent it. As to the position of the plaintiffs in the suit, he thought that they were not justified in representing themselves as perfumers to Her Majesty; and it was a question whether they had a right to place the name of Hendrie on entirely new articles made by themselves, though it might be said the name was only used quâ firm. Still, he should have been disposed to dismiss the bill without costs if the bill had not been filed so hastily. He thought the letter sent by the defendants should have been answered before filing the bill. The undertaking too, given by the defendants, was more than he could have compelled. Under these circumstances he must dismiss the bill with costs.

[BAIL COURT.]

BLACKBURN, J., Nov. 23, 1865.

ILDERTON v. CASTRIQUE.

18 L. T. 506.

Composition-deed—Number of creditors—Creditors holding security—Out-standing bills of exchange—Tender dispensed with.

BANKRUPTCY.—In an action by an attorney on his bill of costs the defendant in his plea set out a composition-deed which was not executed by the plaintiff, in which the creditors who signed the deed, in consideration of, and on payment of, the composition covenanted with the defendant to execute a good and sufficient release, and the defendant covenanted with all his creditors to pay them the composition. The plea then averred that the defendant had always been ready and willing to pay the said composition according to the said deed, but the plaintiff would not receive the same:—Held, on a rule to set aside a judgment on demurrer in the Mayor's Court, that the averment in the plea amounted to an averment that the plaintiff had dispensed with a tender of the composition, and that the plea was good. It appeared at the trial that some of the creditors who executed the deed, the amounts of whose debts were necessary to make up the required statutory majority in value, held outstanding bills indorsed by the defendant:—Held, on the authority of Ex parte Godden (32 L. J. 37, Bank.), that their debts were properly included in considering whether three-fourths in value of the defendant's creditors had executed the deed.

This was an action in the Mayor's Court, London, for work done by an attorney.

The defendant pleaded, first, as to 1l. 3s. (the amount of the composition) never indebted; and for a second plea for a defence on equitable grounds, except as to the said sum of 1l. 3s., that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim in the declaration mentioned, and after the 11th October, 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons, and thereupon a deed bearing date the 19th August, 1864, was made and entered into by and between the defendant of the one part, and all the creditors of the said defendant of the other part relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendant and his release therefrom, which said deed, without the schedule, was in the words following (that is to say):

This indenture, made the 19th day of August, 1864, between Louis Castrique of No. 3, Philpot Lane, in the city of London, trading under the style or firm of "L. Castrique and Co.," of the one part, and all the creditors of the said Louis Castrique of the other part: Whereas the said Louis Castrique, from divers causes, is unable to pay his creditors full 20s. in the pound, and whereas the said Louis Castrique hath applied to his said creditors to receive and take a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound in full satisfaction and discharge of their several and respective debts, claims, and demands on him, such composition to be payable on the 31st day of December next, which the several creditors executing these presents, or in writing assenting thereto, have agreed to do, and being a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said Louis Castrique whose debts respectively amount to 10l. and upwards, have agreed to accept such composition in full satisfaction as aforesaid, and in consideration and on payment thereof, or whenever thereafter called upon for that purpose, hereby severally, for themselves and their partners, and for their several executors, administrators and assigns, covenanted with the said Louis Castrique, his executors and administrators, to execute to him, the said Louis Castrique, his executors and administrators, a good and sufficient release in the law of their several and respective debts, claims, and demands on him; and, in consideration of the covenant hereinbefore contained, the said Louis Castrique doth hereby, for himself, his executors and administrators, covenant with all his creditors to pay them the said composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound on their said several debts, on the said 31st day of December next.—

In witness, &c.

LOUIS CASTRIQUE.

Signed, sealed and delivered by the within-named Louis Castrique, in the presence of T. J. Horwood, solicitor, 3, Philpot Lane, London.

And a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts respectively amounted to 10l. and upwards, did, in writing, assent to and approve of the said deed, and the execution of the said deed by the defendant was attested by an attorney, and within twenty-eight days from the day of the execution of the said deed by the defendant the same was produced and left (having been first duly stamped) at the office of the chief registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and together with such deed there was delivered to the said chief registrar an affidavit by the defendant that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards had, in writing, assented to and approved of the said deed; and also stating the amount in value of the property of the defendant comprised in the said deed. And the said deed did, before the registration thereof, bear such ordinary and ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the B. A. 1861 in that behalf, and at the time of the execution of the said deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the claims herein pleaded to within the meaning of the B. A. 1861, and all conditions having been performed, and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became, and was, and is bound by the said deed as if he had been a party thereto, and had duly executed the same. And the defendant says that he has always been ready and willing to pay the said composition, and that he offered to pay the same according to the said deed, but the plaintiff would not receive the same, and he now brings into court under the next plea herein pleaded, the sum of 1*l.* 3*s.* as and being the said composition on the plaintiff's debt, and all things have been done and happened to entitle the defendant to have the plaintiff release him from the said claims herein pleaded to according to the true intent and meaning of the said deed.

Third plea, payment into court of 1*l.* 3*s.*

The plaintiff joined issue on the first and second pleas, and demurred to the second plea, on the ground that the said deed therein mentioned did not operate to release the defendant from the said claim of the plaintiff.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff on the demurrer, the parties agreeing that the defendant should have leave to move to set it aside, and on the trial of the issues of fact it appeared that a requisite number of creditors had executed the deed, but some of them held outstanding bills of exchange, and if the amounts of their debts secured by those bills were deducted, the creditors executing the deed would not represent three-fourths in value of the defendant's creditors as required by the B. A. 1861. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 8*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter it for him if the court should be of opinion that the persons holding bills not due at the time of the execution of the deed ought not to have been reckoned amongst the defendant's creditors.

Philbrick, in this term, obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict obtained herein before the judge of the Mayor's Court, London, and the judgments on the demurrer, should not respectively be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant on the ground that persons holding bills on which the defendant was liable, and current at the date of the registering of the deed, were properly reckoned among the defendant's creditors in number and value, though such bills never ranked on the defendant's estate; and that the plea is sufficient in law, and no tender of the composition need be averred or proved.

Atkinson now showed cause.—The point on the demurrer is, if the plea can be good without an averment of tender; and I submit that, as it only contains a conditional release on payment or tender of the composition, payment and tender must be alleged and proved to enable the defendant to take advantage of the deed. My friend will rely on Clapham v. Atkinson (4 B. & S. 722); but I submit that the plea must contain an averment of tender. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is it not sufficient if it says that he would not receive the money? Does not that dispense with a tender? It is no good going through the form of pulling out the money and showing it to him. You are right that, as a general rule, there must be a tender; but did he not here dispense with it?] No offer was made till after the money was due: and there is no evidence that the tender was made till about a month before the trial, and then not of the proper amount:—

Hazard v. Mare (6 H. & N. 434; 3 L. T. Rep. N.S. 743). Rosling v. Muggeridge (16 M. & W. 181).

The other point is, that there were a sufficient number of creditors if those were to be counted whose bills were outstanding, but were afterwards paid; and I submit that those would only have a right to prove in bankruptcy where the acceptors did not pay at maturity:—

Turquand v. Moss (17 C. B., N.S., 15; 10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 574). Ex parte Cockburn (32 L. J. 17, Bank.; 10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 252). Adkins v. Farrington (29 L. J. 345, Ex.; 2 L. T. N.S. 287).

Day in support of the rule.—It is laid down that the holder of a bill of exchange not yet due is a creditor, and may prove in bankruptcy, and that is the common practice: (Arch. Bank. 9th edit. 109.) The reason would appear to be, that if he did not prove the bankrupt would not be discharged. At common law tender was necessary, but might be dispensed with, and this is an equitable plea, and it is questionable if the same strictness is necessary as in ordinary pleas. The words here are the same as in Clapham v. Atkinson, except that the words “offered to pay the said composition” are left out: Read v. Golding (2 M. & S. 86). The words “would not receive the same” must mean that he refused to receive it. He was stopped on that point, and contended that the other point was decided by Ex parte Godden (32 L. J. 37, Bank.; 7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 628); see also Whittaker v. Lowe, 13 L. T. 469.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The question which arises on the evidence is, if a proper number of creditors assented to the deed, and that depends on whether the persons who held bills of exchange indorsed by the bankrupt, and which at the time of the execution of the deed were not due, were entitled to prove. I take it the question is, if the holder of a bill of exchange can prove in bankruptcy before the bill is due. In Archbold's Bankruptcy it is laid down that a person may prove, though he holds security. Then comes the question, is a person so entitled who afterwards turns out to be paid in full? It might have been very politic in the Legislature that the difference only should be allowed; but, on the other hand, it might be very difficult to ascertain the amount of it. Therefore there are reasons on both sides, and it is hard to say what was the meaning of the Legislature, but that has been decided by the Lords Justices in Ex parte Godden, who decided that the statute did extend to such debts, and I follow their decision, and do not pretend to say if it is right or wrong. The other question arises on the plea which says, “The defendant has always been ready and willing to pay the said composition according to the said deed, but the plaintiff would not receive the same;” and the question is, whether that means to say that the defendant would have paid if the plaintiff had come for the money?—If it means that it would amount to nothing—or if it means that the defendant was willing to pay the composition, but the plaintiff refused to accept it; that would amount to a dispensation with tender, and that I think is the reasonable meaning of the words. I think, therefore, that the rule should be absolute to enter the verdict for the defendant.

Rule absolute.

THE MONSOON v. THE NEPTUNE.

13 L. T. 510.

Steamers and sailing ships—Collision—Admiralty regulations—Construction of articles 15, 18, and 19.

SHIPPING.—15th regulation.—If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

18th regulation.—Where by the above rule one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article, viz.:

19th regulation.—In obeying and construing the above rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from such rules necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger.

Case 1: Steamer in default.

Brett, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Monsoon.

Vernon Lushington for the Neptune.

DR. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the barque Monsoon, 296 tons register, from Port Natal, with a general cargo and passengers for London, against the General Steam Navigation Company's steamship Neptune, 364 tons register, from Havre, with passengers and cargo for London, to obtain compensation in damages for injuries sustained by reason of a collision between them in the vicinity of the North Foreland, about ten p.m. on the 25th March last. The barque stated the wind as W. by S., and the weather as fine, clear, and starlight; the steamer represented the former as about W., and the latter as very dark, but clear. The case for the Monsoon was, that she was under double-reefed foretopsail, maintopsail, jib, and mizen, in Margate Roads, proceeding close-hauled on the port track, heading N.W. by N., the tide being about three-quarters flood, and making about two knots, carrying the Admiralty regulation lights, and in charge of a duly licensed Trinity Cinque Port pilot to take her to Gravesend; that the pilot having determined not to proceed further with the barque on that night, an attempt was made to stay her, in order to bring her to anchor; that she, however, refused stays, and thereupon her mizen was brailed up, her maintopsail was taken in, and her helm was put hard hard a-port, and she was wore round with a view to bringing her head on tide, and letting her anchor go; that whilst the barque was so wearing round, and a part of her crew were engaged in taking in the foretopsail, and when her head was about E.S.E., the look-out from on board her made out the three lights of the Neptune, bearing about one point on her starboard bow, and at the distance of about one mile; that the lights were watched from the barque, and it being seen that the Neptune was approaching the barque, and rendering a collision immediate, the Neptune was loudly hailed to port her helm, and then to stop her engines, but no notice was apparently taken of such hailing, and the Neptune, under a starboard helm, ran into and with her starboard bow struck the barque on her port bow, and did her very considerable damage. The defence on the part of the steamer set forth, that the tide was flood, running about three knots; that the Neptune was steering north by west, going about three knots an hour, and was carrying the regulation lights brightly burning, when the green light of the barque was observed about two points on her port bow, distant about a mile; that the Neptune's helm was thereupon immediately put hard a-starboard; that shortly after, on both her lights coming into view, her engines were eased; that in a few seconds afterwards, on her green light disappearing and her red light only being visible, the Neptune's engines were stopped, but the Monsoon not keeping her course, came on under a port helm, and with her stern struck the Neptune a violent blow on the starboard. The court had to decide two questions on this case: first, whether the Neptune was to blame, and secondly, whether any fault was to be imputed to the Monsoon. The 15th article of the steering and sailing rules appeared to be applicable to this case: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship, and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship." It was clear both these vessels were proceeding up channel, and that at the time when they descried each other, whether the distance was a mile, more or less, if it involved a risk of collision, it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way. If the steamer did not keep out of the way, the burden of proof was upon her to shew there were sufficient causes and reasons why she did not obey the statute. On the other hand, there was also an obligation imposed on the Monsoon, because the words of the 18th article were these: "That where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course," subject, of course, to certain contingencies. The question was, whether the steamer took proper measures and means to keep out of the way of the Monsoon, and whether the Monsoon did keep her course; or whether, if she did not keep her course, there was any sufficient justification by the facts and circumstances of the case? The case of the Monsoon was, that after the Neptune was seen in the manner stated, the lights were watched from the barque, and it being seen that the Neptune was approaching the barque and rendering a collision imminent, the Neptune was loudly hailed to port her helm, and then to stop her engines; but no notice was apparently taken of such hailing, and the Neptune, under a starboard helm, ran into and with her starboard bow struck the barque on her port bow and did the damage. It did not appear whether it was intended to impute any particular blame to the Neptune for coming under a starboard helm, nor did it appear to be of great importance to consider what was the intention of the pleader here, for the substance of the pleading was, that she did not comply with the 15th article and keep out of the way. On the other side, on behalf of the Neptune, the statement was, in substance, that the Neptune did that which was right under the circumstances; that she did do all that she could do to avoid the collision, that it was right to put her helm hard a-starboard, and right afterwards to ease her engines in the manner they were eased; and the blame was thrown upon the Monsoon in not keeping her course. As to the weather, it seemed to be pretty nearly agreed on that the night was dark but clear, and the wind was about half a gale, certainly not stronger. The questions then to be determined were, whether the Neptune was right in immediately starboarding, and whether her engines were eased in due time; because there was another regulation, that if there is the least danger of collision the engines are to be immediately eased to prevent the consequences of a violent collision. Under all the circumstances of the case, the court felt bound to hold that the Neptune was solely to blame for the collision.

The Court was assisted by Captain Shuttleworth and Captain Webb.

GORDON AND ANOTHER v. THE VESTRY OF ST. JAMES'S, WESTMINSTER.

13 L. T. 511.

Action for damage by leakage of water from a drain—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855—18 & 19 Vict. c. 120—Liability of vestry for the state of parochial drains—Negligence—Evidence of.

LONDON. WATER.—Defendants, in whom, under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, were vested, and who had the control and management of, all the drains and sewers in the parish (except the main sewers), gave leave to the Drinking Fountains Association to erect a drinking-fountain in Argyll-place, near to plaintiff's premises, and undertook to pay for the supply of water thereto at the rate of fifteen gallons per hour day and night. The supply was in a stream of a quarter of an inch in diameter, and the surplus or waste water was carried off by a waste-pipe, which also, by leave of defendants and under the superintendence of their surveyor, was connected with a gully drain or sewer which ran close to plaintiffs' wine-cellars and descended into the main sewer underneath such cellars. The fountain commenced working in April, 1862, and in September, 1863, a quantity of water, which had escaped from the gully drain and accumulated at the back of the wall of the cellars, forced its way into plaintiffs' cellars and damaged their stock of wine there. Thereupon, by order of defendants, the gully drain was opened, and it was found that the earth on which it had originally rested had sunk, and so the bottom of the drain had cracked and become leaky, and caused the damage. A new pipe-barrel drain was then substituted by defendants for the old gully drain, since which no leakage had occurred. The gully drain, which was an ordinary brick drain, was made before plaintiffs' cellars, which were about forty years old, were built. The walls of the cellars were in good condition, and until the erection of the fountain had been dry and free from damp. Plaintiffs were ignorant of the condition of the gully drain or of the water outside their cellar wall until this occurrence, and defendants had no means of ascertaining its state unless they had opened it, which they did not do till September, 1863, after the water had escaped into plaintiffs' cellars, as they had no previous notice that it was out of repair. Conflicting evidence was given before the arbitrator as to the cause of the sinking of the soil of the drain, and he stated that it was impossible at this distance of time to form a satisfactory opinion upon the point.

In an action to recover damages from defendants for the injury sustained by the leakage of water from the drain into plaintiffs' cellars, through the alleged neglect of duty on the part of the defendants in not properly examining the drain, at the time the waste-pipe from the fountain was, by their permission, introduced into it, and ascertaining that it was in a fit condition to perform the additional duty thereby imposed on it; it was:—Held, that, under the circumstances stated, there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, and therefore, following the decision of the Ex. in Fletcher v. Rylands and another (13 L. T. 121; 34 L. J. 177 Ex.), the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

SPECIAL CASE.

This was an action by plaintiffs, wine merchants in Argyll-place and King-street, Regent-street, in the parish of St. James, Westminster, against defendants, to recover damages for injury sustained by water coming into their wine-cellars and damaging their wine in manner hereinafter stated.

At the trial in Trinity Term, 1864, at the Middlesex sittings, before Martin B.

and a special jury, a verdict was found by consent for plaintiffs, subject to a special case to be stated by a barrister for the opinion of the court, as to the defendants' liability, the question of damages being referred to an assessor named by the Judge, who subsequently assessed them at 800*l*.

The pleadings which accompanied and formed part of the special case were as follows:

The first count of the declaration stated

That before and at the time, &c. plaintiffs carried on business as wine merchants at No. 1, Argyll-place, Regent-street, and at King-street, &c., and were possessed of certain wine-cellars there, in which they kept large quantities of wine for use in their said business, the said cellars being situate in and running underneath the roads of Argyll-place aforesaid and King-street aforesaid, in front of and adjoining to the house of plaintiffs; and that after the passing of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and before the committing, &c., defendants were a vestry duly constituted for the said parish of St. James, Westminster, under the said Act, and being so constituted, had thereby vested in them, and had under their care, custody, and control, as such vestry as aforesaid, all the drains and sewers (except the main sewers) of the said parish, and the gullies connected therewith; and were, as such vestry as aforesaid, bound to repair, maintain, and keep the same in good and proper order and repair, and that afterwards, and before the committing, &c., defendants, as such vestry as aforesaid, permitted and suffered a certain association of persons, called "The Metropolitan Drinking Fountains Association," to erect a drinking-fountain in Argyll-place aforesaid, upon land under the control of the said vestry as such vestry as aforesaid, and to lead and place the overflow pipes of the said fountain which were used for carrying away the surplus water from the same, to and into, and to be connected with, a certain drain or sewer, not being a main sewer, in Argyll-place aforesaid, which said drain or sewer is near to the said cellars of plaintiffs, such drain or sewer being then vested in, and being under the care and control of, defendants as such vestry as aforesaid, and which said drain or sewer defendants, as such vestry as aforesaid, were liable and bound to repair, maintain, and keep in proper state and condition, together with the other drains and sewers so vested in them as aforesaid; and that afterwards, and after the said overflow pipes of the said fountain had been connected with the said drain or sewer as aforesaid, and whilst the said sewer or drain continued under the care and control of defendants as aforesaid; and whilst they were so liable and bound to repair and maintain the same as aforesaid, defendants neglected their duty as such vestry as aforesaid in this, that they unlawfully, wrongfully, and negligently permitted and suffered the said drain or sewer into which the said overflow pipes of the said fountain had been led and placed as aforesaid, to become ruinous, leaky, insufficient and out of repair, so that on divers days and times continuously between 1st and 30th September, 1863, large quantities of the surplus water, refuse, and other water necessarily running and flowing from the said fountain, and from the overflow pipes of the same, and also from a gully connected with the said drain or sewer into the said drain or sewer, in order to be thereby carried and conveyed away to and into a certain main sewer, flowed, leaked, and percolated through and out of the walls and sides of the said drain or sewer into the soil and earth surrounding the same, and then and without any default of plaintiffs necessarily and unavoidably percolated and flowed through the said soil to and into the said wine-cellars of plaintiffs and into the bins thereof, and in and upon the wine stored therein, to wit [stating the quantity], thereby causing the temperature of the said cellars to be reduced by the entrance of the said water into the said cellars and the said bins, and chilled and injured the said wine, &c. Allegation of damage to the wine, &c., and special damage in plaintiffs thereby losing the supplying of certain orders for wine, &c.

The second count charged

That defendants being such vestry, &c., and while plaintiffs were such wine merchants, &c., as in the said first count mentioned, unlawfully, wrongfully, and negligently permitted and suffered a certain gully, and a certain sewer or drain, in Argyll-place aforesaid, situated respectively near to the said cellars of plaintiffs, which said gully and the said drain or sewer were then vested in and under the care and control of defendants, as such vestry as aforesaid, and which they were, as such vestry as in first count mentioned, bound to maintain and repair, to become insufficient, ruinous, and out of repair, whereby, and through no default of plaintiffs, on the said day and times in first count mentioned, large quantities of water, which were necessarily running and passing into the said gully and into and through the said drain or sewer, through the insufficiency of the same and not otherwise, ran and percolated through and out of the said gully and also through and out of the walls and sides of the said drain or sewer into the earth and soil surrounding the same, and from the same to and into the said cellars of plaintiffs, and thereby caused the damage to plaintiffs as in first count alleged.

Plea, not guilty (by stat. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, sects. 106, 112, 116, 70, 69, 68; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, sects. 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 250, 251).

Notice of action was duly served on the vestry, pursuant to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 106, more than one month before action brought. Defendants are a vestry duly constituted for the parish of St. James's, Westminster, under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), under which Act and the Amendment Acts (19 & 20 Vict. c. 112; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) they act. Sects. 68 and 69 of the first-mentioned Act vest the drains and sewers, except the main sewers, in them, and contain provisions as to their reparation and maintenance.

In August, 1861, the vestry gave permission to the Metropolitan Free Drinking Fountains Association to erect a drinking-fountain on the north side of Argyll-place, nearly opposite to plaintiffs' premises.

In September, 1861, the association accordingly erected the fountain, and carried off the surplus water by a waste-pipe, which they connected with a gully drain, which ran from a gully in Argyll-place, opposite plaintiffs' house and close to their wine-cellars, and then descended into a main sewer underneath the said cellars. This connection of the pipe with the gully drain was made under the superintendence of the surveyor of the vestry.

The fountain commenced working in April, 1862, the water supplied to it, for which the vestry have undertaken to pay, was at the rate of fifteen gallons per hour day and night. More water is wasted than used, and the waste water passes into the waste-pipe, and from thence into the gully drain; the stream of waste water so flowing into the waste-pipe being about a quarter of an inch in diameter.

Early in September, 1863, a considerable quantity of water found its way into plaintiffs' cellars, and it was ascertained that this water came through the mortar of the wall of the cellars next to the gully drain at a part of the wall between seven and eight feet from the floor of the cellars behind bin 19. The water remained in the cellars several days and caused damage to some of the wine there, which, as has been stated, has been assessed at 800*l*. The stock of wine at the time in the cellars was worth 11,000*l*.

Shortly after this influx of water the gully drain was opened by order of the vestry, and was found to be very much out of repair. The earth beneath the drain on which it had originally rested had sunk, and left the bottom of the drain unsupported, and so caused it to crack and become leaky. In consequence of this state of the drain the water which flowed from the waste-pipe of the fountain had escaped from the drain, accumulated at the back of the wall of plaintiffs' cellars, and eventually forced its way into the cellars and caused the damage before described. There was no leakage in the waste-pipe of the fountain.

The vestry substituted a new pipe barrel drain for the old gully drain, the bottom of which gully drain was so out of repair that it fell in when their servant was examining it, and since the pipe barrel drain was substituted for the gully drain there has been no escape of water into plaintiffs' cellars.

The gully drain was made before plaintiffs' cellars were built. It was a brick drain, built in the manner, and of the materials, in and of which such drains were built about forty or fifty years ago, when such drains were seldom made perfectly water-tight. The wall of plaintiffs' cellars, through which the water percolated, was built against the gully drain, and was on an average sixteen inches thick, faced on the inside with brick, and rough and jagged on the outside. It has not bulged or cracked, and was built of sufficient strength to resist any pressure to which cellars in such a position are usually exposed. But for the escape of water from the drain no damage would have been sustained by plaintiffs. The cellars have been occupied as wine-cellars by plaintiffs, and their predecessors for forty years. Until the water found its way into them in September, 1863, they had always been perfectly dry and free from damp, and fit for use as wine-cellars.

The soil beneath the gully drain was composed of made ground, old bricks, bits of stone, and coals. The sinking of this soil from the bottom of the gully drain had caused it to crack and become leaky.

On behalf of plaintiffs evidence was given before the arbitrator that the sinking of their soil probably arose from its not having been well and sufficiently rammed when the drain was made. On behalf of defendants evidence was given that the probability was that the persons who built the wall of plaintiffs' cellar, while building it, removed part of the soil beneath the drain, or loosened it and so caused it to sink.

At this distance of time the arbitrators stated it was impossible to form a satisfactory opinion as to the cause of the sinking of the soil.

When plaintiffs became tenants of the cellars in 1855, they found them internally perfectly dry and in good repair, and they did not know, and had no means of knowing, the condition or state of repair of the gully drain, or of the outside of their wall, or its position with reference to the drain.

When in 1855 the sewers and drains vested under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, in the vestry, no plans or other materials came into their possession from which they could ascertain the position and state of repair of this gully drain and of the wall of plaintiffs' cellars, unless they had opened the pavement and examined it. It is not usual so to examine drains and sewers unless there is reason for supposing they require repairs. The opening of such drains causes inconvenience to the public traffic in the streets.
